BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room No. 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

The subcommittee had on February 11, 1919, concluded hearings, held under Senate resolution 307, on the subjects of pro-German propaganda and activities of the United States Brewers' Association and its allied interests in the liquor business, which were published in two volumes (2,975 pages) entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda." Senate resolution 307 was passed by the Senate on September 19, 1918, and is as follows:

Whereas Honorable A. Mitchell Palmer, Custodian of Alien Property, on or about September fourteenth made the following statement:

"The facts will soon appear which will conclusively show that twelve or fifteen German brewers of America, in association with the United States Brewers' Association, furnished the money, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, to buy a great newspaper in one of the chief cities of the Nation; and its publisher, without disclosing whose money had bought that organ of public opinion, in the very Capital of the Nation, in the shadow of the Capitol itself, has been fighting the battle of the liquor traffic.

"When the traffic, doomed though it is, undertakes and seeks by these secret methods to control party nominations, party machinery, whole political parties, and thereby control the government of State and Nation, it is time the people know the truth.

"The organized liquor traffic of the country is a vicious interest because it has been unpatriotic, because it has been pro-German in its sympathies and its conduct. Around these great brewery organizations owned by rich men, almost all of them are of German birth and sympathy, at least before we entered the war, has grown up the societies, all the organizations of this country intended to keep young German immigrants from becoming real American citizens.

"It is around the sangerfests and sangerbunds and organizations of that kind, generally financed by the rich brewers, that the young Germans who come to America are taught to remember, first, the fatherland, and second, America";

And

Whereas it has been publicly and repeatedly charged against the United States Brewers' Association and allied brewing companies and interests that there is in the Department of Justice and in the office of a certain United States district attorney evidence showing:

That, the said United States Brewers' Association, brewing companies, and allied interests have in recent years made contributions to political campaigns on a scale without precedent in the political history of the country and in violation of the laws of the land;

That, in order to control legislation in State and Nation they have exacted pledges from candidates to office, including Congressmen and United States Senators, before election, such pledges being on file;

That, in order to influence public opinion to their ends they have heavily subsidized the public press and stipulated when contracting for advertising space with the newspapers that a certain amount be editorial space, the literary material for the space being provided from the brewers' central office in New York;

That, in order to suppress expressions of opinion hostile to their trade and political interests, they have set in operation an extensive system of boycotting of American manufacturers, merchants, railroads, and other interests;

That, for the furthering of their political enterprises, they have erected a political organization to carry out their purposes;

That they were allied to powerful suborganizations, among them the German-American Alliance, whose charter was revoked by the unanimous vote of Congress; the National Association of Commerce and Labor; and the Manufacturers and Dealers' Associations, and that they have their ramifications in other organizations apparently neutral in character;

That they have on file political surveys of States, counties, and districts tabulating the men and forces for and against them, and that they have paid large sums of money to citizens of the United States to advocate their cause and interests, including some in the Government employ;

That they have defrauded the Federal Government by applying to their political corruption funds money which should have gone to the Federal Treasury in taxes;

That they are attempting to build up in the country through the control of such organizations as the United States societies and by the manipulation of the foreign language press, a political influence which can be turned to one or the other party, thus controlling electoral results;

That they, or some of their organizations, have pleaded nolo contendere to charges filed against them and have paid fines aggregating large sums of money: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to call upon the Honorable A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, and the Department of Justice and its United States district attorneys to produce the evidence and documents relating to the charges herein mentioned, and to subpoena any witnesses or documents relating thereto that it may find necessary, and to make a report of the results of such investigation and what is shown thereby to the Senate of the United States as promptly as possible.

The present hearings are held under the following resolution (S. Res. 439) passed by the Senate on February 4, 1919:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on the Judiciary conferred by S. Res. 307 be, and the same hereby is, extended so as to include the power and duty to inquire concerning any efforts being made to propagate in this country the principles of any party exercising or claiming to exercise authority in Russia, whether such efforts originate in this country or are incited or financed from abroad, and, further, to inquire into any effort to incite the overthrow of the Government of this country or all government by force, or by the destruction of life or property, or the general cessation of industry.

Maj. Edwin Lowry Humes, of the Judge Advocate General's Department, United States Army, detailed by the War Department to assist the subcommittee in the hearings held under Senate resolution 307, appeared as counsel for the subcommittee in the present hearings.

(The following excerpts from the testimony of Mr. Thomas J. Tunney, an inspector of police, police department New York City, before this subcommittee on Tuesday, January 21, 1919, pages 2679-2681 and 2684-2687 of Volume II of the hearings entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda," were ordered inserted in this record at this point:)

Mr. TUNNEY. * * * We apprehended and secured evidence against Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, and they were subsequently convicted for trying to defeat the selective-draft act.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you find a list of those people? .

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; we found this original letter that was used in the testimony in the Hindu case in San Francisco, and was also used against Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman in the trial in New York.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is Emma Goldman now?

Mr. TUNNEY. She is in prison at Jefferson City, Mo.

Senator NELSON. In a safe place?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes. She was ordered by the trial judge to be deported after her term expires—both she and Berkman.

Senator OVERMAN. What is her native country?

Mr. TUNNEY. I think she is a native of Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. She is ordered by the court to be deported after her term is up?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; that was ordered by the trial judge with regard to both Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman. There was some doubt as to whether she was married to an American citizen or not.

Senator OVERMAN. What age woman is she?

Mr. TUNNEY. She is a woman about 46 years of age; a very able and intelligent woman and a very fine speaker.

Senator OVERMAN. I know something about her, of course. How long has she been in this country?

Mr. TUNNEY. Nearly 30 years.

Senator OVERMAN. She is a fine speaker, you say?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; she is a very fine speaker.

Senator NELSON. She speaks good English?

Mr. TUNNEY. She speaks English very fluently. In fact, I have heard newspaper men say that she is a master of the English language. She and Berkman defended themselves on their trial, and they put in a very able defense, and their cross-examination of the prospective jurors was particularly noticeable.

Senator OVERMAN. Is she a handsome woman?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; she is not. I would not call her a very homely looking woman, either. She was a rather good-looking woman when she was young. She is a very stout woman.

Leon Trotsky, before he left New York, was a great associate of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman.

Senator OVERMAN. That is the Russian leader?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes.

He called a meeting of the German socialists and Russians at the Harlem River Park Casino, at One hundred and twenty-second Street and Second Avenue, on the night of March 26, 1917, after the breaking off of the diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany, and he spoke in both German and Russian that night, and this was the substance of his speech.

Senator STERLING. Who is that?

Mr. TUNNEY. Leon Trotsky.

Senator OVERMAN. The foreign minister of the Bolsheviks.

Mr. TUNNEY. He said: "I am going back to Russia"—he was going the next morning with about 35 or 40 of his associates, the names of whom, I believe, the Military Intelligence has. There was a report submitted to Gen. Churchill, and previous to that to Col. Van Deman. He said:

"I am going back to Russia to overthrow the provisional government and stop the war with Germany and allow no interference from any outside governments."

And he said:

"I want you people here to organize and keep on organizing until you are able to overthrow this damned, rotten, capitalistic Government of this country."

He did leave the next morning, with his followers, on the Norwegian-American Line; and from that date until June 1 about 450 Russians left, with various leaders, and they also went back there to roast the American commission that was over there at that time.

Two of the men who are now in the government over there were connected with newspaper publications in New York. One of them was named William Schatoff, and is commissioner of railroads.

Senator NELSON. Commissioner of railroads where?

Mr. TUNNEY. In Russia, now. Also, I understand, he is the new executioner there in the place of Uritski, who was assassinated by a woman some time ago in St. Petersburg.

There were some American boys coming out of St. Petersburg, and one of them told me that he came up to them and spoke English to them, and said to give his regards to Broadway, and had the train go back to St. Petersburg, and kept them there until the next morning.

The other fellow, Wallen, was connected with the publications Novymir and Golatruda, Russian publications.

Senator NELSON. Russian publications in this country?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Who else, may I ask, Inspector, accompanied Trotsky at this time?

Mr. TUNNEY. I can not tell you the names, Senator, but the Military Intelligence has a complete list of them, or a copy of them. I can get a copy if they have not, from New York.

Senator STERLING. Did Lincoln Steffens accompany them?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; no Americans accompanied them at that time. They were all Russians, but they were well-known anarchists, well known to some of my men.

Senator OVERMAN. I wish you would repeat the statement that Trotsky made to them before he left this country.

Mr. TUNNEY. He said to keep on their organization here and they would overthrow the Government of this country.

Senator NELSON. And knock out the capitalists?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes. He called it the "damned, rotten, capitalistic Government." Those are the words that he used.

Senator OVERMAN. Capitalistic Government?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether they followed his advice, or whether they are going on with that work?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes. I would not say that it is very effective, but that is the talk amongst a lot of the same followers now, sometimes in public and sometimes in secret conferences that they have.

Senator NELSON. You have a nest of those anarchists yet in New York, have you not?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes, Senator; there are a lot of them there yet. I might say that five of them were, subsequent to the conviction of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, apprehended for abusing the President and the Government of the United States, and in June they were convicted of violating the espionage act; and they were followers of Emma Goldman and were sentenced to 20 years apiece. That was just a few months ago.

Senator OVERMAN. What was Trotsky doing in this country before?

Mr. TUNNEY. He was always talking to the Russians on organization. He was connected with that newspaper publication, the Novymir, and was very often delivering lectures both to Russians and Germans on anarchy while he was here—radical socialism. He believed in the overthrow of all governments.

Senator NELSON. He spoke German as well as Russian?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; very fluently.

Senator NELSON. What was his nationality?

Mr. TUNNEY. He is a Russian.

Senator NELSON. Was he a Slav or a German?

Mr. TUNNEY. He is a Russian.

Senator NELSON. A Russian?

Mr. TUNNEY. A Russian Jew; but they do not believe in any religion, of course. They are just as much opposed to the Jewish religion as any other. They call themselves "Internationalists."

Senator OVERMAN. Did he speak English as well as Russian and German?

Mr. TUNNEY. He spoke very little English.

Maj. HUMES. You say that these followers of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman were convicted and sentenced to 20 years?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Do you remember what the sentence was that was imposed on Emma Goldman and Berkman?

Mr. TUNNEY. They were sentenced to two years each, which was the maximum sentence under the law at that time, the espionage act not being at that time in effect.

I also remember that the sentence imposed on the bomb plotters was a year and a half each, which was the maximum sentence under the law at that time; and then it was a subterfuge to get to try them under that, because it was never intended for criminals, but for legitimate shippers of explosives—in other words, that they should notify the common carriers that they were shipping explosives and comply with the Federal laws on that subject.

* * * * *

Maj. HUMES. What do you know about activities, since the armistice, on the part of these people, the anarchists and others?

Mr. TUNNEY. They are very active. They hold secret meetings and they plan to organize and disseminate propaganda by means of newspapers, small pamphlets, and letters, and later on adopt other methods, which they have not decided on up to the present time.

Senator STERLING. Is there evidence of renewed activity on the part of these anarchists, Mr. Tunney, since the armistice was signed?

Mr. TUNNEY. There is, Senator; there is evidence, but hardly sufficient to proceed against them up to the present time, with the right kind of witnesses. You sometimes get this information direct from a secret agent that you can not get him to testify to, because it takes years to get on the inside to find out certain things. You destroy his evidence after you use it in one case, and probably jeopardize his life. Sometimes people think a man's life does not amount to much if he accomplishes a whole lot of good; that is, a man is willing to give up his life for the cause of his country.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know anything about the activities of Lenine in this country?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; I never found any of Lenine's connection here, never; but I do know about Trotsky and the other people.

Senator NELSON. How old a man was Trotsky?

Mr. TUNNEY. I should judge Trotsky was a man, when he left here, of about 35 years of age.

Senator NELSON. What was his appearance?

Mr. TUNNEY. He was a typical Russian; black, bushy, curly hair, and very radical looking in appearance as well as in speech.

Senator NELSON. Was he a tall man or a short man?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; he was of medium height. I should judge he was about 5 feet 6 or 5 feet 7.

Senator OVERMAN. Was he employed in the hotels?

Mr. TUNNEY. No. I have heard that story. He used to write articles and probably did take on different jobs. I think he used to write articles for various Russian newspapers here.

Senator OVERMAN. Did he have any other employment?

Mr. TUNNEY. Not that I know of.

Senator OVERMAN. How long was he in this country?

Mr. TUNNEY. He was only in New York for a few months before he left. He had traveled somewhat through the United States. What he did in the other cities I do not know. I know only what he did in New York.

Senator STERLING. Did your activities lead you to investigate any newspapers in New York or anywhere else?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; no direct investigation. From time to time those foreign newspaper investigations were turned over to men who understood the language.

Senator NELSON. Did you ever do anything in connection with Viereck's "Fatherland"?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; I did not.

Senator OVERMAN. Who owns the paper now that Trotsky was connected with?

Mr. TUNNEY. Weinstein is one of the editors, and a fellow by the name of Brailowsky.

Senator OVERMAN. Really the same man that owned it when Trotsky—

Mr. TUNNEY. Weinstein was associated with Trotsky in running it at the time Trotsky was here.

Senator OVERMAN. And he is now running it?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; he is now running that paper.

Senator STERLING. Did you at that time seize or take into your possession, Mr. Tunney, any material at newspaper offices which was meant for publication in newspapers of an anarchistic nature?

Mr. TUNNEY. You mean in the American newspapers, Senator?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. TUNNEY. No; I did not, with the exception of Emma Goldman's "Mother Earth," and the "Blast," which were published in England—two anarchistic publications. In fact, I never found any of the American or the English papers connected with this movement at all.

Senator NELSON. Did Trotsky appear to be a man of education or ability?

Mr. TUNNEY. That was his reputation among the Russian people who speak English, that he was a man of ability among his own people, and quite a leader of men.

Senator STERLING. Did you ever hear him speak, yourself?

Mr. TUNNEY. I did not, Senator. I saw him, though. But this information, that I am testifying to, was by one of my own men, not a stool pigeon, but a policeman who secured this information that I have testified to, and upon which he based his reports at that time. That was turned over at that time to the Military Intelligence, shortly after he made his speech, and I think they turned it over to the State Department. That is on information, however. I do know Trotsky was taken off the steamer at Halifax and detained for a couple of weeks. And while he was detained there people in New York held a protest meeting and demanded his release, and I think they sent a telegram to the State Department in Washington at that time—some of the other radicals did—and some time subsequent to that he was released.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the size of the meeting, do you remember, that made the protest?

Mr. TUNNEY. There were about 400 or 500 present. It was in a place called the Lyceum, 64 East Fourth Street, New York. It was in April, 1917, after the declaration of war. But there were over 1,000 present at the meeting the night before he sailed from New York, at the Harlem River Park Casino. Emma Goldman and Berkman were also present that night and listened to him speak.

Capt. LESTER. Do you know how long Trotsky was in this country altogether?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; I know he was in New York only a few months. I do not know how long he was in this country altogether.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know who presided over that big meeting in which he made a speech?

Mr. TUNNEY. Who was the chairman, do you mean?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. TUNNEY. I really do not know, but I think it was a man named Abrahams, who was subsequently convicted and sentenced to prison for 20 years for violation of the espionage act. But I can find that out, I can get the names of those who were there.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you have occasion to investigate the I. W. W. any?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; in the early part of the European war they were making a bomb to kill a couple of men here in the United States—three of the I. W. W.'s who were also associated with the anarchistic movement. Those men were Carron, Berg, and Hanson. While making this bomb it prematurely exploded and killed themselves, in an apartment house, One hundred and fourth Street. It blew the front out of the building and killed the three of them, and killed a woman up on the next floor. I might add that this fellow Berg had a sister known as Louise Berg, also referred to as "Dynamite Louise," who went back shortly after Trotsky, with one or the other Russian bunch, to blow up some of the officials in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Berg was one of the three conspirators engaged in the manufacture of bombs?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes. There was a conspiracy to kill three prominent men in this country at one time, and as many thereafter as they could.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know who were the prominent men they had in view?

Mr. TUNNEY. I do.

Senator OVERMAN. Who were they?

Mr. TUNNEY. John D. Rockefeller, sr., and John D. Rockefeller, jr. It was also discussed amongst them at that time that in order to wipe out families there was no good in killing one or two in the family, that they should kill them all, even to the children, and they used to talk from that time that the best way to do it was to get servants in the employ of the households of these prominent men, so as to get a line exactly on what the family was composed of and what it consisted of.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you noticed the carrying of the red flag in New York?

Mr. TUNNEY. No; they stopped carrying that. They passed a local ordinance prohibiting its being carried. They used to carry it at all meetings.

Senator OVERMAN. What effect does that red flag have on a crowd?

Mr. TUNNEY. It has the effect of creating a feeling on the part of Americans that they would like to assassinate everybody carrying the red flag; or at least, a large number of them feel that way.

Senator OVERMAN. What effect does it have on the people who are in sympathy with carrying the red flag?

Mr. TUNNEY. It simply enthuses them, and they indulge in cheering and waving it in the air.

Senator OVERMAN. It inflames them?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; and all those who are in sympathy with them. As soon as the carrying of the red flag was stopped they started in to wear red neckties and sometimes red flowers in their button holes.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that the carrying of the red flag tends to promote breaches of the peace?

Mr. TUNNEY. It does; because it antagonizes Americans who are opposed to them, and naturally there is a conflict right away. Americans claim they only want one flag here, and that is the Stars and Stripes.

Senator STERLING. The red flag is usually understood to be the emblem of anarchy?

Mr. TUNNEY. Yes; it is the emblem of anarchy. They sometimes call it internationalism. There are some modern Socialists who do not believe in the red flag. The radical Socialists do not believe in any form of government at all; their motto is, "Do as you like," and everybody do the same; they have no regard for law, and they do not believe in law.

Senator OVERMAN. One of their creeds is "Down with capital"?

Mr. TUNNEY. "Down with capital and Government." They claim capital is responsible for all government. They blame the churches for standing in their way. They sometimes say they would like to destroy the churches. I met a man one night some time ago who claimed the only way to destroy every building was to blow it down with dynamite. There was another man present who said he did not believe in destroying buildings of art and science and where literature was kept, but all other buildings he would destroy. He differed to that extent from the other fellow.

Senator NELSON. How many of those anarchists and those radicals, I. W. W.'s and anarchists, have you in New York? As nearly as you can tell, how many are there?

Mr. TUNNEY. Do you mean, Senator, who belong to organizations or associations?

Senator NELSON. No; I mean that belong to such organizations or believe in that gospel.

Senator OVERMAN. Who sympathize with them.

Senator NELSON. Yes; who sympathize with them.

Mr. TUNNEY. I believe there are 12,000 or 15,000 in New York. I mean those who sympathize with the real radical movement. I should say we probably have 50,000 who more or less sympathize with them.

Senator NELSON. They are mostly foreigners, are they not?

Mr. TUNNEY. Mostly foreigners.

Senator NELSON. From what part of the old country?

Mr. TUNNEY. The three principal nationalities that they represent are Russians, Spaniards—I am talking now about the anarchist group—and the Italians, mixed up with some Germans. There are a few radical Irishmen and Englishmen and a few Americans. There are very few of these English-speaking people with the exception of—well, there is a very small percentage of them that mix up with the real anarchistic groups.

Senator NELSON. Are there many Americans mixed up with them?

Mr. TUNNEY. Very few.

* * * * *

(The following excerpts from the testimony of Mr. Archibald E. Stevenson, in Volume II of the hearings before the same subcommittee, entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda," were ordered inserted in this record:)

[From testimony taken on Wednesday, January 22, 1919, pages 2715, 2716, 2717, and 2720 :]

Mr. STEVENSON. * * * With the declaration of war by the United States the raison d'être for the Emergency Peace Federation and the American Neutral Conference Committee ceased to exist, and they became defunct.

However, the movement continued to become more radical, and on August 4, 1917, the People's Council of America for Democracy and Peace was organized, with offices at 2 West Thirteenth Street, New York City.

Among the officers and executive committee are found Louis P. Lochner, Lella Faye Secor, Rebecca Shelley, Scott Nearing, Jacob Panken—who, by the way, is an extremely radical speaker, and a judge of the municipal court in New York City; Aigernon Lee, socialist alderman, New York City; Max Eastman; Emily Greene Balch; Judah L. Magnes; Morris Hillquit; Eugene V. Debs, who is now serving a sentence for violation of the espionage act; Irving St. John Tucker, who was just convicted with Victor Berger for violation of the same act; and the treasurer of this organization is David Starr Jordan.

The advent of this organization was hailed with enthusiasm by the German propagandists, and wide publicity was given to it in the German organs, such as Issues and Events, The Fatherland, etc.

The object, of course, was to discourage the military activities of the United States and to bring about peace.

In a telegram which was sent by Lella Faye Secor to President Wilson they stated that their membership is 1,800,000.

Senator NELSON. Evidently these organizations were all in opposition to Gen. Pershing's organization over in France?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is certainly the impression that one might get, Senator.

This telegram to President Wilson states:

"The organizing committee of the People's Council of America, now representing 1,800,000 constituents, believe that a combination of world events makes it imperative that Congress speak in no uncertain terms on the question of peace and war."

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the date of that telegram?

Mr. STEVENSON. This was in August, 1917.

Senator NELSON. After we entered the war?

Senator WOLCOTT. After Congress had spoken.

Senator NELSON. Yes; we spoke in April, did we not?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON (continuing reading):

"The eminent position of our country among the Allies and the democratic members of our Government, and the lives and the future happiness of the young manhood of our Nation all demand that Congress should no longer remain silent and inactive on what is now the supreme interest of mankind, how to bring a just and lasting peace into the world. * * *

"The Russian people are united for peace, based on the formula which is gaining acceptance everywhere: No forcible annexations, no punitive indemnities, and free development for all nationalities. * * *"

Senator WOLCOTT. They might also have added: "And victory for Germany?"

Mr. STEVENSON (continuing reading):

"Thus we have the representative assemblies of Russia, Germany, and England debating peace terms while only the American Congress remains silent in this fateful war.

"Forward-looking men and women throughout the world are looking expectantly to Congress. Democracy is shamed by your silence."

That was a telegram addressed by this organization to President Wilson personally. This organization is still in operation, and they held a dinner last Monday evening in New York City, at which Scott Nearing presided, and they determined to flood the country with handbill propaganda, because their literature has been denied the use of the mails.

Senator WOLCOTT. What have they in mind now? What is the nature of their propaganda now?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are taking up the league of nations. They are seeking the amnesty of all political prisoners. They do not want any military establishment here. It is a very mixed type of propaganda. I do not know exactly what they are doing.

Senator KING. It is practically the overthrow of our republican form of government, and the establishment of a—

Senator NELSON. Bolshevik government?

Senator KING. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are a large number of persons connected with this organization that sympathize with the Bolshevik and Soviet form of government.

Senator KING. Class government is what they want.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think we shall have to wait until we see their propaganda before we know exactly what they are doing.

Senator WOLCOTT. There's no telling what they are going to do?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think so.

The outgrowth of this People's Council was the Liberty Defense Union, with offices at 138 West Thirteenth Street, New York City, in which there is a curious mixture of intelligentsia and anarchists, radical socialists and—

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you men by "intelligentsia"—intellectuals?

Mr. STEVENSON. Intellectuals.

Senator NELSON. Senator, it means those anarchists who confine their operations to brain storms and not to physical force.

Mr. STEVENSON. Among the members of this organization were the Rev. John Haynes Holmes; Scott Nearing; Elizabeth Gurley Flinn, who is well known as an I. W. W.; Max Eastman; Kate Richards O'Hare—and, by the way, there is an extremely interesting connection. Kate Richards O'Hare is now serving a sentence for violation of the espionage act, but she was an associate of Nicholas Lenine in the International Bureau, the People's House, in Brussels before the war, in 1914.

Senator WOLCOTT. This question has been running through my mind, Mr. Stevenson: Is it not a fact that these people, after all their efforts and agitation and the expenditure of a great deal of labor and emotional energy, after all did not make any kind of an impression at all on the plain, common-sense American people—speaking by and large, I mean; they did not make any dents, did they?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think if you really mean the American people, I should say no, Senator.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is what I mean. I mean the ordinary American citizen.

Mr. STEVENSON. But it is a fact that—

Senator WOLCOTT. Of course, they can make some trouble here and there in spots; but, taking the great body of the American people, were they not too level headed to be influenced by this outfit?

Mr. STEVENSON. We must remember, Senator, that the American people—and by that I mean really American people—are not present in very large numbers in our industrial centers. They have made a very great impression on the foreign element, which we will develop in the progress of the radical movement.

I have brought in this pacifist movement in this way because of its direct connection with the subsequent radical movement, which is the thing which is of most importance before the country to-day.

In connection with this Liberty Defense Union, Amos Pinchot was also a member; Eugene V. Debs; Henry Wadsworth Dana, a late professor of Columbia University; David Starr Jordan; Abram Shiplacoff, a Socialist assemblyman in New York; James H. Maurer, of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor; and a large number of other persons of similar character.

The result of the Ford peace mission was the establishment of an international committee of women for permanent peace, which was organized at The Hague in 1915. They organized a special branch for the United States and that branch had a subsidiary in New York City, which is now known as the Women's International League.

It is rather interesting to note that at a meeting held on the 28th of November in New York City by this league, among the other literature which was disseminated was a pamphlet by a man known as Louis T. Fraina, entitled "Bolshevism Conquers," and the meeting resulted in a riot by some unattached soldiers that did not like the general tenor of the meeting.

Senator NELSON. They broke it up?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mrs. Henry Villard, the mother of Oswald Garrison Villard, was the honorary chairman; Crystal Eastman was the chairman; and Prof. Emily Greene Balch was also a member of that organization.

* * * * *

Before going into the radical movement, I think it might be wise to define the three principal kinds of radical thought which go to make up the radical movement and which are merging in the development of Bolshevism. If you would care for me to give a brief theoretical analysis, I will do so.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but be brief.

Senator KING. Yes; I was just asking a member of the committee here whether that would be relevant to the issues which we were to investigate. Would the radical movement now have anything to do with the German propaganda or the investigation of the activities of the brewers?

Senator NELSON. I think so. I think they are still carrying on that propaganda now.

Senator KING. If that is traceable, of course, to the German propaganda, or is a part of the German propaganda, I think that would be relevant. Otherwise, I do not see its relevancy.

Let me ask you, Mr. STEVENSON, is it your contention that this is a part of the German propaganda?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think it is a result of the German propaganda. I call your attention to these numbers of Issues and Events, which is a propaganda magazine. They begin to give publicity to Leon Trotsky here. [Indicating.] There is a history of Leon Trotsky in this magazine.

Mr. STEVENSON. The corollary of the propaganda, which was mentioned this morning, and in which a large number of the persons engaged in the pacifist organizations have taken part and now take part, is what may be generally classified as the radical movement, which is developing sympathy for the Bolsheviki movement, and which in many quarters constitutes a revolutionary movement among the radical element in this country.

Senator KING. Your contention is that this is the result of German propaganda, had its origin in Germany, and therefore would be properly investigated under the resolution of this committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. The Bolsheviki movement is a branch of the revolutionary socialism of Germany. It had its origin in the philosophy of Marx and its leaders were Germans.

Senator KING. And is this German socialism of this country and Bolshevism of this country the product of or taught by these organizations to which you referred this morning, in part?

Mr. STEVENSON. The membership of those organizations was in large part made up of persons either members of the Socialist Party or in sympathy with it.

Senator NELSON. You mean that the German socialism was imported into this country by these men?

Mr. STEVENSON. By some of these men.

Senator NELSON. That is what I mean.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

* * * * *

Senator OVERMAN. Here is an exhibit that you put in, Mr. STEVENSON, called the California Defense Bulletin, the issue of December 2, 1918. It says:

"THE SPREAD OF BOLSHEVISM.

"Great things are about to happen. In fact something has happened that has sent a thrill of joy through the heart of every true internationalist.

"Germany has followed the example set by Russia; the Kaiser and his militarist gang have been pulled down from their high horses, and the workmen and soldiers have taken over the reins of the government.

"The inspiring news was flashed through the world that the soldiers and sailors had joined the revolution, thus avoiding a bloody and long-drawn civil war. It is apparent that the Russian Bolsheviki had carried on an agitation among the German soldiers as well as among the civilian population, and the results are such that we feel inclined to tip our hats to the Bolsheviki and exclaim: 'Well done, brave soldiers of the class war.'

"But Bolshevism is contagious. It is now reported that a revolution is brewing in Holland. There have been strikes and riots in Switzerland, and in Copenhagen, Denmark. In Sweden there has been a manifesto issued calling the workers and soldiers to unite and organize along the same line as in Russia.

"The writer is acquainted with conditions, and is aware of the sentiment among those opposing the Swedish Army, and it is safe to predict that the transformation, or rather the revolution will be accomplished without much bloodshed. Our Swedish fellow workers have for years carried on a systematic agitation against militarism, and have gone into the barracks and training camps distributing literature—and that they have been successful nobody who knows the real state of affairs can deny. It is only a question of time, and it may be nearer than we can realize when the Swedes will straighten up and throw the profiteers and militarists off their backs. They are slow in starting, but when they set out to do anything, they usually do a perfect job.

"Let the 'patriotic profiteers' howl and shout themselves hoarse. Let them summon all their stony-faced judges and their hypocritical pulpsteers—it will be to no avail. They can not stop the onward march of labor. The day of industrial freedom is drawing near. Get ready and do your part to speed the day."

Does that indicate, taken in connection with what you have referred to in these other publications, that there is an organization in this country, now, to bring about a Bolsheviki revolution?

Mr. STEVENSON. I believe that is the desire of a number of the leaders. I would not want to say it as definitely proved.

Senator OVERMAN. These papers indicate that that is going on now?

Mr. STEVENSON. All of these papers seem to indicate that.

The other publications of the Socialist Labor Party are the following newspapers: Arbetaren (Swedish), Volksfreund und Arbeiter-Zeitung (German), Proletarets (Lettish), A Munkas (Hungarian), Radnucka Borba (South Slavonian).

I believe they are also planning to have a Jewish paper.

Senator NELSON. They are carrying on this propaganda?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. So that it looks as if it were nearly world-wide—this socialism and Bolshevism and syndicalism. This appears to show that this propaganda is prevalent throughout the whole world, advocating a revolution in every country in the world—even in Sweden and Switzerland?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

The prosecution of the I. W. W. enlisted the sympathy and support of the Socialist Party of America. This was shown by an interesting leaflet printed in Yiddish, which was picked up in the I. W. W. hall, 74 St. Mark's Place, New York, in the middle of December last year. The translation of it is as follows:

"Socialists attention:

"The National Executive Committee of the Socialist Party not long ago declared at a session that the socialist party repeat the declaration of support of all the economic organizations of the working class and declares that listings, deportations and persecutions of the I. W. W. constitute an attack upon every American working man.

"And we call attention to the fact that the charges against the I. W. W. on the ground that they burnt crops and forests and destroyed a lot of property having been submitted to a legal test turned out to be all lies.

"The socialist party has always lent its material and moral support to organized labor everywhere, and whenever attacked by the capitalistic class, whatever was the character of the organizations. We therefore pledge ourselves to support the I. W. W.'s who are to be tried at Chicago and other places, asking for a fair trial and without prejudice, and we ask our members to do everything in their power to help the I. W. W. by informing the public of the true facts, and also to refute the falsehoods and misinformation wherewith the capitalist press poisons and prejudices public sentiment against these workers who are chosen for destruction just as other workmen and leaders have been repeatedly doomed to destruction by the same capitalists.

"Socialists collect funds and send to the I. W. W.

"Bring the matter up in your local organizations and branch meetings and ask them to send two delegates to the I. W. W. Defense Committee that meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. 74 St. Mark's Place, New York.

"All contributions are sent by the above mentioned address to the general office at Chicago.

"I. W. W. Defense Committee, 1001 West Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

"All checks to be made payable to W. D. Haywood, general secretary treasurer.

"Greetings of the I. W. W. Defense Committee of New York."

That centers attention on the Socialist Party in America and on socialism in general.

I should like to point out that socialism may be divided roughly into two principal kinds, one of which is the conservative evolutionary branch, which is sometimes known as the opportunist or possibilist, which desires to bring about its purpose through parliamentary action and the power of the ballot. The second branch, which is the revolutionary socialism, otherwise called impossibilist, is the official German socialism, and is the father of the Bolsheviki movement in Russia, and consequently the radical movement which we have in this country to-day has its origin in Germany.

Senator NELSON. Is that a part of their knltmr?

Mr. STEVENSON. It was one of the manifestations of their kultur, I believe.

Senator OVERMAN. You used the word "impossibilist." Why do they call it that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Because they found it impossible to cooperate with existing forms of government.

Senator OVERMAN. And they wanted to tear down the existing form of government?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

The capture of the Socialist Party in America in April, 1917, by the revolutionary socialist element is of particular interest because the members of the committee which brought in the majority report, the committee on war and militarism of that convention, had for its leader Kate Richards O'Hare, and Mr. Victor Berger was a member of that committee. Both of these persons were delegates from the United States to the International Socialist Bureau at Brussels, which carried out its world-wide propaganda from the People's House in Brussels. Representatives from other countries were Nicholas Lenine, the leader of Russian Bolshevism, and Rosa Luxemburg.

Senator NELSON. Lately deceased?

Mr. STEVENSON. Lately deceased; who was one of the leaders of the German Bolshevik element known as the Spartacus group, and Karl Liebknecht.

Senator OVERMAN. He is also deceased?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; he is also deceased.

Senator OVERMAN. Was Berger in the same convention with Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; he was a delegate to the same bureau, and represented the United States.

Senator NELSON. Oh, he belonged to the same group.

Senator OVERMAN. I know he did; but I did not know that he had attended the convention over there with them.

Mr. STEVENSON. The adoption of the majority report of the committee on war and militarism at that convention resulted in the withdrawal from the party of the conservative element, or the evolutionary socialists, such as Charles Edward Russell and John Spargo, who have since done valuable service to the Government in the prosecution of the war.

Senator OVERMAN. Where was that convention held?

Mr. STEVENSON. At St. Louis.

Senator OVERMAN. When?

Mr. STEVENSON. April 7 to 14, 1917.

Senator OVERMAN. Messrs. Russell and Spargo quit when they adopted those resolutions?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And did valuable service for the Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

At this convention the following resolution was adopted:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the socialist party being the political arm of the working class in its fight for industrial freedom, and its power resting mainly in its clear-cut, specific declaration of political and economic principles, rather than in the number of votes passed for party candidates, and the purpose of the socialist movement being the emancipation of the working class from economic servitude, rather than the election to office of candidates, it is, therefore, declared to be the sense of this convention that all state organizations facing the solution of this question be urged to remember that to fuse or to compromise is to be swallowed up and utterly destroyed; that they be urged to maintain the revolutionary position of the socialist party and maintain in the utmost possible vigor the propaganda of socialism, unadulterated by association of office seekers, to the end that the solidarity of the working class, the principles of international socialism may continue to lay the foundations for the social revolution.

"The social revolution, not political office, is the end and aim of the socialist party. No compromise, no political trading."

[From testimony taken on Thursday, January 23, 1919, pages 2751, 2752, 2753-2772, and 2776-2779:]

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Stevenson, will you now resume, please, where you left off last night?

Mr. STEVENSON. If I remember correctly, I was just giving an illustration of the socialist expressions from the Radical Review of July, 1918.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is that magazine published?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is published in New York, Senator, by the Radical Review Publishing Association, 202 East Seventeenth Street, New York City.

Senator OVERMAN. Has it a large circulation?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know what the circulation of it is. It is gotten up in very good style and has no advertisements. It is circulated at all of the radical meetings. At any of the meetings you attend you will pick up a copy of this magazine.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know who is financing all of these associations of the Bolsheviki, the Socialists, and so on?

Mr. STEVENSON. I was coming to that with regard to the Bolsheviki, Senator. Senator OVERMAN. All right; do not let me anticipate, then. Just go ahead.

Mr. STEVENSON (reading):

"True to the dictate of necessity, it flies the red flag of international socialism"—

This is referring to the Socialist Party—

"proclaiming the identity of the workers' interests the world over, recognizing only one enemy, the international bourgeoisie, and substituting the national particularism of an obsolete competitive capitalism with the international solidarity of socialism."

Senator OVERMAN. It seems that they have a common flag, and that is the red flag. That is the I. W. W. and the socialists; have they all a common flag?

Mr. STEVENSON. They have.

Senator OVERMAN. And that is the red flag?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the red flag.

Senator OVERMAN. Each one of these organizations carries the red flag?

Mr. STEVENSON. All of them.

And here is the epitome of the whole thing:

"The red flag of the Industrial Republic is expressive of all the slumbering and vital forces in society making for progress and true civilization; it is a banner proclaiming and symbolizing the noble ideal of social fraternity and industrial equality. The ultimate triumph of the proletarian armies fighting under the red flag, therefore, marks the dawn of the universal brotherhood and of the cooperative commonwealth."

* * * * *

Mr. STEVENSON. The Anarchist element in this country has always been a small one, but a very active and violent group.

They came into prominence again with the declaration of war by the United States and participated in the pacifist movement.

They organized the No Conscription League, with headquarters at 20 East One hundred and twenty-fifth Street, New York City, and from that league they issued the most violent propaganda opposed to conscription. I should like to submit one or two of their leaflets in the record.

A large number of anonymous leaflets were distributed, which were signed "Anarchist," and by the underground pass. Among the assistants of Emma Goldman and Berkman were M. Elinore Fitzgerald, Carl Newlander, Walter Merchant, and W. P. Bales.

I might say that the official publication of the Anarchist was Mother Earth.

Senator OVERMAN. Where was that published?

Mr. STEVENSON. In New York City.

Senator NELSON. What is the title of that—Mother Earth?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mother Earth.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is the editor of that magazine?

Mr. STEVENSON. Emma Goldman. It is still being published, although it is not coming out now in regular issues. She is confined in prison for the violation of the espionage act, I believe.

Senator OVERMAN. Was she tried under the espionage act after she was tried under the conspiracy act?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

The anarchists have organized a school known as the Ferrer Modern School, with headquarters at Stelton, N. J., but they have branches in most of the cities of the United States.

In connection with this school, I must call attention to the organization of a school for children now being conducted. The head of this movement is Mr. Leonard D. Abbott.

On the trial of Emma Goldman and Berkman, Mr. Abbott was called to testify as to the character of Emma Goldman and Berkman, and in the course of the examination he was asked:

"Q. Does the Ferrer School teach children to disobey the laws of the country?"

To which he replied:

"It teaches them to criticize all laws, and to prepare themselves for a free society.

"Q. When you speak of criticizing laws, do you include the laws of this government?"

"A. Yes."

Senator OVERMAN. What is the extent of those schools?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are carrying on these schools in a great many centers.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they night schools?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; that particular school is a colony, to which these children go.

Senator OVERMAN. I understand they have other schools?

Mr. STEVENSON. They have courses of lectures.

One New York branch of the Ferrer School has its headquarters at Pythian Hall, 1914 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Senator NELSON. I suppose they have night schools for adults?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; the school is a regular school for teaching anarchy to children as well as adults.

Senator NELSON. I mean, they have night schools for adults in that line?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not sure whether the Ferrer School has. I am sorry to say that I can not enlighten you on that point, but they give a series of lectures.

It might be of interest to give you a few of the titles:

On November 17, 1918, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn lectures on "Economic reconstruction." She is an I. W. W., as well as a sympathizer of the "Anarchist."

On Sunday, November 24, "The spirit of the mob, a factor in revolution," by J. Edward Morgan.

December 1, "The anarchist's relation to the law," by Lola Ridge; and similar lectures are carried on in New York.

Senator OVERMAN. Are any of these people educated people?

Mr. STEVENSON. One of the lecturers here is Hutchins Hapgood, who is a brother of Norman Hapgood.

Senator NELSON. He is one of their lecturers?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

The interesting feature of the anarchist movement is that it was originally associated with Karl Marx in the First International; that was the International Working Men's Association, which was the first attempt to gather the radicals of all countries into one party which would direct the movement in foreign nations and which would attempt to bring about the results sought.

The anarchists were admitted to that movement. As time went on, however, the socialists rather got away from the radical thought of the German official socialism, and finally the anarchists were expelled, in 1872.

An interesting feature of the International, however, at the present time, is that when the war broke out in 1914 the International Working Men's Association broke up, because a number of the socialist groups in their respective countries supported their governments, notably the German socialists; and, for a time, it appeared that the socialist movement had received its death blow. But the length of the war, the extraordinary sacrifices of the peoples, and the economic burdens that have been imposed, have revived socialist movements, and consequently we find the Bolsheviki of Russia setting for themselves the task of reconstructing the International.

The Bolsheviki are simply the modern manifestation of official German socialism, to which has been added some of the principles and tactics of syndicalism.

Senator OVERMAN. And they carry the red flag?

Mr. STEVENSON. And they carry the red flag.

The interest of Russia to the United States is the fact that they have determined to revive the International, and that means that they are sending their missionaries into all parts of the world.

It was through their influence that the German Spartacus group, headed by Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, got their start.

Their activities in Argentine have been prominent in the daily papers.

It is particularly interesting to note, also, that a very large area in Mexico is now in control of the Bolsheviki—a matter which, I think, has not been generally known—and that the propaganda of the Industrial Union of North and South America, which it is called, is being circulated in New York City and in other cities of the United States, printed in Russian for the benefit of the Russian immigrants and Russian Jewish immigrants to this country.

I have a translation of this. It is written by John Sennzott. It sounds rather German to me, but I do not know anything about him.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; it sounds German rather than Russian.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. What parts of Mexico do you refer to, Mr. Stevenson?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yucatan and the adjoining States.

Just to illustrate what they are telling these people in this country, I quote:

"When a man wants a house, he goes to the Building Committee. Possibly he is told there is an empty house at such and such a place. If he does not like it, he is registered, and when his turn comes, he is built a house according to his wishes."

In other words, they do not use any money, and everything is done on a co-operative basis.

Senator NELSON. By the government?

Mr. STEVENSON. By the Soviet government.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The interesting feature of the Bolsheviki movement is that every one of these currents that we have spoken of is now cooperating with the Bolsheviki emissaries. We have several avowed agents of the Bolsheviki government here—avowed propagandists.

Senator NELSON. In this country; operating here?

Mr. STEVENSON. In this country; operating to-day.

Senator NELSON. Can you give us the names of them?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. Two of them are American citizens. One is John Reed, a graduate of Harvard University.

Senator NELSON. You don't say?

Mr. STEVENSON. And, by the way, he is a descendant of Patrick Henry. He is now under indictment, but has not yet been tried, for violation of the espionage act.

I will read from some of his speeches to give you an illustration of the type of propaganda which he is spreading.

Senator OVERMAN. Are these people financed by the Russian Bolsheviki?

Mr. STEVENSON. I might say that we have found money coming into this country from Russia. Money has come into this country to the head of the Finnish branch of Bolsheviki movement in this country, Sanitori Nourotava; and there is reason to believe that money has come in from other sources. Some of these matters are now being investigated, and it would not be wise to make the names of the people or the matter public.

Senator OVERMAN. You said there were two Americans; one is Reed, who is the other?

Mr. STEVENSON. One is Reed and the other is Albert Rhys Williams.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is he from?

Mr. STEVENSON. He is from New York, I think. I do not know where he came from; he is an American citizen, I know. He was a newspaper man. I believe he was a correspondent in Russia before we entered the war. I offer, as an illustration, a book or pamphlet published by The Rand School of Social Science, by Albert Rhys Williams, entitled "The Bolsheviks and the Soviets." That is an exposition of the splendid conditions in Russia under the Soviet form of government.

The Russian Bolsheviks have flooded America with propaganda literature, of which an example is "A letter to American working men from the Socialist Soviet Republic of Russia, by Nikolai Lenin," published by The Socialist Publication Society, 431 Pulaski Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., in December, 1918. It is an appeal to the American working men to straighten up and throw off the incubus of capital and to join the ranks of the Soviet government. The Rand School of Social Science has published—and these are in English—articles by Nikolai Lenin, entitled "The Soviets at Work." They are very extremely interesting documents and very appealing.

A large number of documents are printed in Russian, Yiddish, Finnish, and the various other languages which are spoken by large groups of our foreign immigrants in this country; and besides all this, we find that the Socialist papers, almost without exception, encourage and support this movement.

Senator OVERMAN. Would it be difficult for us to get a list of all such papers and pamphlets published, and have it put in the record?

Mr. STEVENSON. It would be quite a difficult task. In the first place, the means of the Government for collecting these papers, books, pamphlets, etc., are rather limited at the present time. They are scattered all over the United States.

Senator OVERMAN. Is any of this propaganda going through the South?

Mr. STEVENSON. Why, not so much; at least, not so much has come to our attention. I might call attention to the New England Leader, published in Boston and Fitchburg, Mass., for November 23, 1918, which has an interesting article on the first page, entitled "Capitalism fast tottering to fall—Smug capitalists of this Nation will lose their crowns as soon as the spirit of the proletariat of Germany is contracted by the American workers," and the heading is "The people's hour has arrived."

Senator OVERMAN. Where is that from?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is from Boston and Fitchburg, Mass. I am sorry that I can not call your attention to all the interesting articles in these various papers.

Senator NELSON. Have you got any Finnish paper there?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have. Here is a Finnish paper [exhibiting].

Senator NELSON. Where is it published?

Mr. STEVENSON. Published in Astoria, Oreg. It is a very prosperous-looking paper, published in three sections, and the name is Toveri. It has in English in the upper right-hand corner "The circulation of the Toveri is greater than the combined circulation of all other newspapers printed in Astoria." It is a very substantial sheet.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it printed in English?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; that is Finnish. I submit now copies of various Socialistic newspapers from various parts of the country. You might be interested to look some of those over. Now, here is a paper in English, entitled International Weekly, with a subheading "Organ of the social revolution." That is published in Seattle, Wash. Another one is entitled "Seattle Daily Call. To carry truth to the people."

Senator OVERMAN. Is that in English?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that is in English. I am only bringing these to your attention as scattered illustrations of the type of publications printed.

Senator NELSON. Can you give us any information about the activities of these extreme radicals in this country; where they have operated, and what they have done, or undertaken to do?

Mr. STEVENSON. Up to the present time, so far as actual proof is concerned, their activities are largely propaganda, the holding of large numbers of meetings, and the distribution of radical literature.

Senator OVERMAN. Pamphlets and newspapers?

Mr. STEVENSON. Pamphlets, newspapers, books, and hand bills. For instance, one of the methods was to print a leaflet calculated to disturb the mind of the reader, which was put into the mail boxes of a very large number of tenement houses—stuffed in the various mail boxes—entitled "Why you should be a socialist," by Theresa S. Malkiel, who, by the way, was a member of several of the pacifist societies that we spoke of yesterday.

Immediately after the signing of the armistice there was a tremendous outcropping of this propaganda. The number of meetings doubled, and one of the first meetings of interest was held on November 15, 1918, by the Yorkville agitation committee (Yorkville being a part of New York City). Comrade Patrick Quinlan, who is known for his connection with the I. W. W., and who has served a sentence for his activities with the I. W. W. in Paterson, N. J., made a speech that night, in which he said:

"Do not allow the capitalists to keep the Army in Europe for the purpose of shooting down your fellow laboring men in Germany and Russia. Do not trust Lloyd George any more than you trust the Professor. The red flag is flying over nearly all of Europe; it will soon fly in France, and spread across the English Channel, and eventually will fly over this city and the White House, when the Republic of Labor of the World is proclaimed."

At a meeting held on January 10, 1919, at the Labor Lyceum, 949 Willoughby Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. John Reed, who is the——

Senator OVERMAN. The Harvard graduate?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; the Harvard graduate, and who is in this country as the consul general of the Soviet Republic, stated, among other things——

Senator OVERMAN. That is not recognized, though?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; not recognized. He says:

"My family came to this country, both branches, in 1607; one of my ancestors was Patrick Henry, who signed the Declaration of Independence; another of my ancestors was a general under George Washington; and another a colonel on the northern side in the Civil War. I have a brother, a major in the Aviation Corps, now in France, and I am a voter and a citizen of the United States; and I claim the right to criticise the government as much as I please. I criticise the form of it because I claim that it is not a democratic enough government for me. I want a more democratic government. I consider the Soviet government in Russia a more democratic government at the present time than our own government."

He goes on in a very long speech, the tenor of which is to justify the position and the activities of the Soviet government, and expressing the highest praise for it. He goes on further to say:

"Now, this war, which is supposed to have been finished up now, was supposed to be a conflict between two ideas—democracy and autocracy. Well, the war is finished, comrades, and where in Hell is the democracy? Now, in New York City free speech is suppressed; Socialists are not allowed to meet; the red flag is banned; periodicals are barred from the mails, and all the evidences of Prussianism appear."

I might point out another dangerous feature of this thing.

Maj. HUMES. It would suggest that the whole speech be put into the record. I have glanced over it myself. It has only been referred to, but I believe it is an interesting outline of the whole plan of their activities.

Senator OVERMAN. Let it go in.

Mr. STEVENSON. The thing that I was going to mention is that a lot of educated people, particularly a number of educated and cultured women, who have taken an interest in what is known as "liberal ideas," have, as a form of entertainment, the inviting of John Reed and others to come and address them on afternoons.

Senator OVERMAN. That is the man who made this speech?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

(The speech referred to is here printed in the record, as follows:)

Comrades and friends: I am just told that there is an order from the police that we are not to criticise at this meeting the United States Government or the Allies. Now I was arrested and indicted some two months ago for criticizing the intervention of the Allies in Russia. Since that time not socialist papers but bourgeois papers, the Nation, the Dial, the Public, and the New Republic, the Evening Post, Jane Addams, Senator Hiram Johnson, Senator Borah, and other members of Congress have said a damned sight worse things than I have, and nobody dared either arrest or indict them. I am obliged to conclude from that that these persecutions are directed against socialism. Now it evidently has not come to the attention of the gentleman who gave that request from the police that according to my information the Attorney General of the United States has ruled that criticism of the allies does not come under the Espionage Act, for the simple reason that we have no treaties of alliance with any European power at the present moment, and the foreign nations, we can criticise them all we please.

Now, I am an American, and my family has been here a good deal longer than the families of any police. My family came to this country, both branches, in 1607. One of my ancestors was Patrick Henry, who signed the Declaration of Independence. Another of my ancestors was a General under George Washington, and another a Colonel on the Northern side in the Civil War, now in France, and I am a voter and a citizen of the United States, and I claim the right to criticise the government as much as I please.

I criticise the form of it. I criticise the form of it because I claim that it is not a democratic enough government for me. I want a more democratic government. I consider the Soviet Government of Russia a more democratic government at the present time than our own government, and Col. William Royce Thompson, who is a millionaire, said the same thing three months ago, and nobody dared touch him. Now I charge agencies of our government with keeping from the people of the United States the truth about Russia, and Senator Hiram Johnson said the same thing the other day in Congress. We have also agencies of our government which have not only kept the truth from our people, but they have given out information about Russia which is not true, and I refer here to the Sisson documents particularly, proving that Lenine and Trotzky received German gold, and I tell the people in this hall assembled, and the people of the United States, and the Senate of the United States, that proof will be offered in Congress within ten days, and it is there now, that proof will be offered that the Sisson documents are largely forgeries. I claim that the statement of our government, which was given by Chairman Hitchcock to the United States Senate, to the effect that our troops were welcomed by the people at Archangel and Vladivostok is false, and the agents of our government know that it is false. We were not welcome in either Archangel or Vladivostok and I don't mean only our own troops but all the Allies, and I say here that the Allied troops, British, French, and Japanese, when they landed at Vladivostok they shot in the streets hundreds of Soviet troops, blew down buildings, put the Soviet government in jail; that when it was over a funeral procession of the working people, 20,000 strong, went through the streets carrying the coffins containing their dead, which they laid down in front of the British Consulate, from which machine guns had played on the people. They made speeches saying they would never forget their dead, and there, surrounded by machine guns and artillery, they were about to leave.

There were American cruisers in the harbor. It was the 4th of July, and the American cruisers flew the American flag. One of the speakers said to the people: "See; to-day America celebrates the anniversary of her independence. Let us go and appeal to America so that the Americans on this, their day of independence, will recognize that we are struggling for freedom." And they carried those coffins up the hill and laid them down on the sidewalk in front of the American Consulate, and asked that we say a word for them. And five days later the United States Marines landed and three weeks later they were shooting down Russians without a Declaration of War.

I want to point out another thing, and charge, as Johnson has charged in the Senate of the United States—as Senator Hiram Johnson has charged in the Senate of the United States—and the Dial, the Nation, the Public, the New Republic, and the Evening Post have charged the same thing, that our government in sending troops to Russia without a declaration of war has violated the Constitution of the United States and has committed an illegal act, and I charge that same thing here tonight.

Now I want to point out to you what is being done in the Baltic provinces by the Allies, particularly by the English. The English have taken under their protection the so-called governments of the Baltic provinces. Those governments which were set up by who? By the people of the Baltic Provinces? No. By the officials of Kaiser Wilhelm; and those are the governments that the British government is taking under its protection.

I also want to call your attention to the despatches which have been coming through and which have not been denied, that the British authorities have told the Germans to resist the onward march of the Bolsheviks, the Lettish, the Esthonian, and the Lithuanian people who are trying to win back their own country from the tyranny of German barons who have terrorized the Baltic provinces for centuries. There is a very important thing for you to remember, and that is that what the Allies are doing at the present time in the Baltic provinces—and I don't say our own government, because our government has nothing to do with this—but what the Germans, the English, and the French are doing is carrying out the provisions of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk which the Germans imposed upon the Russian Baltic provinces—a treaty at which the whole allied world, including us here in America, threw up its hands in horror, such were the conditions imposed upon the Baltic provinces. And now the allies, without any further delay at all, are imposing these same conditions, or trying to impose them, upon the Baltic provinces, and the only reason they cannot do so is that there is an international red army of Estonians, Letts, Lithuanians, and Russians, who are resisting them to the last.

Now this war, which is supposed to have been finished by now, was supposed to be a conflict between two ideals, democracy and autocracy. Well, the war is finished, comrades, and where in hell is the democracy? Now in New York City free speech is suppressed, Socialists are not allowed to meet, the red flag is banned, periodicals are barred from the mails, and all the evidences of Prussianism appear. I want to ask you, if you know anything about imperial Germany, if you had ever been to a meeting in Germany, a political meeting? Absolutely the same phenomenon is here. The Chief of Police comes to tell you you can't talk about so-and-so, and 100 cops in the hall! Is that so?

Now the war is ended, but a new war is begun, and this time it IS a war between two ideas for the first time in history. Those two ideas are these: There are two parties. On one side is private property and nationalism, and on the other side is property for the people and internationalism. Now the system of civilization, comrades, under which we live, is bankrupt at the present time. It hasn't got a leg to stand on. It doesn't dare to permit democracy, because if it did it would be voted out of existence. It rests, of course upon words which do no mean what they say, and upon force.

Now in this connection I want to call your attention to a statement of Nicholai Lenine's, which he spoke in the third congress of Soviets, after the disposal of the Constituent Assembly, when the other members were accusing the Bolsheviki of using force. Lenine stood on the platform and said, "We are accused of using force. We admit it. All government is merely organized force in the hands of one class against another; but now, for the first time in history, this organized force is being used by the working class against the capitalist class."

On the night of second Congress of Soviets in Petrograd, when the Bolsheviki insurrection broke out and the Provisional Government fell, the Bolsheviki were in session in a great hall like this one, the Smolny Institute. Through the windows came the sound of cannon fire, and as the evening wore and the success of the Bolsheviki insurrection became apparent, all the other political parties in that convention began to walk out. One after another the leaders walked out and their delegates followed the leaders. And Trotzky, who noticed that among the Bolsheviki delegates who were in the great majority, there were a number of delegates who seemed uneasy and uncertain to see all the other parties leaving, went to the front platform and said, "Let the compromisers go; they are just so much garbage which will be swept into the rubbish-heap of history."

But what I want to tell you most of all is this, that when these compromising parties walked out of the Congress of the Soviets and left the balance, the Bolsheviki, greatly reduced, here and there a man would stand up. One said, "I am for the Estonian Social Democracy; I demand a place on that platform." Another said, "I am from the Lettish Social Democracy; I demand a place on that platform." A third said, "I am from the Lithuanian Social Democracy; I demand a place on that platform." And so it finally came to pass that representatives of the working class from all over Russia came and joined hands with them, and that was the beginning of the Russian international, which was the beginning of the third international of the world's workers.

I was in the Lettish country just after the fall of Rega. I was at the front and saw the Lettish soldiers, who alone of all the 12th Army stood against the Germans, and stood against the Germans until they were cut down, one regiment 3000 to 18, and the reason they stood against the Germans was not because they didn't like the Germans, but because they were revolutionists, and they saw immediately that the Germans were the representatives of a militant capitalism advancing on Russia. The reason I know that was why they stood against the Germans is that when the Allies landed at Archangel and Vladivostok the Corps of the two revolutionary armies sent against the Allies was composed of Letts, which race had already sacrificed their lives so bravely.

On the 10th of November the Bolsheviki controlled the City of Petrograd. Their headquarters was in Smolny Institute, and they were organizing the defence of the City against Kerensky's cossack army which was coming up from the South. They were cut off from communication with the rest of the country. The reactionary central committee of the postal telegraph union, the telephone workers, and the railroad workers had declared against them and the Bolsheviki in the Smolny Institute were cut off from all communication with the rest of Russia and the world. They didn't know how the army would go. Of course they knew the condition of mind of the army. They knew they had the masses of Russian people with them, but didn't know how the thing was actually working out, and couldn't get any information.

In the Duma—on the Nevsky Prospect the Duma was forming what they called a Committee for the Salvation of Country and Revolution. It was composed of the anti-Bolshevik forces and included the compromising socialist party. This Committee for Salvation was in communication with Kerensky and with the rest of Russia and was trying to rouse it against the Bolsheviki. I was in the Duma that afternoon. I left the Smolny about noon. There one man was doing the work of ten, and people were falling down from fatigue, sleeping three or four hours, getting up again and working, and everyone was gloomy and depressed. When I got to the Duma everybody was feeling fine; they thought the Bolsheviki would only last about three hours. We sat there for a while and suddenly I looked out the window down the Nevsky Prospect, and saw coming up a double file of soldiers on bicycles, and I said to myself, "Here is the army, the loyal regiments coming in to crush the Bolsheviki," and I went down. All the town had come out. The soldiers stopped and lined up for a moment's rest in front of the Duma, and after a while people began to ask questions, "What are you?" "Oh, we are the Lettish sharp-shooters." "Where do you come from?" "We come from the front." "What are you going to do here, capture the Smolny Institute and kick out the Bolsheviki?" One Lett said, "Hell, no, we are here to support the Soviet; you go back to the Duma if you want to."

Mr. STEVENSON. An extremely interesting bit of propaganda, and one which has been used by all of the Bolsheviki newspapers, is a letter addressed to President Wilson from the Russian Soviet Government, and signed by the "People's Commissary of Foreign Affairs, Tchichtherin," which was delivered through the Norwegian Embassy to President Wilson October 24, 1918.

Senator NELSON. Is it a long letter?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is a very long thing, but it is a matter of great interest. It is an extremely well-written document, and extremely insidious, and for that reason it has been used by the Bolsheviki in this country. It was designed, when sent, to be used as propaganda, and it is interesting that the first English publication of it was in the Nation, which is owned and edited by Oswald Garrison Villard. It was not given out by the Government of the United States. I do not know whether you would like to have that go into the record or not.

Maj. HUMES. It is a matter which I think should go into the record. It gives their view of our form of government, and outlines what they concede to be their plan of government.

Senator OVERMAN. Contrasting theirs with ours?

Maj. HUMES. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Put it in the record.

(The letter referred to is printed in the record as follows:)

To the President of the United States of North America, Mr. Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. PRESIDENT: In your message of January 8th to the Congress of the United States of North America, in the sixth point, you spoke of your profound sympathy for Russia, which was then conducting, single handed, negotiations with the mighty German imperialism. Your program, you declared demands the evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her political development and national policy, and assure her a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. And you added that "the treatment accorded to her by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good-will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy."

The desperate struggle which we were waging at Brest-Litovsk against German imperialism apparently only intensified your sympathy for Soviet Russia, for you sent greetings to the Congress of the Soviets, which under the threat of a German offensive ratified the Brest peace of violence—greetings and assurances that Soviet Russia might count upon American help.

Six months have passed since then, and the Russian people have had sufficient time to get actual tests of your Government's and your Allies' good-will, of their comprehension of the needs of the Russian people, of their intelligent unselfish sympathy. This attitude of your Government and of your Allies was shown first of all in the conspiracy which was organized on Russian territory with the financial assistance of your French Allies and with the diplomatic co-operation of your Government as well—the conspiracy of the Czecho-Slovaks to whom your Government is furnishing every kind of assistance.

For some time attempts had been made to create a pretext for a war between Russia and the United States of North America by spreading false stories to the effect that German war prisoners had seized the Siberian railway, but your own officers and after them Colonel Robbins, the head of your Red Cross Mission, had been convinced that these allegations were absolutely false. The Czecho-Slovak conspiracy was organized under the slogan that unless these misled unfortunate people be protected, they would be surrendered to Germany and Austria; but you may find out, among other sources, from the open letter of Captain Sadoul, of the French Military Mission, how unfounded this charge is. The Czecho-Slovaks would have left Russia in the beginning of the year, had the French Government provided ships for them. For several months we have waited in vain that your Allies should provide the opportunity for the Czecho-Slovaks to leave. Evidently these Governments have very much preferred the presence of the Czecho-Slovaks in Russia—the results show for what object—to their departure for France and their participation in the fighting on the French frontier. The best proof of the real object of the Czecho-Slovak rebellion is the fact that although in control of the Siberian railway, the Czecho-Slovaks have not taken advantage of this to leave Russia, but by the order of the Entente Governments, whose directions they follow, have remained in Russia to become the mainstay of the Russian counter-revolution. Their counter-revolutionary mutiny which made impossible the transportation of grain and petroleum on the Volga, which cut off the Russian workers and peasants from the Siberian stores of grain and other materials and condemned them to starvation—this was the first experience of the workers and peasants of Russia with your Government and with your Allies after your promises of the beginning of the year. And then came another experience: an attack on North Russia by Allied troops, including American troops, their invasion of Russian territory without any cause and without a declaration of war, the occupation of Russian cities and villages, executions of Soviet officials and other acts of violence against the peaceful population of Russia.

You have promised, Mr. President, to co-operate with Russia in order to obtain for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her political development and her national policy. Actually this co-operation took the form of an attempt of the Czecho-Slovak troops and later, in Archangel, Murmansk and the Far East, of your own and your Allies' troops, to force the Russian people to submit to the rule of the oppressing and exploiting classes, whose dominion was overthrown by the workers and peasants of Russia in October, 1917. The revival of the Russian counter-revolution which has already become a corpse, attempts to restore by force its bloody domination over the Russian people—such was the experience of the Russian people, instead of co-operation for the unembarrassed expression of their will which you promised them, Mr. President, in your declarations.

You have also, Mr. President, promised to the Russian people to assist them in their struggle for independence. Actually this is what has occurred: while the Russian people were fighting on the Southern front against the counter-revolution, which has betrayed them to German imperialism and was threatening their independence, while they were using all their energy to organize the defense of their territory against Germany at their Western frontiers, they were forced to move their troops to the East to oppose the Czecho Slovaks who were bringing them slavery and oppression, and to the North—against your allies and your own troops which had invaded their territory, and against the counter-revolutions organized by these troops.

Mr. President, the acid test of the relations between the United States and Russia gave quite different results from those that might have been expected from your message to the Congress. But we have reason not to be altogether dissatisfied with even these results, since the outrages of the counter-revolution in the East and North have shown the workers and peasants of Russia the aims of the Russian counter-revolution, and of its foreign supporters, thereby creating among the Russian people an iron will to defend their liberty and the conquests of the revolution to defend the land that it has given to the peasants and the factories that it has given to the workers. The fall of Kazan, Symbyrsk, Syzran, and Samara should make it clear to you, Mr. President, what were the consequence for us of the actions which followed your promises of January 8th. Our trials helped to create a strongly united and disciplined Red Army, which is daily growing stronger and more powerful and which is learning to defend the revolution. The attitude toward us, which was actually displayed by your Government and by your Allies could not destroy us; on the contrary, we are now stronger than we were a few months ago, and your present proposal of international negotiations for a general peace finds us alive and strong and in a position to give in the name of Russia our consent to join the negotiations. In your note to Germany you demand the evacuation of occupied territories as a condition which must precede the armistice during which peace negotiations shall begin. We are ready, Mr. President, to conclude an armistice on these conditions, and we ask you to notify us when you, Mr. President, and your Allies intend to remove troops from Murmansk, Archangel and Siberia. You refuse to conclude an armistice, unless Germany will stop the outrages, pillaging, etc., during the evacuation of occupied territories. We allow ourselves therefore to draw the conclusion that you and your allies will order the Czecho-Slovaks to return the part of our gold reserve fund which they seized in Kazan, that you will forbid them to continue as heretofore their acts of pillaging and outrage against the workers and peasants during their forced departure (for we will encourage their speedy departure, without waiting for your order).

With regard to other peace terms, namely, that the Governments which would conclude peace must express the will of their people, you are aware that our Government fully satisfies this condition, our Government expresses the will of the Councils of Workmen's, Peasants' and Red Army Deputies, representing at least eighty per cent of the Russian people. This cannot, Mr. President, be said about your Government. But for the sake of humanity and peace we do not demand as a prerequisite of general peace negotiations that all nations participating in the negotiations shall be represented by Councils of People's Commissaries elected at a Congress of Councils of Workmen's, Peasants' and Soldiers' Deputies. We know that this form of Government will soon be the general form, and that precisely a general peace, when nations will no more be threatened with defeat, will leave them free to put an end to the system and the clique that forced upon mankind this universal slaughter, and which will, in spite of themselves, surely lead the tortured peoples to create Soviet Governments, which give exact expression to their will.

Agreeing to participate at present in negotiations with even such Governments as do not yet express the will of the people, we would like on our part to find out from you, Mr. President, in detail what is your conception of the League of Nations, which you propose as the crowning work of peace. You demand the independence of Poland, Serbia, Belgium and freedom for the peoples of Austria-Hungary. You probably mean by this that the masses of the people must everywhere first become the masters of their own fate in order to unite afterwards in a league of free nations. But strangely enough, we do not find among your demands the liberation of Ireland, Egypt, or India, nor even the liberation of the Philippines, and we would be very sorry to learn that these people should be denied the opportunity to participate together with us, through their freely elected representatives, in the organization of the League of Nations.

We would also, Mr. President, very much like to know, before the negotiations with regard to the formation of a League of Nations have begun, what is your conception of the solution of many economic questions which are essential for the cause of future peace. You do not mention the war expenditures—this unbearable burden, which the masses would have to carry, unless the league of nations should renounce payments on the loans to the capitalists of all countries. You know as well as we, Mr. President, that this war is the outcome of the policies of all capitalistic nations, that the governments of all countries were continually piling up armaments, that the ruling groups of all civilized nations pursued a policy of annexations, and that it would, therefore, be extremely unjust if the masses, having paid for these policies with millions of lives and with economic ruin, should yet pay to those who are really responsible for the war a tribute for their policies which resulted in all these countless miseries.

We propose therefore, Mr. President, the annulment of the war loans as the basis of the League of Nations. As to the restoration of the countries that were laid waste by the war, we believe it is only just that all nations, should aid for this purpose, the unfortunate Belgium, Poland, and Servia, and however poor and ruined Russia seems to be, she is ready on her part to do everything she can to help these victims of the war, and she expects that American capital, which has not at all suffered from this war and has even made many billions in profits out of it, will do its part to help these peoples.

But the League of Nations should not only liquidate the present war, but also make impossible any wars in the future. You must be aware, Mr. President, that the capitalists of your country are planning to apply in the future the same policies of encroachment and of super profits in China and in Siberia, and that, fearing competition from Japanese capitalists, they are preparing a military force to overcome the resistance which they may meet from Japan. You are no doubt aware of similar plans of the capitalists ruling circles of other countries with regard to other territories and other peoples. Knowing this, you will have to agree with us that the factories, mines and banks must not be left in the hands of private persons, who have always made use of the vast means of production created by the masses of the people to export products and capital to foreign countries in order to reap super profits in return for the benefits forced on them, their struggle for spoils resulting in imperialistic wars. We propose, therefore, Mr. President, that the League of Nations be based on the expropriation of the capitalists of all countries. In your country, Mr. President, the banks and the industries are in the hands of such a small group of capitalists that, as your personal friend, Colonel Robbins, assured us, the arrest of twenty heads of capitalistic cliques and the transfer of the control, which by characteristic capitalistic methods they have come to possess, into the hands of the masses of the people is all that would be required to destroy the principal source of new wars.

If you will agree to this, Mr. President—if the source of future wars will thus be destroyed, then there can be no doubt that it would be easy to remove all economic barriers and that all peoples, controlling their means of production, will be vitally interested in exchanging the things they do not need for the things they need. It will then be a question of an exchange of products between nations, each of which produces what it can best produce, and the League of Nations will be a league of mutual aid of the toiling masses. It will then be easy to reduce the armed forces to the limit necessary for the maintenance of internal safety.

We know very well that the selfish capitalist class will attempt to create this internal menace, just as the Russian landlords and capitalists are now attempting with the aid of American, English, and French armed forces to take the factories from the workers and the land from the peasants. But, if the American workers, inspired by your idea of a League of Nations, will crush the resistance of the American capitalists as we have crushed the resistance of the Russian capitalists, then neither the German nor any other capitalists will be a serious menace to the victorious working class, and it will then suffice, if every member of the commonwealth, working six hours in the factory, spends two hours daily for several months in learning the use of arms, so that the whole people will know how to overcome the internal menace.

And so, Mr. President, though we have had experience with your promises, we nevertheless, accept as a basis your proposals about peace and about a League of Nations. We have tried to develop them in order to avoid results which would contradict your promises, as was the case with your promise of assistance to Russia. We have tried to formulate with precision your proposals on the League of Nations in order that the League of Nations should not turn out to be a league of capitalists against the nations. Should you not agree with us, we have no objection to an "open discussion of your peace terms," as your first point of your peace program demands. If you will accept our proposals as a basis, we will easily agree on the details.

But there is another possibility. We have had dealings with the President of the Archangel attack and the Siberian invasion and we have also had dealings with the President of the League of Nations Peace Program. Is not the first of these—the real President actually directing the policies of the American capitalist government? Is not the American Government rather a Government of the American corporations, of the American industrial, commercial and railroad trusts, of the American banks—in short, a Government of the American capitalists? And is it not possible that the proposals of this Government about the creation of a League of Nations will result in new chains for the peoples, in the organization of an International trust for the exploitation of the workers and the suppression of weak nations? In this latter case, Mr. President, you will not be in a position to reply to our questions, and we will say to the workers of all countries: Beware! Millions of your brothers, thrown at each others throats by the bourgeoisie of all countries are still perishing on the battlefields and the capitalists leaders are already trying to come to an understanding for the purpose of suppressing with united forces those that remain alive, when they call to account the criminals who caused the war!

However, Mr. President, since we do not at all desire to wage war against the United States, even though your Government has not yet been replaced by a Council of People's Commissaries and your post is not yet taken by Eugene Debs, whom you have imprisoned; since we do not at all desire to wage war against England, even though the cabinet of Mr. Lloyd-George has not yet been replaced by a Council of People's Commissaries with MacLean at its head; since we have no desire to wage war against France, even though the capitalist Government of Clemenceau has not yet been replaced by a workmen's Government of Merheim, just as we have concluded peace with the imperialist government of Germany, with Emperor Wilhelm at its head, whom you, Mr. President, hold in no greater esteem than we, the Workmen's and Peasant's Revolutionary Government hold you, we finally propose to you, Mr. President, that you take up with your Allies the following questions and give us precise and business-like replies: Do the governments of the United States, England and France intend to cease demanding the blood of the Russian people and lives of Russian citizens, if the Russian people will agree to pay them a ransom, such as a man who has been suddenly attacked pays to the one who attacked him? If so, just what tribute do the governments of the United States, England and France demand of the Russian people? Do they demand concessions, that the railways, mines, gold deposits, etc., shall be handed over to them on certain conditions, or do they demand territorial concessions, some part of Siberia or Caucasia, or perhaps the Murmansk coast?

We expect from you, Mr. President, that you will definitely state what you and your Allies demand, and also whether the allowance between your government and the governments of the other entente powers is in the nature of a combination which could be compared with a corporation for drawing dividends from Russia, or does your government and the other governments of the entente powers have each separate and special demands, and what are they? Particularly are we interested to know the demands of your French Allies with regard to the three billions of rubles which the Paris bankers loaned to the Government of the Czar—the oppressor of Russia and the enemy of his own people? And you, Mr. President, as well as your French Allies surely know that even if you and your allies should succeed in enslaving and covering with blood the whole territory of Russia—which will not be allowed by our heroic revolutionary Red Army—that even in that case the Russian people, worn out by the war and not having sufficient time to take advantage of the benefits of the Soviet rule to elevate their national economy, will be unable to pay to the French bankers the full tribute for the billions that were used by the Government of the Czar for purposes injurious to the people. Do your French allies demand that a part of this tribute be paid in installments, and if so, what part, and do they anticipate that their claims will result in similar claims by other creditors of the infamous Government of the Czar which has been overthrown by the Russian people? We can hardly think that your Government and your allies are without a ready answer, when your and their troops are trying to advance on our territory with the evident object of seizing and enslaving our country.

The Russian people through the People's Red Army, are guarding their territory and are bravely fighting against your invasion and against the attack of your Allies. But your Government and the Governments of the other powers of the Entente undoubtedly have well prepared plans, for the sake of which you are shedding the blood of your soldiers. We expect that you will state your demands very clearly and definitely. Should we, however, be disappointed, should you fail to reply to our quite definite and precise questions, we will draw the only possible conclusion—that we are justified in the assumption that your Government and the Governments of your Allies desire to get from the Russian people a tribute both in money and in natural resources of Russia, and territorial concessions as well. We will tell this to the Russian people as well as to the toiling masses of other countries, and the absence of a reply from you will serve for us as a silent reply. The Russian people will then understand that the demands of your Government and of the Governments of your Allies are so severe and vast that you do not even want to communicate them to the Russian Government.

PEOPLE'S COMMISSARY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, TCHITCHERIN.

Mr. STEVENSON. The principal publications of the Bolsheviki in New York City are the Novy Mir—

Senator NELSON. In what language is that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Russian. The Workman and Peasant.

Senator OVERMAN. What does "Novy Mir" mean?

Mr. STEVENSON. The New Era or New Life. These are the accredited official organs in this country of the Bolsheviki government.

The Bolsheviki have organized in this country soviets. Each industrial center in the United States now has its soviet.

Senator NELSON. Is that so?

Mr. STEVENSON. And, of course, the plan of the propagandists is to extend their influence until they can take on the functions of government.

Senator NELSON. What is their system of organization in each case?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is merely the election of delegates to a central committee. That is what the soviet is.

Senator NELSON. Have they not local organizations? Have they not a local government?

Mr. STEVENSON. The central committee is the governing committee; it acts as the government.

Senator NELSON. Consisting of delegates from these various points?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. The idea, then, is to form a government within this Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely.

Senator OVERMAN. And to overthrow this Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely. I think that the record should contain a copy of the constitution of the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic.

Senator OVERMAN. Will you give us the names of some of the heads of this soviet government?

Mr. STEVENSON. In this country?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Those are largely foreigners. They are largely Russians over here now.

Senator NELSON. That constitution ought to go in, Mr. Chairman.

Senator OVERMAN. Let me see that.

Mr. STEVENSON (handing paper to the chairman). You will find some extraordinarily interesting matter there. The disfranchisement of all persons who employ anybody or pay anyone any wages; anyone who does that can not vote in the Soviet government. You will find some very interesting political ideas there.

Senator NELSON. I think that would be a good thing to go into the record.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; this will go in.

(The constitution referred to is printed in the record, as follows:)

[Outside of front cover.]

CONSTITUTION OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERATED SOVIET REPUBLIC.

Since intelligent judgment on the complex problems of Russia requires some knowledge of the purpose and methods of the Soviet Government (which is one of those rare things—a new event in history), we believe that our readers will be glad to have this opportunity to study critically an English translation (taken from a recent issue of the New York Tribune) of the constitution of the Soviets. It has been generally recognized in America that so much progress has been made in Russia in working out this new conception of the state and its government. Even if the present Soviet Government should fall, or should learn by experience to modify some of its methods, the ideas embodied in this document are from henceforth a mighty force to be reckoned with in the world; and the document itself may well come to rank with the great declarations of history. 1918.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERATED SOVIET REPUBLIC.¹

THE SOVIET CONSTITUTION AND DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND DUTIES.

I.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF LABORING HUMANITY.

[Approved by the Commission of the Central Committee for Drafting the Constitution of the Soviets.]

We, the laboring people of Russia, workmen, peasants, cossacks, solders and sailors, united in the councils of the Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasants' and Cossacks' delegates, declare in the persons of our plenipotentiary representatives, who have assembled at the Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets, the following rights and duties of the working and despoiled people:

The economic subjection of the laboring classes by the possessors of the means and instruments of production, of the soil, machines, factories, railways, and raw materials—those basic sources of life—appears as the cause of all sorts of political oppression, economic spoliation, intellectual and moral enslavement of the laboring masses.

The economic liberation of the working classes from the yoke of capitalism represents, therefore, the greatest task of our time, and must be accomplished at all costs.

The liberation of the working classes must and can be the work of those classes themselves, who must unite for that purpose in the Soviets of the Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasants', and Cossacks' delegates.

In order to put an end to every ill that oppresses humanity and in order to secure to labor all the rights belonging to it, we recognize that it is necessary to destroy the existing social structure, which rests upon private property in the soil and the means of production, in the spoliation and oppression of the laboring masses, and to substitute for it a Socialist structure. Then the whole earth, its surface and its depth, and all the means and instruments of production, created by the toll of the laboring classes, will belong by right of common property to the whole people, who are united in a fraternal association of laborers.

Only by giving society a Socialist structure can the division of it into hostile classes be destroyed, only so can we put an end to the spoliation and oppression of men by men, of class by class; and all men—placed upon an equality as to rights and duties—will contribute to the welfare of society according to their strength and capacities, and will receive from society according to their requirements.

The complete liberation of the laboring classes from spoliation and oppression appears as a problem, not locally or nationally limited, but as a world problem and it can be carried out to its end only through the united exertions of workingmen of all lands. Therefore, the sacred duty rests upon the working class of every country to come to the assistance of the workingmen of other countries who have risen against the capitalistic structure of society.

A Dictatorship of the Proletariat.

The working class of Russia, true to the legacy of the Internationale, overthrew their bourgeoisie in October, 1917, and, with the help of the poorest peasantry, seized the powers of government. In establishing a dictatorship of the proletariat and the poorest peasantry, the working class resolved to wrest capital from the hands of the bourgeoisie, to unite all the means of production in the hands of the Socialist state and thus to increase as rapidly as possible the mass of productive forces.

The first steps in that direction were:

Abolition of property in land, declaration of the entire soil to be national property, and the distribution of it to the workmen without purchase money, upon the principle of equality in utilizing it.

Declaration as national property of all forests, treasures of the earth and waters of general public utility, and all the belongings, whether animals or things, of the model farms and agricultural undertakings.

Introduction of a law for the control of workmen and for the nationalization of a number of branches of industry.

Nationalization of the banks, which heretofore were one of the mightiest instruments for the spoliation of society by capital.

Repudiation of the loans which were contracted by the czar's government upon the account of the Russian people.

Arming of the laborers and peasants and disarming of the propertied classes.

Besides all this, the introduction of a universal obligation to work, for the purpose of eliminating the parasitic strata of society, is planned.

As soon as production shall have been consolidated in the hands of the working masses, united in a gigantic association, in which the development of every single individual will appear as the condition for the development of all men; as soon as the old bourgeois state with its classes and class hatred, is definitely superseded by a firmly established Socialist society which rests upon universal labor, upon the application and distribution of all productive forces according to plan, and upon the solidarity of all its members, then, along with the disappearance of class differences, will disappear also the necessity for the dictatorship of the working classes and for state power as the instrument of class domination.

These are the immediate internal problems of the Soviet republic.

The International Policies of the Soviet Republic.

In its relation to other nations the Soviet republic stands upon the principles of the first Internationale, which recognized truth, justice and morality as the foundation of its relations to all humanity, independent of race, religion, or nationality.

The Socialist Soviet republic recognizes that wherever one member of the family of humanity is oppressed all humanity is oppressed, and for that reason it proclaims and defends to the utmost the right of all nations to self-determination and thereby to the free choice of their destiny.

It accords that right to all nations without exception, even to the hundreds of millions of laborers in Asia, Africa, in all colonies and the small countries who, down to the present day, have been oppressed and despoiled without pity by the ruling classes, by the so-called civilized nations.

The Soviet republic has transformed into deeds the principles proclaimed before its existence. The right of Poland to self-determination having been recognized in the first days of the March revolution, after the overturn in October the Soviet republic proclaimed the full independence of Finland and the right of the Ukraine, of Armenia, of all the people populating the territory of the former Russian empire, to their full self-determination.

In its efforts to create a league—free and voluntary, and for that reason all the more complete and secure—of the working classes of all the peoples of Russia, the Soviet republic declared itself a federal republic and offered to the laborers and peasants of every nation the opportunity to enter as members with equal rights into the fraternal family of the Republic of Soviets (through action taken) independently in the plenipotentiary sessions of their Soviets, to any extent and in whatever form they might wish.

The Soviet Republic's Basis of Peace.

The Soviet republic has declared war upon war, not only in words, but also in deeds; and in doing so it formally, and in the name of the working masses of Russia, announced its complete renunciation of all efforts at conquest and annexation, as well as all thought of oppressing small nations. At the same time, the Soviet republic, to prove the sincerity of the purposes, broke openly with the policy of secret diplomacy and secret treaties, and it proposed to all belligerent nations to conclude a general democratic peace without annexations or indemnities, upon the basis of the free self-determination of peoples. That standpoint is still firmly adhered to be the Soviet republic.

Compelled by the policy of violence practised by the imperialisms of all the world, the Soviet republic is marshalling its forces for resistance against the growing demands of the robber packs of international capital, and it looks to the inevitable rebellion of the working classes for the solution of the question of how the nations can live peacefully together. The international Socialist rebellion alone, in which the laboring people of each state overthrow their own imperialists, puts an end to war once for all, and creates the conditions for the full realization of the solidarity of the working people of the entire world.

The Rights and Duties of the Workers.

Taking its stand upon the principles of the Internationale, the Soviet republic recognizes that there can be no rights without duties, and no duties without rights, and, therefore, proclaims at the same time, with the rights of the working classes in a rejuvenated society, the following outline of their duties:

To fight everywhere and without sparing their strength for the complete power of the working classes, and to stamp out all attempts to restore the dominion of the despoilers and oppressors.

To assist with all their strength in overcoming the depression caused by the war and the opposition of the bourgeoisie, and to cooperate in bringing about as speedy a recovery as possible of production in all branches of economy.

To subordinate their personal and group interests to the interests of all the working people of Russia and the whole world.

To defend the republic of the Soviets, the only Socialist bulwark in the capitalistic world, from the attacks of international imperialism without sparing their own strength and even their own lives.

To keep in mind always and everywhere the sacred duty of liberating labor from the domination of capital, and to strive for the establishment of a world-embracing fraternal league of working people.

In proclaiming these rights and duties the Russian Socialist Republic of the Soviets calls upon the working classes of the entire world to accomplish their task to the very end, and in the faith that the Socialist ideal will soon be achieved to write upon their flags the old battle cry of the working people.

Proletarians of all lands unite

Long live the Socialist world revolution!

II.

GENERAL PROVISION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERAL REPUBLIC.

The fundamental problem of the constitution of the Russian Socialist Federal republic involves, in view of the present transition period, the establishment of a dictatorship of the urban and rural proletariat and the poorest peasantry, the power of the pan-Russian Soviet authority, the crushing of the bourgeoisie, the abolition of the spoliation of men by men and the introduction of Socialism in which there will be neither a division into classes nor a state authority.

The Russian republic is the free Socialist society of all the working people of Russia, united in the urban and rural Soviets.

The Soviets of those regions which differentiate themselves by a special form of existence and national character will be united into autonomous regional associations ruled by the sessions of the Soviets of those regions and their own executive organs.

The Soviet associations of the regions participate in the Russian Socialist republic upon the basis of federation, at the head of which stands the pan-Russian session of the Soviets and, in periods between the sessions, the pan-Russian central executive committee.

III.

CONCERNING THE RUSSIAN SOVIETS.

The right to vote and to be elected to the Soviets is enjoyed by the following citizens of the Russian Socialists Soviet republic of both sexes who shall have completed their eighteenth year by the day of election:

All who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and are members of the trades associations, namely:

(a) Laborers and employees of classes who are employed in industry, trade and agriculture.

(b) Peasants and Cossack agricultural laborers who hire no labor.

(c) Employees and laborers in the offices of the Soviet government.

(d) Soldiers of the army and navy of the Soviets.

(e) Citizens of the two previous categories who have to any degree lost their capacity to work.

The following persons enjoy neither the right to vote nor to be voted for, even though they belong to one of the categories enumerated above, namely:

Persons who employ hired labor in order to obtain from it an increase of profits;

Persons who have an income without doing any work, such as interest from capital, receipts from property, and so on.

Private merchants, trade and commercial agents;

Employees of communities for religious worship;

Employees and agents of the former police, the gendarmerie corps and the Ochrana; also members of the dynasty that formerly ruled Russia;

Persons who have in legal form been declared demented or mentally deficient and also deaf and dumb persons;

Persons who have been punished for selfish or dishonorable misdemeanors.

IV-VII.

PRINCIPLES FOR THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE RUSSIAN STATE.

The government is based upon the smallest settlements (villages and hamlets), the inhabitants of which may elect one representative to each 100 persons.

The rural Soviets are under the authority of the Soviets of the Wolosts (districts), and these latter under the Soviets of the Ujesd (larger regions).

The urban and Ujesd Soviets elect delegates to sessions of the government of Oblast Soviets. Each of these bodies chooses independently its own executive committee.

VIII.

CONCERNING THE PAN-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF THE SOVIETS.

The Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets consists of representatives of the urban Soviets (one delegate for each 25,000 voters) and representatives of the government congresses (one delegate for each 125,000 voters).

The Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets will be called together by the Pan-Russian central executive committee at least twice a year.

The extraordinary Pan-Russian Congress will be called together by the Pan-Russian central executive committee upon its own initiative or upon the demand of the Soviets of districts embracing at least one-third of the entire population of the republic.

The Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets elects the central executive committee of not more than 200 members.

The Pan-Russian executive committee is responsible to the Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets.

The Pan-Russian Congress of Soviets is the highest power in the republic. In the period between its sessions that power is represented by the Pan-Russian central executive committee.

Eleven Administrative Departments.

It is further provided that the central executive committee shall be divided into 11 colleges for administrative functions. There are:

Foreign policies.

Defense of the country (army and navy).

Social order and security (militia), census of the people, registration of societies and associations, fire department, insurance, organization of the Soviets.

Justice.

Public economy (with subsections for agriculture, industry, and trade, finances, railways, food supply, state property and construction).

Labor and social welfare.

Education and enlightenment of the people.

Public health.

Post, telegraph and telephone.

Federal and national affairs.

Control and auditing.

Mr. STEVENSON. One could continue to give illustrations of the speeches made, and illustrations of the character of the propaganda; but I hardly think it will be necessary to cumber the record with repetition.

Senator NELSON. So far, with the exception of a few cases, they are all confined to foreigners, are they not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Except that the Socialists approve of that form of government in a great many instances.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. And express sympathy for it in their publications, and are cooperating with the Bolsheviki. A casual glance at some of the Socialist papers will satisfy anyone that that is the case.

Senator NELSON. There is a community of interest?

Mr. STEVENSON. Distinctly. I think that the interesting point about the Bolsheviki, which might be brought out, is that prior to their propaganda we had these different branches of radical thought, having somewhat conflicting principles so that they could not cooperate.

Senator NELSON. Do you mean by that that instead of having all these organizations of various kinds that we have had in this country, the Bolsheviki in Russia have succeeded in concentrating all the lye, one might say, into one system?

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely, and for this reason, that all of the radical people believe that everyone should belong to the proletariat.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Bolsheviki say "Everything should belong to the proletariat; the proletariat should take control now, and we will work out our theory afterwards." That makes a common platform for all of these radical groups to stand on, because the anarchist feels that if the proletariat gets control he can effect his theory, and the same is true of the various other groups of radical thinkers.

Senator NELSON. Then they have really rendered a service to the various classes of reformers and progressives that we have here in this country, have they not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Apparently.

Senator NELSON. In concentrating their doctrines into one formula?

Mr. STEVENSON. They have.

Maj. HUMES. You have outlined in a general way the activities of the radical groups in this country, and from your study of the cause advocated by the radical groups in this country that you have referred to and what they are contending for, and your knowledge of the Soviet government in Russia and the activities in Russia, is it or is it not a fact that the elements that you have referred to in this country are the same elements that are now at war with and fighting in the field against American soldiers in Russia?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are the same element.

Senator NELSON. They are not exactly the same crowd, but they have the same gospel?

Mr. STEVENSON. They are even the same crowd, Senator, because John Reed is the accredited representative of that government.

Senator NELSON. In this country?

Mr. STEVENSON. In this country; and Albert Rhys Williams admits that he is a propagandist for that government in this country.

Senator NELSON. Is Reed the official representative here?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Has he knocked at the door of the State Department?

Mr. STEVENSON. I believe that he tried to. I am not sure. I know that among his effects, however, he had the official forms supplied by the Soviet government for Soviet marriages and divorces, and all that sort of thing.

Maj. HUMES. What are the forms and the requirements for marriages and divorces under the Soviet government in Russia?

Mr. STEVENSON. Simply a statement before the proper commissary that they want to be married or that they want to be divorced.

Senator OVERMAN. Do they have as many wives as they want?

Mr. STEVENSON. In rotation.

Maj. HUMES. Polygamy is recognized, is it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know about polygamy. I have not gone into the study of their social order quite as fully as that.

Senator NELSON. That is, a man can marry and then get a divorce when he gets tired, and get another wife?

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely.

Senator NELSON. And keep up the operation?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether they teach free love?

Mr. STEVENSON. They do.

Maj. HUMES. Can a divorce be secured upon the application of one party to the marriage, or has it to be by agreement?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think by one party.

Maj. HUMES. By either party?

Mr. STEVENSON. By either party.

Maj. HUMES. They can renounce the marital bond at will?

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know whether or not the element that is active in this country is advocating the same thing here in their public speeches, or their literature?

Mr. STEVENSON. In considerable of the literature some of the element has done so. I will not say that all have.

Maj. HUMES. The committee asked you yesterday to rearrange the "Who's Who." Has that work been completed so that it can be submitted to the committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. It has been practically completed, Major.

Maj. HUMES. You have not fully completed it?

Mr. STEVENSON. We will have it completed very shortly. It is more of a task than I realized at first.

Maj. HUMES. But it will be completed for submission for the record later in the day?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. I think that is all I have to ask, unless the committee has something further.

Senator OVERMAN. You think this movement is growing constantly in this country?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think so.

Senator OVERMAN. Rapidly or slowly?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think it is growing rather rapidly, if we can gauge it by the amount of literature that is distributed and the number of meetings held. It is a very indefinite sort of thing. It is extremely difficult to state how effective these sheets are.

Senator OVERMAN. You have not discovered that it is growing among the American population; it is more among the foreigners, is it not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, the Rand School of Social Science publishes all of these works, like the Letters from Lenin, and that sort of thing, and that is made up very largely of American citizens, such as Charles Andrew Beard, Henry Wadsworth Dana, Algernon Lee, and Scott Nearing.

Senator NELSON. Do you regard this propaganda as a menace to our country?

Mr. STEVENSON. Decidedly. I conceive it to be the gravest menace to the country to-day.

Senator OVERMAN. Your idea is that these people are conducting in this country an organization within this country for the overthrow of its Government, carrying the red flag, and with the cry "Down with capitalists" as the principal teaching?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is true.

Senator NELSON. You have given us a good diagnosis. Now, can you give us any remedy or suggest any remedy for it?

Mr. STEVENSON. It strikes me, Senator, that there are several things which might be done.

In the first place, I think that the foreign agitators should be deported. I think the bars should be put up to exclude seditious literature from the country. There is practically no way now to stop this material from coming in.

I think that American citizens who advocate revolution should be punished under a law drawn for that purpose.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you will hear somebody in the Senate talking about freedom of speech, will you not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; but revolution is somewhat different from freedom of speech.

I think, however, that that would not be sufficient. I think that one of the things that must be carried on is a counter-propaganda campaign.

Senator NELSON. An educational campaign?

Mr. STEVENSON. A campaign of education. I think that you must employ the same weapons that they employ.

The thing that has impressed me more than anything else is that you see all of these papers, all of these documents, and you hear of all of these speeches and meetings, and you do not see a scratch of the pen that reaches these people, hardly, to disprove the arguments which are put forth by these papers.

Senator NELSON. But do you find much in our public press, the daily press, the weekly press, or our monthlies, that calls the attention of the American people to these things and points out the danger of them?

Mr. STEVENSON. Not until very recently, Senator. We have seen this movement grow up for the last year and a half in the foreign-language press, and now it has extended to all these other papers. It seems to me that our teachers in the public schools should be trained to combat this thing; and still further, I think if you go back into history you will find a very interesting parallel in the United States to the condition which we find here now. You will remember that in about 1791 or 1792 or 1793, somewhere along there, we had the great whisky rebellion in western Pennsylvania. That whisky rebellion was brought about through the agitation of civil liberties bureaus, which were the reflex of the Jacobean clubs in France, and in the Life of Washington by John Marshall, he makes a very interesting observation on the fact that as soon as Robespierre was guillotined in France, and the Jacobean clubs lost their power, immediately in the United States there came the dissolution of these democratic societies. And it seemed to be that there was a lesson for us to-day in that: That so long as the Bolsheviks control and dominate the millions of Europe, so long that is going to be a constant menace and encouragement to the radical and dissatisfied elements in this country.

Thereupon the subcommittee proceeded to take testimony.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM CHAPIN HUNTINGTON.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, where do you reside?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. With my parents in Elizabeth, N. J.

Maj. HUMES. Are you connected with any department of the Government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. With the Department of Commerce.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I interrupt? Doctor, what is your degree?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Doctor of engineering.

Maj. HUMES. From what institution?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. From the Royal Technical College, Aix la Chappelle, in Rhenish Prussia.

Maj. HUMES. Have you a degree from any institution in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. From the Columbia University; mechanical engineer.

Senator WOLCOTT. Your degree from the foreign institution was a postgraduate degree?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; a postgraduate degree.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is your degree from Columbia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Mechanical engineer.

Senator WOLCOTT. And your foreign degree is doctor of engineering?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Engineering.

Maj. HUMES. Were you attached to the American Embassy in Petrograd at any time?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I was designated to the embassy as the commercial attaché of the Department of Commerce.

Maj. HUMES. During what period of time were you serving in that capacity?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. From June, 1916, until September, 1918.

Maj. HUMES. Were you in Russia during all that time?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. During the entire period.

Maj. HUMES. In what parts of Russia were you during that period?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I began my work in Petrograd. Subsequently, following instructions of my department, I traveled over, in the summer of 1916, very nearly the whole of European Russia, that is from Archangel as far south as Tiflis in the Caucasus, and as far west as Finland, and down the Volga.

Senator NELSON. Were you in the Ukraine?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. At that period, yes, sir; in 1916.

Senator NELSON. And in Little Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, that is practically the same thing.

Senator NELSON. And in Great Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In Great Russia, yes. That is the part which contains Petrograd and Moscow.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Following that trip about Russia, which consumed something over two months at that time, I remained in Petrograd, only visiting Moscow for a period of time; and then in February of 1918, when the allied embassies all left Petrograd, I was sent out by Mr. Francis, the American ambassador, to Siberia. So that in the months of March and April, 1918, I lived in Siberia.

I returned again, on instructions of the ambassador, from Siberia to Moscow, arriving there about the 1st of May, 1918, and remained in Moscow until the 26th of August, when the American consulate general, the Italian consulate general, the military mission, with certain exceptions, one man in each case, and the Belgians, represented, as it finally happened, by one man, their consul general, were permitted to leave, with the American civilians, the confines of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Where did you go in Siberia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Primarily to Irkutsk, which is the capital of Eastern Siberia.

Senator NELSON. That is in the eastern part of Siberia, on the west side of Lake Baikal?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Irkutsk, yes. I have also been around the lake once, and I also went to Verkhne Udinsk.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Kiakhata?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have never been there.

Senator NELSON. Were you down the river at all?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Although I have been on the river on a boat, I have never been on it to go for any distance.

Senator NELSON. Were you down as far as the station at the mouth of the Usuri River?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Will you state what the conditions were as you observed and found them during your stay in Russia, and especially outline and give the committee any facts that you have in reference to the actual application of the Soviet government after the revolution. Outline the conditions just as you found them from time to time at the various points you are familiar with.

Senator WOLCOTT. Before you proceed to answer that question: You say that you left Moscow along with members of the Italian consulate and others?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There was a special train made up on that occasion, composed of the staff of the American consulate general, of American citizens who comprised chiefly, but not all, the employees of the Y. M. C. A. and of the employees of the National City Bank, which had a considerable staff, and a few others; the Italian representatives, chiefly the Italian military mission, with their wives, and the Belgians.

As a matter of fact, only one Belgian, the consul general, came. They had not a very large representation in the country at that time. They were the three nationalities to go on that train.

Senator WOLCOTT. You used the expression that you were permitted to leave. Were these various officials required to leave, in any wise? Were they requested to leave, or was the desire on their part to leave, and was it that they got the permission to get this train and thus get out?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; the last is the case. They had arrived at a sort of impasse where they were no longer able to perform their functions; so they requested, through the neutral powers—that is, each one of the allied Governments was at that time under the protection of a neutral power, and they requested—permission to leave the country. I say “finally allowed to leave,” because there were some negotiations on the subject, and the leaving was made contingent upon certain counter concessions to the representatives of the Bolsheviki government in other countries. This is a chapter of the political history which, unless you care to have me, I will not go into.

Senator KING. The fact is that they murdered—the Bolsheviki murdered—the British representative, and they made the lives of the representatives of the other nations, including our own ambassador, so intolerable, and there was such a constant menace over them, that they were compelled to leave? Is not that a fact, that they murdered the British officer? I will ask you that first. I had several questions in one.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Rather than to answer that directly, I should say that a party of the Bolsheviki Red Guard, under a commissar, came to the British Embassy and came into the embassy, which of course is always recognized as the ground, in every part of the civilized world, of the power at home—that is, the British Embassy or the American Embassy is a piece of British soil or of America, as the case may be, in the foreign country—they came in with arms, intent on making a raid on the embassy, whereupon the British naval officer in question, who was there, warned them to leave. They came on and he opened fire on them, defending his own embassy.

Senator NELSON. Were you there, and did you see that?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir. At that time I was some miles from Petrograd, a very short distance away, in a border town at the Finnish border, the name of which in English is White Island. It is about a half an hour distant from Petrograd. The news was brought to us at that point.

Senator KING. The officer was killed?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator KING. You did not state that fact.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; of course he was killed.

Senator KING. Our ambassador is not there, in Petrograd or in Moscow?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. At this moment?

Senator KING. Yes.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Oh, no sir.

Senator KING. He and others were driven out, or conditions were so intolerable that they left, many, many months ago?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; the conditions were made such that they could not remain.

Senator KING. And one of our representatives now is in jail, or imprisoned by the Soviet, or by the Bolsheviki?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I understand that the former United States consul in Petrograd is in prison in Turkestan.

Senator NELSON. Did you meet Mr. Leonard, of Minnesota, who was attached to the service over there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; on a number of occasions.

Senator STERLING. Is Ambassador Francis in Russia still?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; he has been in London, and was called, so the newspapers stated, to Paris for a conference with our representatives there. Whether he has returned to London I am not certain. I know no more of his movements there than what the newspapers have told us.

Senator STERLING. He remained there some time after the other legations had left?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In Russia?

Senator STERLING. In Russia; not at Petrograd, but in Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I should explain that, sir, by saying that the allied ambassadors and ministers in council had agreed at one time to leave Petrograd, and had about agreed to leave the country; that some of them took steps to do so; that Ambassador Francis finally decided not to leave Russian soil, but transferred his embassy to a town about 350 or 360 miles east of Petrograd, called Vologda.

Senator NELSON. That is at the railroad junction on the route from Archangel to East Siberia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, it is at the junction between the north and south route to Archangel and the east and west route to Siberia. There he was joined by the other allied representatives.

Senator NELSON. How far east of Petrograd is that point?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. My memory tells me it is 360 miles. I think I am nearly right.

Senator NELSON. Yes; and it is about due south from Archangel?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Very nearly due south.

Senator NELSON. What is the distance from Archangel?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It is very nearly the same; perhaps a little more. The total distance to Archangel is 760 miles, so that I should say it was about 400 miles from Archangel to Vologda.

Senator STERLING. Do you know whether any of the other representatives were intercepted in their attempts to get out of the country, or delayed by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In February, do you mean, or do you mean later on in the last time; in the last of August, when I described the departure of the Americans, Italians, and Belgians?

Senator STERLING. On either occasion were they delayed or prevented?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. About the time in February I can not state in detail, or from direct personal knowledge, since I left on the train which took most of the American representatives out east, and was sent subsequently with that train by the ambassador to Siberia.

Senator OVERMAN. Why did the American representatives leave?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. At that time, sir?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; at any time. Why did they leave Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There were two situations existing, if I may be allowed to say, at those times.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; that is what I want to know. Why did they leave there? We were at peace with them.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. So far as February was concerned, the immediate cause of leaving Petrograd was the feared German advance on the town. The Germans were very near by in the Baltic Provinces, and the advices were such as to cause very great fear that they would come to Petrograd. That was shared more or less by all, and it was the cause also of the removal of the Bolshevik government from Moscow at the same period.

Senator KING. Senator Overman wants to know why our representatives and the representatives of other nations finally left Russia.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Why they left Petrograd at that time?

Senator KING. No; why did the representatives leave Russia at all? Why are not the representatives of foreign Governments there now?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Simply because their treatment of the foreign Governments is such as to make functioning as a Government representative there at this moment impossible.

Senator NELSON. Were they not actually ordered out of the country, finally? Now, is not this the situation, that when they were threatened with the German advance to Petrograd, the Bolshevik government and the foreign representatives all retired to Moscow and remained there for a while, and finally the foreign representatives were compelled to leave Moscow?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not quite so, Senator. In February, when the German advance was expected, the American Embassy divided into two parts, a larger part and a smaller part, the smaller part containing the ambassador and one or two officers who stayed with him, and the larger part, containing some of the citizens—the conditions in Russia having become very anarchical at that time, so that it was thought very dangerous for the average person who had not official business there to remain—we sent east in trains that passed out finally through Siberia. The remaining, smaller section of the embassy staff, composed of the ambassador and two or three of his secretaries, proceeded after a day or two—those dates could be supplied—to the town of Vologda and remained there until, I should say—I should wish to check this date absolutely; it will be on file here in the appropriate department—I think until July, when the ambassador and the allied embassies and legations left Vologda for Archangel.

Senator NELSON. Vologda is northeast of Moscow, is it not?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. About how far?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. About 250 miles.

Senator NELSON. So that our people retired from Moscow up to that railroad junction?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; our embassy at that time did not go to Moscow. Our embassy, what was left of it, was directed to Vologda. The representatives that we had in Moscow were those of the American consulate general always stationed at that place and who did not change their station.

Senator NELSON. Among them was Mr. Leonard?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Mr. Leonard was a vice consul on the staff of the American consul general.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you there when Mr. Summers died?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Mr. Summers died while I was en route to join him. I learned of his death while passing through Vologda, on the way to Moscow.

Senator KING. Would you prefer, Doctor, to proceed in your own way, giving a narrative and your testimony chronologically, or to submit to these rather irregular interruptions, which must disturb the chronological sequence of it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I had thought, if it was agreeable to you, to make a brief chronological record and then submit to any cross-examination.

Senator KING. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that he go on in that way.

Senator OVERMAN. Proceed in that way, Mr. Huntington.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. As I understand it, what I am asked to appear here and do is to tell as honestly and truthfully as I may what I know of the theory and practice of the so-called Bolsheviki government in Russia.

I was sent to Russia in 1916 as a commercial attaché of the Department of Commerce, accredited to the American Embassy. That means that I was sent there as a Government employee. I had been previously for two years in the Government employ in similar work.

I was sent to Russia to do my part in developing Russian-American trade relations.

I took up my quarters in the American Embassy, where my office was situated, and was in constant touch with the ambassador and the embassy's staff, so that I had rather unusual opportunities to observe and study.

I spent eight months under the so-called régime—that is, under the régime of the Czar Nicolas, from June, 1916, to March, 1917. On the Russian New Year's Day, 1917, I was presented, with the other members of the staff, to the Emperor.

In March the same Emperor had abdicated, and a very nearly bloodless revolution took place, after which, first, the provisional government of Russia was formed. I then lived under this government and its successors from March until November of 1917.

In November of 1917 came, after long preparation, the coup d'état of the so-called Bolshevik party, and this coup d'état was successful; and I then lived under the Bolshevik régime from November of 1917 until September 1, to be accurate, of 1918.

Senator NELSON. Was it not the Kerensky government that succeeded the Czar's government in March, until November?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It is most often called the Kerensky government because of the fact that Kerensky's name was the outstanding name. Kerensky was not the premier of the first provisional government, but sat in it as the minister of justice, and his star was a rising one. His influence grew, or the influence which was attributed to him, so that in the succeeding combinations——

Senator NELSON. I do not want to interrupt you, only my understanding is, and I want to bring that before you, that the real Bolshevik government did not succeed until in the fall of 1917.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is very clear, sir. They did not come in—were not able to gain the power—until eight months after the Russian revolution in March, 1917.

Beginning with June of 1916, and from that time onward, I had, first, upwards of two months in Petrograd, and then over two months traveling. The country was at war. At that period we were not, so that the contrast was especially sharp to me who had come from a peace country.

The transportation system was hopelessly overloaded. Russia is weakly economically developed for her size, anyhow, being chiefly a peasant country, a farming country, although some phases of industry are strongly developed. But in general the economic and business apparatus is a weak one.

The transportation was overloaded, which caused food difficulty.

In manufacturing, munition manufacturing was going on as best they could, but still not enough. There was profiteering; there was corruption; there were reports widely circulated of German intrigue in high circles. The country at large was hard at work at war. Ordinary society as we know it was very much disturbed, mothers and daughters of families being in the hospitals, and the fathers and sons being at the front.

The losses were very great, and there were all the attendant consequences of war.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I interject a question here? From your observation do you think you are prepared to express an opinion as to the wholeheartedness of the Russian people who came under your observation, in support of the war at that time?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Those with whom I came in contact in the towns, yes. The Russian peasant with whom I had contact as time went on was, as the Russian peasant is, as a man, a local man, a man with a very narrow vision, a man who has never had any opportunity, and as far as that permitted he was interested in the war. It was always pointed out, universally, that the war as compared to the very disastrous Japanese war, was a popular war, a people's war.

Senator WOLCOTT. So that you think the statement that before the Czar abdicated the Russian people were as enthusiastic in favor of the war as could be, to be a just statement, do you?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Proceed with your story.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. At that time I traveled throughout Russia, and in going through the provincial towns was able to go into many shops and stores as a commercial traveler, so to speak, and to see the absence of goods; was able to see the building operations held up, large buildings in various parts of Russia, in the large towns, with scaffolding about them, that could not go on for lack of material and labor; was able to see how overloaded the railroads were; was able to see the graft which was used to get shipments made; was able to see the work which the Zemstvo organizations were doing, and without which the war would not have gone on—they and the war industry committees were in helping the Government; was able to see how hard hit, under the surface, Russia was, as a weakly organized economic and manufacturing country, having to put into the field the millions of soldiers which she did.

Senator NELSON. You speak and understand the Russian language?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. For ordinary conversational purposes, and for reading the newspapers, yes. For reading economic books, yes. To gain a perfect knowledge of the language several years would be required, and I do not claim to have a perfect knowledge of the language.

Senator STERLING. I would like to have you at some time—you may have it in mind to do so later—describe the Zemstvo and the authority of the Zemstvo, and how it is constituted.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think that could be brought out later. I should prefer, myself, to have documents to explain that.

Senator STERLING. Very well.

Senator OVERMAN. Go on with your story.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. This situation which I have described, the bad transportation, and the heavy load of the war, failure on the front due to the lack of matériel, the soldiers not being provided with arms and elementary things which they needed, went on. As the winter drew on, the effect of this grew every day. I lived in an apartment, and was able, through my servants, who taught me my first Russian, to find out what difficulties they had in getting food in the shops.

Finally, in February and March the situation got to a head. A general strike broke out of the workmen.

Senator WOLCOTT. This was in 1917?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. 1917. They could not quell it. The food question was too acute. There was a universal feeling amongst the masses that there was corruption; that nothing was being done. I had that at that time from the servants, from the common people of the embassy and my house, with whom I had come in contact. It was talked about in stores and shops, and on the streets, that there was corruption, and that the Germans were keeping food from the people, and that sort of thing. There were parades in these strikes, and Cossack soldiers were ordered out to stop those parades. Formerly, in years gone by, they would have drawn their weapons and would have fired, if necessary. At this time they did neither. They rode up onto the sidewalks very gently and pushed people off without hurting anybody. If they gathered too much they grinned. They did not hurt anyone. It was freely stated to me by the people, by my servants, that they would not fire, and it was known that they would not fire; and before any of us who had not been through similar things before, knew it, there was mutiny in the regiments at Petrograd followed by some street fighting. Then came the fighting with the police, the old police, which was the hardest fighting of all, with machine guns. They fought from the housetops.

In a few days it was all over, and the first provisional government was formed from a committee of the Duma, which was the only representative organization that they had.

Alongside of this provisional government there was immediately formed the organization of the soviets, so-called—"soviet" being the Russian word for "council"—of workmen and soldiers, on the model and pattern of the soviets of 1905. These were primarily a movement of the so-called social democrats, primarily socialistic and not Bolshevistic, at that time. They aspired to put through policies and exercise an influence on the government. They did not aspire, at that period, to have members in the government, so far as I know, excepting their member, Kerensky, who served as a link between them and the provisional government, sitting in both organizations.

Senator NELSON. Tell us what the soviets were. You have not done that yet.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The word soviet is merely the Russian word for council. The soviets were a form of group organizations which came about first in the revolution of 1905, at the time of the Russo-Japanese War, and which was not successful.

In the revolution of 1917 the soviets were by men who were interested in this movement, formed, and immediately put one of their number, Kerensky, into the provisional government which was formed at the same time. They were not themselves the government, nor did they at that time aspire to be, but they aspired, as a political outer organization, to influence the government.

Senator NELSON. It seems to me that your description, right here, is a little wrong. The situation is this, that the Russian peasants settled in villages and communities, called mirs, and those soviets are organizations of those local communities. They constitute the soviets. These organizations of these local communities constitute the soviet, and these local communities send the representatives to the general soviet at the headquarters. Now, is not that the case?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; that grew to be somewhat the case except that, if only because of the very hugeness of the country and the ignorance of the peasants, it was never possible to organize them well, in fact.

Senator NELSON. But your explanation did not cover that.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I did not intend, primarily, Senator, to go into this, because I did not care to specialize on this point, because I wanted to speak more on the economic side.

Senator NELSON. Well——

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The soviet organizations began in the great cities; began chiefly in Petrograd, which is the political center. They subsequently extended throughout the country. The trained leaders of the movement were in the towns, not in the country.

The movement at first did not even include the peasants; not even in its title. It was called "The Soviet of the Workmen and Soldiers." Of course, very many soldiers were peasants. Subsequently the titles of many local soviets were changed to include the word "peasants."

Presently the word "Cossack" was also used, but at that time in Petrograd the organization was not as developed as it subsequently became. There had not been time to extend it.

Now, the new provisional government which came into power at that time found itself faced by the conditions which I have recited to you as having been seen by me from the time of my arrival in 1916, conditions of economic breakdown, breakdown of transportation and business and manufacturing, in a country weakly economically developed, and at that time carrying on the greatest war in its history, with millions of men in the field, and unable to back those men up with arms, railway cars, and equipment. There was also the further difficulty of the so-called dual authority, that is of a government, but at the same time, along beside that government, the organization of the soviets which aspired to control it and had their central executive committee in Petrograd, their local soviets, as you say, in the provinces; that was a political conflict which went on and which resulted in the changes from one government to the next which I would prefer not to discuss, since there are political students who can do that better than I, and resulted in the changing of the composition of the first government, resulted in their resignation and their replacement by other men, and resulted in the prominence, for a time, of Kerensky, and finally resulted in the Bolshevik coup d'état of November.

In July of 1917 the situation had already, with the economic conditions growing constantly worse, become so tense that the Bolsheviks, as the slang phrase goes, tried their movement on, and there was for several days, in Petrograd, anarchy. That is, the government went into hiding, could not be found during that period, and troops, the local garrison, marched in the streets, groups of irresponsible men went around in motor trucks with machine guns, men were up in the top floors of houses, shooting out of the windows, etc.

The only result of that was 16 dead horses, which I counted in the so-called Liteiny Prospect, one of the principal streets, and a Cossack funeral, the Cossacks having been sent out to bring about order.

The Bolshevik group was active always in the soviet organization. The soviet, as I explained to you, was a movement primarily of workmen of the cities, later expanded to the peasants, and it was predominantly Menshevik—that is, the opposite of Bolshevik. The Bolsheviks were represented in the soviet, took part in the debates, stood for certain principles, were outvoted and were a minority party in the soviet.

Senator KING. There were some bourgeois in the original soviet?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the original soviets there were very few. I do not know of any so-called bourgeois except for some intellectuals like Kerensky, if you like, and men of that type.

I should qualify that, and say if you mean by bourgeois, the educated men who have had greater opportunities in life, yes; there were several of those.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us how the Bolshevik revolution broke out in November, 1917? Can you tell us anything about that?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; I think so. I was present the entire time.

After the "try-on" in July, which failed because the spirit was not worked up sufficiently, yet, to make it win, they were quiet for a time, and we went through further changes in the structure of the nominal government.

Senator NELSON. By that, you mean the provisional government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I mean the provisional government headed by Kerensky.

Senator NELSON. Now, you have skipped an interregnum there, my friend. Under the Kerensky government they continued to make further war on Germany and to keep on, until finally the army of soldiers refused to fight and became demoralized. That was before the revolution of November, 1917. Now, is not that a fact?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; that is a fact. The changes in Petrograd, the changes in the central government, had not been without influence on the army, very naturally, since war was the chief problem before the government at that time, aside from being fed, and the change from the old regime, the change of discipline, the taking away of the former command, and the introduction into the army, by idealists like Kerensky, of untried principles of discipline, all conspired to bring about disintegration and lack of interest. That was backed up constantly by the Bolshevik propaganda. The Bolsheviks were working in the city of Petrograd principally, which was, of course, also the political head of Russia, and at the front, to break down the spirit of war, the spirit of carrying on the war, with Germany.

Senator KING. Pardon me, right there. Kerensky, Rodzianko, and Prince Lvoff, those who were controlling the provisional government, were strong allies of France and England, and the opponents of the central powers, and anxious for Russia to do her part in the great struggle for the defeat of the central powers?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There is no question about that.

Senator KING. And Germany had spies and agents in Russia, and they conspired with traitors in Russia for the purpose of disorganizing the army, undermining the morale of the Russian people and finally compelling the withdrawal of Russia from participation in the war?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is correct, sir.

Senator KING. And the Bolsheviks were there leading the treason against their own government and against the allies?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The Bolsheviks are internationalists, and they were not interested in the particular national ideals of Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the nature of the propaganda? Can you tell us what that was?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Sending agitators, so called, and pamphlets, to the troops in the army throughout the campaign, telling them if they were to keep on fighting, they were fighting for imperialistic and selfish aims of world power by the allies, who were practically just as selfish in their aims as Germany was in hers. Also advising peasant soldiers to go home so as not to lose their share of the land which, they said, was being divided up.

Senator KING. Including the United States?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Including the United States.

Senator KING. They made as bitter an attack upon our Government as they did upon England and France?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator KING. And their object was to destroy us as it was to destroy the other allied Governments?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Can you tell us anything about their pamphlets and speeches?

Senator KING. Just one question.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Their aim was to commit treason against the cause of the allied Governments, and in favor of Germany and Austria; that is, to help Germany and Austria win the fight.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That would have to be stated differently, Senator. Their aim was an aim of a group of fanatics who have their own game to play. They are perfectly willing to accept aid from Germany in playing that game. Germany had at all times had Russia honeycombed with spies. Germany knew Russia better than any other country. Germany had more people within her borders and out who spoke Russian, and had studied Russia and had been in business in Russia, than any other country.

The Bolsheviks were a party who believed in so-called internationalism, who believed in the abolishment of war, who believed in the immediate establishment, in the bringing about, of the socialistic state, and were against this war because, as they say, they believed it to be a war of capitalists. They expected German money to win their cause, which was to stop the war. Germany used them as a military instrument to break down the military power in the east, and when she had broken it down, promptly threw her soldiers over to the west against us.

Senator KING. The Bolsheviks, then, were really allies of Germany and Austria?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They were, for practical purposes; from a military point of view, practically our point of view.

Senator KING. The Bolsheviks got the Russians to commit treason against their own Government and against the cause of the allies?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; because they did not believe in the cause.

Senator KING. Yes.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Neither did they wish the German cause to win, as such, because Germany to them is an imperialistic government, or was, and they were quite as anxious to destroy that government as to destroy ours. They are a third party in the triangle of opinion, if you like, but as they themselves admit, they are quite unscrupulous in the means they take to gain their end; so they were willing to take the German money and to use it for their own principles.

Germany is a crook, who, as we have proven, is perfectly unscrupulous in the use of any means that offer, to gain her end; and they, as equally good crooks, or I think a little bit better, were using Germany to gain their end; so that we have the spectacle of these two using each other to gain their ends.

Senator OVERMAN. What was their statement about our country? What is their objection to our Government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. What is their objection to the Government?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; to our Government.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Their objection is twofold. In the first place, we had joined in the war, and they were against the war.

In the second place, we are not a socialistic Government, and they do not approve of us for that reason.

Senator KING. Is it not a fact that Trotsky and a number of other men who were in this country, undesirables, bad in every way, went back to Russia and did all they could to prejudice the Russian people against our country; that they denounced our country—Trotsky and others—as an imperialistic Government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; they did.

Senator KING. And they are just as bitterly opposed to the United States, to our representative form of government, and would destroy it just as quickly as they would destroy that of any other country in the world?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Exactly.

Senator KING. And their purpose now is our destruction, as it is the destruction of all orderly governments through the world?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Is not this a fact—I want to bring it to your attention—that after the Kerensky government—I call it that for short—came into power temporarily they issued a general pardon for all offenders, especially those that had been sent to Siberia, and that Lenine was one of the men that was pardoned, and that he came back by way of Switzerland and was given a passport by the German authorities to come back to Russia? Do you know anything about that, or have you heard anything about it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; I have heard, and I remember perfectly well when Mr. Lenine first began to come into Petrograd and speak on the streets.

Senator NELSON. Did you not know that he was one of the men pardoned who was in Siberia, and that he came back by way of Switzerland?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not believe Lenine was at this period in Siberia. He returned to Russia from Switzerland.

Senator NELSON. And got a passport from the German authorities?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; he came into Petrograd. I can not remember the time when he began to come. He met, of course, at that time with great resistance.

Senator NELSON. Did you ever see him?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; for once, in the constituent assembly which tried to meet and was dismissed.

Senator NELSON. By him and Trotsky?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; by Lenine and Trotsky. I sat at that time in the press gallery and looked down on him, not farther from him than you are this moment from me.

Senator NELSON. Those two are the ringleaders of the Bolshevik movement, are they not?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, they are the brains of the movement.

Maj. HUMES. Is it not a fact that Lenine in going from Switzerland to Russia went through Germany?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. He was permitted to travel through Germany for the purpose of reaching Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you hear him speak on the street?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; I have never heard Lenine speak. I have heard Trotsky speak, on the street and in meetings of the Soviet.

Senator WOLCOTT. Doctor, would this be a correct statement or way of summing up the purposes of this Bolshevik group as they existed at the time you have just been speaking of, namely, that they were the enemies of all governments organized along lines other than those that met with their own fantastic notions; and therefore they were the enemies of the United States or of the allied Governments, and of Germany—enemies, I mean, to those forms of government; that they found in their own country a people who were sympathetic with the allies, and in order to break that sympathy they accepted money from Germany, whose form of government they did not like, for the purpose of getting the Russian people in line with their socialistic notions; that they hoped to break down the allied sympathies in Russia, and then weld the Russians together into a Bolshevik government, expressing the Bolshevik idea, in the hope that then they would have such strength as to carry their principles throughout the world and overthrow all established governments?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; that is true. I would like, if I could here, to read some statements of the Bolshevik government from this [indicating paper].

Senator NELSON. No, but, Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me; instead of getting this by piecemeal, if you can tell us—we can not stay here always—what the doctrines, and creed, and principles of government of the Bolshevik government are, that is what we would like to know, not these mere scattering quotations.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I can do that, sir. I would like, however, to read to you exactly what they say their own doctrines are.

Senator WOLCOTT. It seems to me that is better than the doctor's interpretation of them.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the first place, I have a circular here which I read at the time it came, which is an open circular. There is nothing secret about it. It is not diplomatic correspondence. It was sent to every embassy and legation in Petrograd.

Senator WOLCOTT. Sent by whom?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The Bolshevik government then located in Petrograd. The matter at issue was the matter of diplomatic couriers.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the date of that?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. December 15, 1917. [Reading:]

From the people's commissariat of foreign affairs. For the information of the allied and neutral embassies and legations. * * * The fact that the Soviet Government considers necessary diplomatic relations not only with the governments but also with the revolutionary Socialist parties, which are striving for the overthrow of the existing governments, is not sufficient ground for statements to the effect that "an unrecognized government" can not have diplomatic couriers. * * *

This is their own statement in a circular letter.

Senator STERLING. Who issued that letter?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The commissar for foreign affairs.

Senator STERLING. Lenine and Trotsky were then at the head of the Bolshevik rule or government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator STERLING. That was during their régime?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Oh, yes; that was within a month of their coming into power.

Senator STERLING. At that time Trotsky was the commissar for foreign affairs?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The meat of that circular is simply this, that even if they had not been technically recognized as a de jure government, they were in fact the government, and as such their couriers ought to have recognition. Is not that the substance of it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; I beg your pardon. I think the meat of it is that they considered it necessary to have relations, and claimed the right to have relations, not only with established governments in our country and in other countries, but with the revolutionary socialist parties seeking to overthrow these governments.

Senator NELSON. And did they not put it on the ground that they are a de facto government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not understand you, sir.

Senator NELSON. Do you not understand a little law Latin?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have forgotten, mostly, what I knew.

Senator NELSON. Do you know the difference between a de facto government and a de jure government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; but the important thing for us is, in that statement, sir—

Senator NELSON. Go ahead; go ahead.

Senator OVERMAN. Their purpose, then, was to overthrow all governments?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They say so.

Senator WOLCOTT. That circular shows plainly their intention to overthrow all governments, and they wanted to establish relations with all revolutionary parties under these governments from which they were seeking visés for their couriers. That is the purpose of that, very clearly, to my mind. They did not pay any attention to the established governments.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Again, from a statement from their own lips: Sometime ago there was published in a paper called One Year of the Revolution, published in this country, some diplomatic correspondence. I have tested this diplomatic correspondence to see whether it took place, and it did, and it is correctly given here. In the course of the reply of Mr. Tchitcherin, of which I have the date here in my notes, he said this [reading]:

To the neutral legations who protested against the cruelties of the Bolshevik régime Mr. Tchitcherin, the commissar for foreign affairs, says:

"We are convinced that the masses in all countries who are writhing under the oppression of a small group of exploiters will understand that in Russia, force is being used only in the holy cause of the liberation of the people, that they will not only understand us, but will follow our example."

Senator OVERMAN. What is that document you read from?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is a letter written by Mr. George Tchitcherin, commissar of foreign affairs of the Bolshevik government, to the neutral legations in Russia who protested against the cruelties of the Bolshevik régime. It is addressed in care of the Swiss minister, dated September 5. That is only one sentence in it.

Senator OVERMAN. But the document itself, was that printed in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; it has been printed in this country. How it got through here I do not know, but it has escaped the censorship and been printed in this country, although a diplomatic document.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the red flag on the back of that pamphlet?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is the illustration on the cover.

Senator STERLING. Have you that passage marked there, which you read?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. It was just after or about the time of the writing of that letter that all the representatives of the neutral Governments were compelled to leave Russia,

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That was September 5 when that letter was written. We had just gone. The others followed us within a short time.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you compelled to leave, or did you leave from fear, or were you ordered to leave?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. We left, sir, because we were unable to perform our functions. I mean by that that the diplomatic and consular officers could not longer treat with the de facto government; that they found it impossible to protect American citizens, which was a part of their function; that they could not correspond with our Government because it was forbidden. We were the only consulate general in Moscow allowed to send even a wireless, and we have found out since that most of the wireless messages we sent were not allowed to pass through. We have also found out that most of the wireless messages which were sent to us, which are serially numbered, never reached us. Being unable to communicate with our Governments; being treated with discourtesy; being unable to protect the lives and property of our citizens resident there, we were scarcely in a position to render any service any more. The danger, as such, played no part in the transaction at all, except for those who had no work to do. For us who had work to do, had we been able to continue that work, the danger would have had nothing to do with it.

Senator OVERMAN. You were not threatened?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. As a matter of fact, it was dangerous, of course. The British Embassy representatives were put under arrest. The Americans were never, until the time we left, arrested, with the exception of one man who was arrested in the town of Vologda and kept under arrest some 10 days before we knew of it. They never informed us. We found it out by accident.

The British and French, however, including the consular officers, were arrested, both civilians and officials. It was in the manifest impossibility of doing any work, of accomplishing anything, of being allowed to communicate with our Government at home, being isolated—

Senator OVERMAN. Can you state to us the character of those cruelties and what was going on while you were there—the extent of it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; I can to a considerable extent; and in order to make you understand it, perhaps I could read again from the official proclamations of the Bolshevik government. Reading from the official newspapers of the Bolshevik government under date of September 2, there is the following—this was the day after we passed the border.

Senator NELSON. September 2 of what year?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. 1918. [Reading:]

Murder of Volodarski and Urkitski—

Urkitski was one of the terrorist commissars who, while our train was lying on the side track in the Finland Station, was shot by a young student who came into his office. [Continuing reading:]

Murder of Volodarski and Urkitski, attempt on Lenin and shooting of masses of our comrades in Finland, Ukrania, the Don and Tshecko-Slovakia, continual discovery of conspiracies in our rear, open acknowledgement of right social revolutionists party and other counter-revolutionary rascals of their part in these conspiracies, together with insignificant extent of serious repressions and shooting of masses of White Guard and bourgeoisie on the part of the soviets, all these things show that notwithstanding frequent pronouncements urging mass terror against the social revolutionists, White Guards and bourgeoisie, no real terror exists.

Such a situation should decidedly be stopped. End should be put to weakness and softness. All right social revolutionists known to local soviets should be arrested immediately. Numerous hostages should be taken from the bourgeois and officer classes. At the slightest attempt to resist or the slightest movement among the White Guards, shootings of masses of hostages should be begun without fail. Initiative in this matter rests especially with the local executive committees.

Through the militia and extraordinary commissions, all branches of government must take measures to seek out and arrest persons hiding under false names and shoot without fail anybody connected with the work of the White Guards.

All above measure should be put immediately into execution. Indecisive action on the part of local soviets must be immediately reported to peoples commissar for home affairs. Not the slightest hesitation or the slightest indecisiveness in using mass terror.

That is an order from the commissar for home affairs to the soviets.

Senator OVERMAN. Explain who the White Guard are.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The White Guard are everybody except the Red Guard. The Red Guard are nominally the loyal army, gathered around the Bolshevik government to fight the so-called class struggle for the social revolution.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Red Guard are the Bolsheviks and the White Guard are everybody else?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Practically speaking, that is it. "If you are not with us, you are against us."

Senator OVERMAN. Then that order was to shoot down everybody who was not with them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. And to shoot hostages if anything happened to any of their people.

On the 11th of September, about 10 days after our departure from Russia, the following letter was received by Maj. Allen Wardwell, commanding the American Red Cross in Russia. Because of the shooting of a large number of people in Petrograd, Maj. Wardwell had written a letter as a Red Cross officer to the Bolshevik government, namely to the commissar for home affairs, Mr. Tchitcherin, protesting in the name of humanity against the killings, which did not take place in field fighting, but were shootings of people against brick walls.

Senator WOLCOTT. Massacres; murders?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes. This letter is as follows:

[Republique Russe Federative des Soviets Commissariat du Peuple pour Les Affaires etrangeres Le 11 Septembre, 1918, Moscow.]

Mr. ALLEN WARDWELL,

Major Commanding the American Red Cross.

DEAR SIR: It is only because the body which you represent is not a political organization that I can find it compatible with my position not to repudiate off hand your intervention as a displaced immixtion in the affairs of a foreign state, but to enter in the friendly spirit corresponding to the character of your organization into a discussion of the matter involved. You affirm that your organization did not hesitate to condemn acts of barbarity on the part of our adversaries. Where are these utterances of condemnation? When and in what form did the American Red Cross protest when the streets of Samars were filled with corpses of young workers shot in batches by America's allies or when the prisons of Omsk were filled with tens of thousands of the flower of the working class and the best of them executed without trial or when just now in Novorossiisk the troops of England's mercenary Alexejeff murdered in cold blood seven thousand wounded who were left behind by our retreating army, or when the cossacks of the same Alexejeff murdered without distinction the young men of their own race in whom they see a revolutionary vanguard? I would be very glad to learn what the American Red Cross has done in order to publicly brand these untold atrocities, the everyday work of our enemies, everywhere practiced by them upon our friends when they have the power to do it. But are these the only atrocities around us?

In a wider field, at the present period when the oligarchies who are the rulers of the world drench the earth with streams of blood, cover it with heaps of corpses and whole armies of maimed and fill the whole world with unspeakable sufferings, why do you turn your indignation against those who, rising against this whole system of violence, oppression, and murder that bears as if for the sake of mockery the name of civilization, those I repeat who in their desperate struggle against the ruling system of the present world are compelled by their very position in the furnace of a civil war to strike the class foes with whom the life and struggle is raging? And in a still wider field are not the sacrifices still greater, still more innumerable, which are exacted every day on the battlefield of labor by the ruling system of exploitation which grinds youth and life force and happiness of the multitude for the sake of the profits of the few? How can I characterize the humanity of the American Red Cross which is dumb to the system of everyday murder and turns against those who have dared to rise against it and surrounded by mortal enemies from all sides are compelled to strike? Against these fighters who have thrust themselves into the fire of battle for a whole new system of human society you are not even able to be otherwise than unjust. Our adversaries are not executed as you affirm for holding other political views than ourselves, but for taking part in the most terrible of battles, in which no weapon is left untouched against us, no crime is left aside and no atrocities are considered too great when the power belongs to them. Is it not known to you that by the decree of September 3rd the death sentences are applied only for distinct crimes, and besides Randitism and ordinary crimes they are to be applied for participation in the white guard movement, that is the movement which helps to surround us everywhere with death snares, which unceasingly attacks us with fire and sword and every possible misfortune and wishes to prepare for us, if only it had the power to do so, complete extermination?

You speak of execution of 500 persons in Petrograd as of one particularly striking instance of acts of like character. As for the number it is the only one. Among these 500, 200 were executed on the ground of the decision of the local organization to whom they were very well known as most active and dangerous counter-revolutionaries and 300 had been selected already sometime ago as belonging to the vanguard of the counter-revolutionary movement. In the passion of the struggle tearing our whole people, do you not see the sufferings, untold during generations, of all the unknown millions who were dumb during centuries, and whose concentrated despair and rage have at last burst into the open, passionately longing for a new life, for the sake of which they have the whole existing fabric to remove? In the great battles of mankind hatred and fury are even so unavoidable as in every battle and in every struggle. Do you not see the beauties of the heroism of the working class, trampled under the feet of everybody who were above them until now, and now rising in fury and passionate devotion and enthusiasm to re-create the whole world and the whole life of mankind? Why are you blind to all this in the same way as you are dumb to the system of atrocities against which this working class has risen? It is only natural, then, if you are unjust against those whom you light-heartedly condemn, if you distort even the facts of the case, if you see wanton vengeance against persons of other views there, where in reality there is the most terrible, the most passionate, the most furious battle of one world against the other, in which our enemies with deadly weapons are lurking behind every street corner, and in which the executions of which you speak, executions of real and deadly enemies, are insignificant in comparison with the horrors which these enemies try to prepare for us, and in comparison with the immeasurable horrors of the whole system with which we are at present at grips in a life and death struggle.

I remain,

Yours. truly,

(Signed)

G. TCHITCHERIN.

I think that is probably as good a statement as you could have of the point of view and the aims of the Bolshevik government.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you observe any of their cruelties? Did you see any of it yourself?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have seen many arrests. I have been in prisons. I was never personally arrested. I have not been present at shootings. I have known of people being led out to be shot. Very few people are present at shootings. Satisfactory evidence had it that most of them were performed at night and in cellars, and, it was said, with Maxim silencers on the muzzles of the rifles, to muffle the sound. Friends of mine have been in prisons and have seen people daily led out for shooting, who have never come back. I have seen deportations of whole trainloads of people, herded in freight cars, taken away from their homes.

Senator OVERMAN. Women and children also?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Men, women, and children.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there a reign of terror there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Very decidedly, sir; and there is no denial of it, but a justification of it, in that letter and in the other letters. If you will recall the words which I read from the same Mr. Tchitcherin to the neutral legations, you will recall that he says that the masses of the world will understand what they are doing as violence necessary to attain a certain end, and will not only understand it but adopt it themselves in their respective countries.

If you have nothing more, sir, I would like to take up the economic side.

Senator NELSON. I would like to hear, if you will tell us, what their plan and scheme of government is—this Bolshevik government—and what they expect to accomplish. That is more important. I would like to know what sort of a government they are seeking to establish there, and upon what principles?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; I will tell you the best I know. I have been present there throughout the whole time, and I am able to read the papers, and I read them daily. There are no other papers in Russia now, and have not been for many months, but the Bolshevik papers. Long ago they suspended the papers of all parties opposed to them, saying that freedom of the press must unfortunately be sacrificed to the good of their movement.

Maj. HUMES. Then there is no freedom of the press in Russia under the Bolshevik government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There is no pretense of freedom of the press, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the constitution of the soviet republic provides expressly for depriving people of the rights of free press and free speech, and any other rights that may be exercised to the detriment of the revolutionary party?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; that is a part of the principle. In answer to your question, Senator, do I make myself plain?

Senator NELSON. Well, you have not got at it yet. [Applause.]

Senator OVERMAN. What does that mean, that cheering back there? Bring an officer in here, Mr. Clerk.

Senator NELSON. I want to know, in short, what their scheme and plan of government is that they are inaugurating, and propose to inaugurate.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; I will tell you that, the best I can.

Senator NELSON. And the methods they intend to pursue in inaugurating that government. That is what we are anxious to know.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Briefly, this: The present state of the world is unsatisfactory. We have war. We have injustice to the great masses of the people, so they say. These are great evils. The present state of the constitution of society, which is known as the capitalist state, has outlived its usefulness; has shown itself unable to cope with these great injustices, war, and unequal distribution of wealth. The capitalist state of society must, therefore, go. To get rid of the capitalist state of society, which is a long habit with human nature, is a very difficult task. It is faced primarily by the difficulty that those who have property part with it unwillingly. Now, in order to get rid of this capitalist state of society we are going to have the socialist state of society, loosely, because the definitions of various people differ, but in general, a state of society whereby the government, the state, owns all the means of production, factories, farms, railroads, industries, steamship lines, etc., whereby there is no property except—I do not know about personal property; that depends on the views of the individual persons—but there is no great property, no industrial property, no farming property, in private ownership, but only that of the state; that by removing from the capitalist class the temptation of money getting, by the fact that they can no longer accumulate wealth but become government servants, like those of us who are to-day in the employ of the government, by removing those temptations, war and injustice are obviated.

Senator NELSON. One part of their creed, then, is to divest private ownership of all property and property rights. and confer it upon the state or the government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Very definitely; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. That is one of the primary articles of faith. Then, after they have done that, after they have taken, for instance, the land from the private owners, what do they provide as to the utilization of the land after that?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is to come later. If I may go on, I would like to answer that in a moment.

Senator NELSON. Go on; yes.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. To realize this is very difficult. They have found, naturally, there is great opposition on the part of those who own the property. Their aims, they say, are the aims of the socialist movement throughout the world for many years, but the socialist movement throughout the world, which is opposed to them to-day, has been unsuccessful because it has tried to work in the parliamentary manner, by convincing people, sending representatives to parliament and voting their measures through. They therefore have to resort to compulsion. To compel, they divest those who have property of that property by force. Should they resist, they may even kill them, as you have seen, and justify that.

Senator NELSON. In short, they propose to divest the owners of their property, by violence, if need be?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If need be.

Senator NELSON. And without any compensation?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Without any compensation. In the interim when their new state is being prepared—an interim of indefinite length—they provide for the so-called dictatorship of the proletariat; that is, to take and arbitrarily divide all mankind into so-called bourgeois, that is the capitalists—and in that they include everyone from those who own the smallest houses, right through to a millionaire. They arbitrarily divide all mankind into that class—and, on the other hand, the proletariat, who have no property holdings. They want to push out of the way the upper class. They do not contemplate the participation of this class in the government. They contemplate the participation only of the proletariat in the government, and that is why, on this question of a dictatorship of the proletariat—that is, when they have finished their revolution in Russia, not the original revolution but their revolution—they intend to keep the formerly propertied classes from voting in the new government which they will have established.

The dictatorship of the proletariat is fraught with difficulty because, especially in a country like Russia, where due to the tyranny and laziness of the old régime, the proletariat had very few chances, the proletariat are not educated. So they need leaders, and Mr. Lenine and Mr. Trotsky and their associates put themselves forward as the leaders. The result is that whereas there is on paper a complete system of voting, of representation, the central executive committee of all the soviets—which, as you have rightly stated, are placed throughout the country wherever their power extends—is dominated by a few brainy men, fanatics like Lenine and Trotsky. The formerly propertied classes—and of course in their division they make it arbitrary, as they like—could not participate in this council, nor is it expected that they will. At some distant date, when this preliminary ground work is carried out, it is contemplated to permit these people who, by that time, perhaps have had a change of heart, or to permit their children, to participate in the new social state which has then been reached. This is an interregnum in which the proletariat conducts the dictatorship.

Senator NELSON. In that term "proletariat" you include not only workmen but others—peasants?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; that term originally included workmen only, but was extended to peasants; but they came from the party of workmen in the cities in former times, and not the peasants.

Senator NELSON. What has become of the old nihilist element? Are they mixed into this new scheme?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I am not competent to pass on that.

Maj. HUMES. Is there not a distinction, in their application of their laws and their administration, between peasants and what they term the "poor" peasants?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. On that comes again the question. I told you that they divided mankind arbitrarily into two classes; the bourgeois, as they say, that is those who have capital, and the proletariat. Of course, they make the division, they make the distinction, and they put in their divisions whom they like, because it is an arbitrary matter. In Russia there are, in most peasant communities, peasants who have, under the systems which have been provided, bought lands of their own. There are certain ones who, as it happens in every community, are better provided with the good things of life, the harder workers or more energetic, and they are systematically excluded by the Bolsheviki and placed opposite, in the community, to the so-called poor peasants; those who have little property, who in the old vodka days had been addicted to drunkenness, or who economically have made poor progress in life. In the villages those two groups of men are set against each other.

Senator NELSON. Is not this true, when you come back to the peasantry and all farmers, that the ownership of land is in what they call the mir, the village community; that they are settled in villages, in communities, and the title of the land is in the mir or in the community—in the municipality, as we call it here—and that they from year to year apportion parts of the land to be used by certain peasants? In other words, the peasants are not complete owners, in the sense in which our farmers are owners, but the ownership of the land is in the community, the mir, and the mir distributes the use of the land among the peasants? Is not that the condition?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is true, Senator, for about 80 per cent of the country.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The remaining one-fifth, we will say, of the lands are in private ownership.

Senator NELSON. In large estates?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; I do not speak of those now. I leave those quite out of account. I am speaking of the peasants, the 20 per cent; and that varies according to the portion of the country. Private peasant ownership is more in the south and west than in the north. They are not only sometimes the holders of the mir, in which they have a part, but they own land of their own, which it was permitted them to buy or arranged for them to buy under certain reforms introduced by the old imperial government.

Senator NELSON. That is mostly in southern Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The majority of it is southern Russia and western Russia.

Senator NELSON. In what we call the Ukraine?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The Ukraine is the heart of South Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, having got this property, taken from the people who owned it, into the State, what do they propose to do with it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Just the same as the ideal socialists. I suppose you are speaking of the fact——

Senator OVERMAN. What do they propose to accomplish? What is the end? When they get all this property in the State, what do they propose to do with it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It is proposed that life should go on very much as it does now, except very much better; that we should have food, and clothing, and transportation, and all those things under the State instead of in private ownership; that all of us will be employees of the State and not employees of private concerns.

Senator OVERMAN. All government officers?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Everybody will be a government officer?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. How do they propose to handle the manufacturing industries under the new régime? How do they propose to operate them? Now, we will say that the workmen take possession of a big industrial plant under this system, what do they propose to do after they have taken possession, and how do they propose to operate?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. What happened, sir, was this: In the beginning of their administration they immediately provided for the so-called control of production of the factories by the workmen, and this went into effect; and workmen's committees did actually take over most factories.

Senator NELSON. In other words, they were to be run by the workmen themselves?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir. In the original legislation, as I remember it, the proprietor would be in a manner engaged as an expert assistant. Indeed, it was first provided, I believe, that he should receive a rental for his work, and he would participate in the management. They would get the benefit of his experience.

Senator NELSON. They went so far, however, in their program as to recognize the fact that they needed experts who belonged to the capitalist class, who were termed intellectuals, and to say that they would employ some of them in the first instance to assist them in running the factories; was not that true?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They took over the factories with a great deal of enthusiasm, but very shortly, in most cases, came to grief. That is, a variety of things happened; either the grief remained or in some cases tactful employers made an arrangement with their men whereby really their brains were used in the production, and there was a modus operandi worked out between them and the factory and the factory was enabled to go on.

Where that did not take place the factory came to grief, as most of them did.

Even where that did take place, under the very unusual circumstances the operation of the factory was hardly an operation of normal times, where an income has to be earned on the investment.

Senator NELSON. Of course they expected to operate all the railroads—this government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Seventy per cent of the total mileage has always been operated by the government in Russia.

Senator NELSON. They have been operated by the government, so that the transition was not so great?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. But what did they propose to do after they had seized the lands and taken possession of them? How did they propose to utilize those lands, and what show did they propose to give the peasants?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the first place, they nationalized the land. It became the property of the state; and whereas there has not been time in such an enormous place as Russia to work all these things out, in general they gave immediate order to the peasants to take the land of the contiguous estates of the landholders. There was not much order about that, and that has resulted in difficulty; but they were going on this simple plan, to take the land and then divide it up amongst themselves.

Senator NELSON. When the peasants divided the land up, were they to get title to their little patches of land?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Oh, no, sir; because the land is nationalized. It belongs to the state.

Senator NELSON. They were simply to cultivate it as a species of tenants?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. In that connection, a paragraph from the Soviet Republic constitution might be of interest as to its provisions on that subject. [Reading:]

For the purpose of realizing the principle of the socialization of land, private ownership in land is abolished and the entire land fund is declared the property of the people and is turned over to the toilers without any indemnity upon the principle of equalization of land-allotments.

And again:

All forests, mineral wealth, water power and waterways of public importance, as well as all live stock and agricultural implements, all model landed estates and agricultural enterprises are declared national property.

As a first step to the complete transfer of factories, mills, mines, railroads and other means of production and transportation into property of the Workers' and Peasants' Soviet Republic, the law concerning the workers' control and concerning the Supreme Council for National Economy, which aims at securing the power of the toilers over the exploiters, is hereby confirmed.

Senator NELSON. That is very good. That ought to go into the record, if it is not in already.

Maj. HUGHES. There are just two or three more sentences covering that subject. [Continuing reading:]

The 3rd Convention of the Soviets considers the Soviet law concerning the annulling (repudiation) of loans contracted by the governments of the Tzar, the landlords and the capitalists, as the first blow at international banking and financial capital and expresses the conviction that the Soviet government will advance steadfastly along this path until complete victory of the international workers against the yoke of capitalism is secured.

The principle of the transfer of all banks to the property of the workers' and peasants' state, as one of the conditions of emancipation of the toiling masses from the yoke of capital, is hereby reaffirmed.

For the purpose of doing away with parasitical elements in society and of organizing the economic affairs of the country, universal obligatory labor service is established.

In order to secure full power for the toiling masses and to remove every opportunity for reestablishing the government of the exploiters, the principle of arming the toilers, of forming a Socialist Red Army of the workers and peasants, and of completely disarming the property-holding classes is hereby decreed.

Senator OVERMAN. Proceed, Doctor.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Returning to the Senator's question about the factories, I would like to complete that by saying that whereas the first phase was the workmen's control, whereby a committee was formed in each factory to take charge of that factory, the second phase was later introduced by nationalizing of the factories, just in the same manner as the land has been nationalized. In other words, whereas in the first place theoretically the factory was not immediately taken out of the hands of the owner, but was to be turned over to the control of his workmen, by the decree of nationalization the factory passed from the ownership of the former owner into the ownership of the State.

Senator NELSON. To be operated by the workmen?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. To be operated under what was called the Supreme Council of National Economy. That introduced practical difficulties again, since that factory was then to be operated theoretically as one of a chain, one of a system, and that produced friction and quarrels between separate factories, practically, for the reason, of course, that some factories were better provided with the raw materials than others, and in a system of distribution whereby each was to receive a fair part would have to give up, if they were better provided, perhaps, some of the materials which they had, which would stop their production earlier. The great fact in all the industry there is, of course, that it is not running at the present time, unless you want to say that a few machines, or one isolated factory, or something of that kind, is running; but it is, on the whole, not running, for the very good reason that there are no raw materials present to work on, neither iron, coal, petroleum, nor cotton; and cotton spinning and cotton weaving is the chief industry in Russia, the biggest one in Russia aside from farming.

Senator NELSON. Here is a matter that occurs to me. After they have succeeded in nationalizing all the land and all the industries, in other words, taking it over by the Government and operating it by the Government, what is their scheme of taxation for securing revenue to run the Government, and who is to pay the taxes?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is not clear to me in theory, and in practice there was no system of taxation put through. The only taxation that I have seen was in the matter of contributions levied on the capitalist class. Take this instance. In the newspapers of Omsk, in Siberia, which I have seen, and of which I have copies, there appeared a list of the men or firms in the town who were to pay 25,000 or 50,000 or 100,000 roubles, or whatever it may be. The agency of the International Harvester Co., when our train passed through Novo-Nikolaevsk (in Siberia) in March had just been called upon to pay a fine, I think, of 35,000 rubles, and I was asked, as an embassy representative, at that time to send a telegram to the local soviet pointing out that this was an American concern and should not be asked to pay this fine.

Apart from the contributions, their revenue system is chiefly the printing press.

Senator NELSON. You mean printing bills and bonds?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Printing paper money, yes; and when the objection is raised to that that they have long since passed any gold reserve, the answer is simply that since the land is now nationalized, all of Russia belongs to the Russian Government, and all of Russia is certainly worth all the paper that has been issued up to this time.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but you spoke about collecting the taxes. After they have been divested of all their property, and it has all been condemned and taken over by the State, there are no more capitalists. There can not be any more taxes, can there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There will not be now; but there were at that time. At that time they did not take a man's bank account from him. They forbade him access to his bank account, but his account remained on the books, supposedly, of the bank. They could force him to sign a check against that account. They could also force people who had no bank account to dig up cash. I personally lived in Siberia, in Irkutsk, with a former merchant who had such a contribution levied on him, and who borrowed the money from his friends to pay it. He did so against the advice of many Russians, and against our advice, because we thought that he would be asked for a second contribution—that he would be asked a second time; but he actually went out and borrowed the money from his friends who had it put away in chimneypieces and stockings, or under mattresses—who had been able to save it, in other words—in order to avoid being sent to prison, which was the alternative.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say that in defense of their printing-press money they say that the State owns the land and that Russia is worth as much money as has been issued. That is their answer?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is one of their answers.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether anybody ever suggested to them that that is rather insecure, because if the paper money is issued and is in sight to be collected, the fellow that gets the land will have it taken away from him again? Is there any answer to that, that you have heard?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Oh, they have an answer for almost anything.

Senator WOLCOTT. It would be a curious one, to that.

MR. HUNTINGTON. Most of the answers are curious, from a normal man's view. The thought processes of those people are not in the usual grooves.

About conditions, may I speak as to conditions as they exist there now, as I saw them before I left—

Senator OVERMAN. That is what we want to hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON (continuing). And what they have become since. I beg permission to read here, because I have been so often asked whether there has been starvation in the cities of Russia, three letters written by a woman who was formerly a clerk, a translator in the American Embassy, and written to a friend of her's in this country. The letters are dated September 16, 20, and 23.

Senator WOLCOTT. Of what year?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Nineteen eighteen. That is, they are only a few months old. The first letter I will quote from is as follows. The original is in the hands of the young man to whom it was written. It is dated September 16, 1918. [Reading:]

I am glad you are not here just now; living conditions are awfully hard. Have you ever seen people dying on the street? I did, three times, twice it was men, workmen apparently, once an old woman. One man fell down in the Furshtadtskaya, the other on the Liteinye, when I walked home from the office last Sunday. Maybe it was from cholera, maybe from starvation. The woman died on the Ussacheff Pereoulck. She was sitting quite a while on the pavement, then quietly laid down. Nobody paid any attention to her. Later on a Red Cross car carried her away. But horses are not removed, when they die on the streets they just lie there for weeks, and hungry dogs tear their bodies to pieces.

I don't think the people died from cholera, they were not sick, just horribly thin and pale. It's awfully hard; I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it myself. These three cases illustrate to you the conditions of Petrograd better than descriptions. People are dying quietly, horribly quietly, without any groan or curse, poor helpless creatures, slaves of the terrible régime of to-day. I think that's really the only thing the Russian people can do well.

Altogether Petrograd is a dead town now. People are very, very few, nearly no "cats." Trams are half empty, half of the shops are closed. Heaps of offices opened, "Commission offices" as they call themselves, buying and selling furniture, tableware, linen, articles of luxury, etc., of people who leave the country or who just sell everything they possess so as not to starve. Most precious, vulgar, or intimate things of housekeeping are sold publicly. It's sometimes comical, most times most sad and shocking. There seems to be nothing precious any more in families, everything is to be bought.

You cannot imagine what is going on in this country. Everything what is cultured, wealthy, accomplished or educated is being prosecuted and systematically destroyed. But you know it all through papers, don't you? We all here live under a perpetual strain under fear of arrest and execution. Yesterday bulletins appeared on corners of all streets announcing that the allies and the bourgeoisie have spread cholera and hunger all over Russia and calling to open slaughter of the latter.

Do you remember the little market on the Basseinaja where they used to sell food stuff? It is now transferred into a place where people of society sell all their belongings, overcoats, furs, shoes, kitchenware, table and bed linen, etc.; they sell everything right on the streets. The food question is terribly acute. Petrograd lives on herrings and apples. Yes, also on "vobla." That is fish, dried in the sun. The size of it is about the same as of a small herring's, and it smells horribly. But it can be eaten when properly soaked and boiled. We always used to know "vobla" as a swearword. But now I know that it is a fish, and eatable.

You know, Stranger, people here are starving in accordance with four categories. The first category (workmen) get $\frac{1}{4}$ pound of bread every two days,

i. e., $\frac{1}{2}$ of a pound a day, and two herrings; 2 category workmen who do easy work, get $\frac{1}{2}$ pound of bread every two days, and two herrings. The third category, people who "drink other people's blood and exploit other people's work," i. e., people who live on mental work, (sic!) get two herrings every two days, and no bread, and the fourth category (not mentioned on the inclosed slip) also people who "drink, etc." get nothing at all, sometimes two herrings. I inclose a slip from our official paper, which mentions these four categories. The paper is called "Severanaja Communa" (The Northern Commune). People may, of course buy food besides the food they get from cooperative stores, mentioned above, and which is at a reasonable price (if a herring a day and $\frac{1}{8}$ lb. of bread can be called food) but the prices are enormous. One lb. of black bread costs Rs. 15.

I should say we get more rubles for a dollar in Russia than you can get in New York. We paid 10 cents for a ruble up to the time of leaving, which was therefore 10 rubles to the dollar, and I shall divide the ruble prices and give you the prices immediately in gold. [Continuing reading:]

One lb. of black bread costs $1.50, 1 lb. of white flour Rs. 17 to 20, black flour $1.10 to $1.20. Potatoes cost 32 to 38 cents a lb., butter $2, and so on. Do you remember the big store on the corner of Snamenskaja and Kirochnaja, where soldiers used to live and where there were once on the windows heaps of rotten potatoes? The shop is now occupied by a commissioner's office, who sells everything in the world, and on the corner there is quite a little market, consisting of ladies and children of society, who sell lumps of sugar at Rs. 1.20 a piece and thin slices of black bread, I don't know at what price.

I, myself, have seen this, on August 28, 1918. [Continuing reading:]

And this year Russia has unusually good crops! People who have a little bit of money left, run away from Russia. They sell everything they possess and just run. They go mainly to the Baltic provinces and to Ukraina. And you know, its the German consulate there who helps them to get permits and tickets. I don't know how the Germans manage to do it, but I know for sure that they do. They do it also very willingly if people get them good money in exchange of their Kerenki, which they have heaps.

That is, the money of the old régime, of the Czar, in exchange for the krenki. Kerenki is the little money that was brought out at the time of the Kerensky government, in denominations of 20 and 40 rubles, and which is about the size of my finger, and which is not pretty, and which is often looked down upon by the people; and they prefer the fine looking bills of the former day.

Here is another letter. [Reading:]

We have four new decrees now. The first concerns the lodging question; the second, forced hard labor for the bourgeoisie; the third, requisition of warm clothes for the Red Army, and the fourth concerns distribution of food.

First about lodgings. Comrade Zinovieff, little Jew Apfelbaum, on a meeting of the Soldiers' and Workmen's deputies said, that "the bourgeoisie has not been enough 'reduced to beggary' yet; that they still have to give back what they have acquired by way of exploiting of oppressions, by way of blood and sweat of the workman. They have now to give their comfortable lodgings and furniture. The war has temporarily diverted the attention of the Soviet power from this point, which can as well be pressed on the bourgeoisie. They still have much. The best houses, the best apartments and shops belong to them. It is time to put an end to it. The workmen, in spite of the decree, still show fear, indecisiveness. Socialism is not carried through in this way. Further, the speaker refers to Engles and other Socialists and Paris communers who discussed the lodging question. "The workmen must come up from their caves into the upper floors. Half measures must not be tolerated. The workmen must take the initiative themselves, they must abandon their psychology of slaves, that in rich houses, not filled up by workmen they will feel uncomfortable. We do not want Nevsky, this street of prostitutes, we want Kamenooostrovsky, Vassily, Ostroff, etc. Workmen had enough courage to go on the barricades, to stand against imperialistic bayonets, to break down the imperialistic power, but to put their own lives and the lives of their families in better conditions they are afraid. If they will need money or means of transportation they will get them. If a milliard will be needed—the Soviet will give it. The lack of courage still proves that a little of a counterrevolutioneer still sticks in our souls and shows resistance. Workmen still consider themselves the fourth class, while they are the first now since a long time. And soon the time will come now, that they will be the first in the whole world."

Referring to reasons why workmen themselves hesitate to socialize the lodgings, Comrade Zinovieff gives one of them as fear of workmen families to be sent back to their old lodgings by the "White Guard," i. e., allies, bourgeoisie, etc. "But the proletariat should be quiet in this respect," he says, "if the White Guard comes. They will send away hundreds of thousands, a whole million, maybe, but not to their former lodgings, but to the other world. But this will never be. Their hands are too short. It is nearly a whole year now since the proletariat holds the power in its hands, and this power grows; gets more and more strong. The women of the working class must know that during the French revolution laundry women understood that they had the right to travel in royal carriages. They took them and traveled. The difficulties are now behind us. We are the ruling class. We will show the bourgeoisie that the revolution has been carried through for the sake of realistic advantages, and everything that formerly belonged to the class of the oppressors will now be taken by the people."

He further refers to the example given by the Red Guard. They showed that they knew how to treat the belongings of the tyrants and oppressors. "After Nikolai Romanoff has been executed," he continues, "about 600 suits of linen have been taken by the Red Guard. And they proved that they could wear them not any worse than their former owner."

MAJ. HUMES. Doctor, you have had attention called in that letter to people dying in the streets of Petrograd. What, of your own knowledge, do you know about the actual conditions, the living conditions and the terrorism in Russia, and the means that are used by the Government to maintain itself?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Of my own knowledge I know the conditions in Moscow during the last few months, where I lived in the consulate general, and I not only had my own observation, but was at the center, where all the representatives of the consulates placed in different parts of the country sent their reports.

I have been on two visits to Petrograd, one in June and another when we passed out in August. I have been over the entire trans-Siberian line from Petrograd to Irkutsk, east. I have lived in Irkutsk for two months, and participated in the life of the town as much as anyone would who came into the town. I have dealt with and seen people in the town, school-teachers, merchants; dealt with the soviets in business matters, on cases of American goods; have been at the railway stations and have seen the Austro-Hungarian armed guards, who were armed to fight also for the social revolution, and had been made citizens of this soviet republic; I have talked to railroad men, to station masters, to self-made men, to farmers, to peasants; I have been in the—

MAJ. HUMES. What have you seen in all this experience with reference to terrorism and the conduct and practical application of the policies of the Bolshevik régime?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I have seen the complete overturn of all we know in our present life, and absolute chaos in all human relations.

MAJ. HUMES. How is the control maintained? Is it maintained because the people are with the Bolshevik government, or is it maintained through terrorizing the people, or in what manner do they maintain themselves?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It is maintained absolutely by terror. They gained that power by a sudden coup d'état in Petrograd and Moscow, by promises to a people who had been duly prepared by eight months of propaganda, for which Germany had contributed large sums. They were able to produce the coup d'état by the use of soldiers in the capital, and by promising to the crowds peace, land, and bread. They maintain their power by owning the machine guns and the arms, and getting control of those which they did not have in the beginning; by the use of terror; by the use of taking hostages; by the use of any unscrupulous methods which, as you have seen by what I have read, they do not deny, but justify, and by the help of mercenaries like the Letts from the Baltic Provinces, and Chinese soldiers, such as they embrace out in Siberia, and out in Siberia in one case where they interested Austro-Hungarian soldiers, as in the case of the trainload armed, which I saw, and which were being sent out to fight.

Their present army to-day consists of a corps of Lettish mercenaries and Chinese mercenaries, to which they have added, by threats—threats personally as to themselves and as to their wives and children—citizens who no doubt serve only because of fear of what will be done by the Bolshevik government to their families, and also because by serving they secure food and clothing.

Their present armies are formed in this way. They are not formed of enthusiastic people fighting for a great cause, but they are formed of desperate people who hope by service in the army to be clothed and fed.

Maj. HUMES. You have referred to this government as a socialistic state. Are we to understand from that that the Government, as now constituted, represents the socialist movement of the socialist elements of Russia, or does it simply represent one party or one element of the socialist movement in Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It represents only one group of the socialists of Russia; and to show that, I need only say that in the constituent assembly which was finally held in Petrograd and sat—at least prepared one day and sat for a second day—and where I was present, by having been allowed in there by sailor guards who were posted at the street corners, in that assembly they had a large majority against them, and they disbanded the assembly because of that fact, and the large majority of that whole gathering were socialists, socialists by conviction, chiefly of the so-called social revolutionary party, the party of the peasant socialists. I think that that constituent assembly, which so far as I know is the last really democratic meeting that has been held in Russia, is a sufficient answer to that question.

I can also cite, however, the treatment of such great groups of socialists—although these are not political groups—as the cooperative societies who are formed chiefly of socialists. These societies find themselves in strong opposition to the Bolshevik power, but are forced to go on with it. For a long time the Bolshevik power feared to touch their organization, because it was democratic, and reaches the hearts and pocketbooks of the people pretty closely; but lately they have gained courage in that regard, and they have put a com-missar^{destroy} the organization of the largest cooperative in central Russia and they have also taken over the bank of the cooperative societies—the stockholders of which are peasants—and have their members among the directors of that bank.

Maj. HUMES. Have you any idea what portion of the socialist movement in Russia is represented in the present government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. When the Bolshevik movement began, because of the economic disintegration, because of the anarchy of mind of a people held in political oppression, and with no education, because of the sins of the old régime, they had a considerable vogue, without question, in Petrograd and Moscow, and extended a sort of power—not perfect power, but a sort of power—even out into Siberia. I have seen that. But as time went on and they did not fulfill their promises, they did not get peace and did not get bread, and the distribution of land only caused trouble and friction among the peasants. I have seen late advices from the land, not from the state owners, that peasants in many parts of the country are now wishing to pay for the land, and hesitating to plow the land which they took, because they feel they would like to pay for it, because they have lots of paper money and would like to pay for it and clear the title.

When they promised peace, land and bread, and did not get any of them, they began to lose adherents; and they lost, first, the peasants, because the peasants in Russia, who form 85 per cent of that great population, who are not nationally minded, whose education and form of environment have been very local, and who did not take a lively interest as a mass in any movement whose chief motive was to get land—when those peasants had got the land, as they thought, they were out of the game.

They were further driven out of the game by the requisitions of food by the Bolsheviks. When our train was lying at one point in eastern Russia in February, 1918, where we lay for several days, the Red Guards arrived with machine guns and sent telegrams through the telegraph office in the station, and I was able to read these telegrams. Through these telegrams the leader of these Red Guards reported that he had sent his command out into the country among the peasants and that he had been defeated, and he asked in one of his telegrams for reinforcements. Further, while certain of our party were drinking tea in the house of a prosperous peasant, the house was surrounded by Red Guards composed of the riffraff of the village. It is this "peasant poor" that Lenine incited to civil war against their better-off brother peasants.

I cite that merely as a case in point, showing how they have sent squads into the country demanding food, and the peasants ask them to give in exchange for the food manufactured articles instead of money, of which they have plenty, and which is useless to them; they ask for shoes and cloth and other articles, and the Bolsheviks refuse to give these articles to the peasants, and when the peasants refuse to sell them food they take it by force, and that only causes the peasants to hide what they have, and in certain cases, where they have arms, to fight. They have lost, therefore, the confidence of the peasants, and the peasants form 85 per cent of the Russian people. Therefore, I can not see how they can claim to-day politically to control the peasants.

Now, as to the workmen, we have the best of advice now that they have lost most of them. The workmen of Russia are about 7 per cent, or perhaps it is 8—about 7 or 8 per cent, I think—in the great cities, chiefly. These men have neither food nor peace. They are having almost continuous warfare ever since the peace with Germany, and they are not satisfied, either; and they are not to be reckoned to-day as adherents of the Bolshevik régime, although that régime claims them most vociferously, and in order to secure their support has taken from the factories certain of the elite or pick of the workmen and made them commissars. That has not, however, been enough under the conditions, under their economic failure, to realize the paradise which they promised, and hold the workmen. Therefore, I feel that if the peasants are 85 per cent and the workmen are 7 per cent, that makes 92 per cent, and if they can not be said to have those two—not to speak of the higher classes, which I do not mention in this connection at all—I can not feel that they have to-day a very large following in Russia.

(At 1.10 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee took a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The subcommittee reconvened, pursuant to the taking of the recess, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM CHAPIN HUNTINGTON—Resumed.

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, this morning you gave us some idea of the comparative strength and following of the various parties in Russia, which indicated that the present Government represented less than 10 per cent of the people. Now, if that is true, how do they maintain their power or maintain the de facto government?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the first place, they have the machine guns. They have got the arms.

Maj. HUMES. How do they use the machine guns? Where have they got them and how do they use them, and what do they use them for?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The machine gun is the weapon, par excellence, for use in towns, on the roads, and for use in the country villages if there is a peasant uprising; and also for obtaining grain; and they have not only the machine guns, but the transport. It was due also to the presence of German officers that they have more than once won.

They also have the press, because for several months now there has been no liberty for the press in Russia. They do not permit any of the so-called bourgeois papers, which were formerly published, to come out.

Maj. HUMES. Do they permit any socialist papers of other groups than their own groups to publish papers?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; there are none except the official organs of the so-called Soviet Government published at this time in Bolshevik Russia. Having the press, having the arms, and then having the railway lines, although the railway men themselves, particularly the higher classes, the locomotive engineers, the conductors, and firemen and station masters, are not for them, they are able to control the country pretty well. They have, of course, the telegraph.

Maj. HUMES. Do hostages figure at all in their control?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The hostage system which they use is the same as the German system. They take hostages for the actions of some one whom they wish to control. The father of a young girl who was my secretary, an Englishman who had lived in Russia for many years, was walking one night, smoking a cigar, in the garden of the Church of the Saviour. He was arrested, with every one else in the garden, and taken off. They found out about it by chance; otherwise they would not have known. The girls went to the Kremlin, where they found out that he had been taken, and asked for what he had been arrested, and were jeered at, and told that he had already been executed. They proceeded and saw the second highest man, and he told them that there was not anything to be done about it; that he did not know anything about their father, and his case would come up when the time came. The other men in the office told them that their father had been killed.

They were then told that one of the Red Cross representatives was the only one that would be allowed to find out anything about him, and see him, so that one of the Red Cross representatives went, at my request, to find out about this unfortunate man, against whom there is no accusation whatever, or any charge brought, and he spoke to the assistant to Peters, who received him kindly and said, "Yes; I will do the best I can, and I will make a note of it, but I do not know just what I can do. I have to put so many people to death every day that I am tired at night." That is one of the methods which is used.

Another method is the brandishing of force before one. In Irkutsk, in Siberia, where I lived, there was daily machine-gun practice, so called, in a little yard on one of the main streets, so that as the passers-by passed down the street they might hear the noise and rattle of the machine guns; which for people who had just been through the social revolution as they had, was, of course, a little bit annoying, and tended to keep people on edge. The Peter and Paul Prison in Petrograd was filled with hostages of this kind. The system was quite universal. That was another part of the terror. They never have denied the terror. You heard this morning the official proclamation read, in which they are instructed to do this very thing, and they do not deny these methods. They justify them.

Maj. HUMES. What is the attitude of the Government, as it is constituted, toward the church?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The attitude in practice is very hostile. In theory it is neutral. In theory, the church is a cult, recognized as a cult of people who have the right of congregation like any sect or cult, and this sect or cult occupies a church building nationalized by the Government—because of course the church properties are nationalized, as is other property—and they can meet in this church, and I believe, are supposed to pay rent. I do not know whether the rent has been paid or not. That is the theoretical status. Theoretically, I think, any religion, any cult, is tolerated. In practice the attitude is one of extreme hostility, if only for the reason that the leaders of the movement are, of course, very much opposed to orthodox Christianity.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are they in favor of any particular religion?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not the leaders of this movement themselves; no, sir. The leaders of the movement, I should say, are about two-thirds Russian Jews and perhaps one-sixth or more of some of the other nationalities, like the Letts or the Armenians. The assistant in the foreign office was an Armenian. Then there are the Georgians; that is, the so-called Gruzinians of the Caucasus, and the remaining number Slavs. The superiority of the Jews is due to their intellectual superiority, because the average Jew is so much better educated than the average Russian; and also, I think, to the fact that the Hebrew people have suffered so in the past in Russia that it has inevitably resulted in their cherishing a grudge which has been worked out by the movement.

It is only fair, however, to say that the best of the Hebrew people in Russia, among whom are some of the finest in the world, and the greatest strugglers for human liberty in the world, have disapproved of this thing and have always disapproved it, and fear its consequences for their own people.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the established religion there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The so-called Eastern Orthodox Church, which came from the church of Constantinople in the ninth century. Missionaries were sent out from Constantinople who converted Russia, and it has gone on ever since.

Senator WOLCOTT. Commonly called the Greek Church?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Commonly called the Greek Church, which separated from the Roman Church at the time of the schism, and it has gone on its own way ever since.

Maj. HUMES. I want to read this from paragraph 13, page 32, of the Soviet constitution:

For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of conscience, the church is separated from the state, and the school from the church, and the freedom of religious and antireligious propaganda is secured for all citizens.

What became of the church property in Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Theoretically, the status of the property is that of nationalization. Practically, where it was needed as they thought for any purpose that they might have, it was taken over, which in the eyes of the pious was, of course, desecration.

In Irkutsk the theological seminary was taken over, and they could not rest with taking the ordinary rooms, but they desecrated the chapel.

In the Kremlin there was an old monastery very much revered among Russians, an ancient citadel, and from that the monks were expelled.

Priests have often been arrested. Sometimes they have been put to death.

The persecution is constant. It is, however, I think, having a salutary effect on the church, which from being a spoiled creature of the state in former times is now, under suffering, reforming and being cleansed; but the sufferings of the people and the church-goers are very great. In the end the church will be strengthened.

Maj. HUMES. What was done with the personal property of the church, gold and silver ornaments, or anything of value, of a personal nature?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. You probably refer to the altar, the sanctuary ornaments, I imagine. There there were cases of looting, but how general I do not know. I know of specific cases which have come up before us, but I do not know how general that looting has been.

Maj. HUMES. There has been, you say, in particular instances that you know of?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. You stated this morning that you had attended meetings of the soviets in the constituent assembly. How was the constituent assembly conducted? Was it a representative body that controlled its own deliberations or was it controlled by some one else?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The constituent assembly was a bone of contention in Russia for a long time. Sometimes the Bolsheviks claimed to want it very much, and other times they did not. The constituent assembly, of course, as you all know, is supposed to be representative of the entire nation, and was to decide the constitution of the future Russia. It was elected in a time of stress. It was elected even at a time when there was great Bolshevik influence. But in spite of that it turned a large majority against the Bolsheviks. When it was finally allowed to meet, about which there was considerable discussion, it had the majority against the Bolsheviks, and it lasted two days. On the second day the sailors appeared in the gallery with machine guns and told the deputies to go home, and they went home. I speak from knowledge, having been in the assembly.

Maj. HUMES. The sailors side with the Bolsheviks, do they?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir; the sailors were Bolsheviks, and they were very often used by the Bolsheviks because they were better educated than the ordinary soldiers, and they were very fierce at that time. They were amongst some of the hardest of such people that I have ever known.

Senator OVERMAN. How are the Cossacks? How are their feelings?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The Cossacks were the former frontiersmen of Russia, and they had special charters under old Russia, and lands would be granted to them, and that has affected somewhat their attitude toward Bolshevism, because they did not want to have their lands taken away from them. The Bolsheviks have sometimes made concessions or made it appear that they did not want to take the Cossacks' lands; that is, they were making a special case of them. They did at the time win some of the Cossacks, but the main body of them, so far as we could see, they have never won. There are people in Cossack Russia, however, who have been in the Bolshevik movement.

The sailors have been complained of so much that it may not be amiss to say, in speaking of their ferocity, which is not sentimental or joking but a fact, that I stood one day on the quay, the bank of the river Neva, in the building occupied by the National City Bank, and looked out of the office and had pointed out to me by the manager of the bank a spot on the street in front, which was red—a dried-up pool—and he told me that it was blood, and that he and his assistant had stood in the window of the bank that morning and a squad of sailors had marched along the street, which runs along the river front, and walking along on the walk had been a man in an officer's coat, who was walking along by himself, empty handed, and that before they came opposite to this man one of them raised his musket and shot the officer on the spot, and he was left there, and the march of the men was not even stopped to see whether the job had been done or not. Afterwards he was picked up.

Senator WOLCOTT. He was an officer in the Navy?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; an army officer.

Senator WOLCOTT. An army officer?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Of what grade I do not know. They were not wearing epaulettes then, and you could not tell from the coat; only from the cap you could tell that he was an officer.

Maj. HUMES. You have cited one instance of the father of a clerk of yours who was arrested and executed. Are you familiar with any other instances of similar conduct on the part of the government authorities?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I am sorry if I have given the impression that I said he was executed. I do not know whether he has yet been executed or not. He was in prison up to the latest advices which we had, up to a month or so ago.

Senator WOLCOTT. I understood you to say that this man told the daughters that he had been killed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They told them that, presumably to terrorize and scare those girls.

Senator WOLCOTT. And the daughters learned afterwards that he had not been killed?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. So far as we could find out. No one ever got inside to see. They admitted no one. In this case they did not even admit the Red Cross to see this man, although they said they would. They did admit the Red Cross to some prisons. People were confined in there whom nobody knew about, who people thought had fled to other parts of the country, in Moscow, as was the case with our own associate Mr. Simmons, who was in prison for 8 or 10 days, although he wrote letters and sent telegrams, which went to the commission, who refused to forward those letters of a supposedly friendly consulate.

Maj. HUMES. What tribunal imposes the death penalty and causes the execution?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The so-called extraordinary committee for combatting the counter-revolution. That is headed in Moscow by a man who has become famous as Peters, a Lett from the Baltic Provinces, who speaks English and is an educated man, and is one of the most cruel and fanatic men connected with the entire movement.

Maj. HUMES. What does this committee consist of? Does it consist of one man or more than one man? How is it organized?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I can not tell what the system is of selecting the people who sit on it.

Maj. HUMES. Do they pretend to try persons who are accused, or is it a summary proceeding?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think there is a pretense of trial, but nobody knows anything about it, and they do not have to show any record or any reason to the outside world.

Maj. HUMES. The trials are not public, then, if there are trials?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not know of any of those trials being public. There have been trials before a revolutionary tribunal which have been public, but that was in an earlier day, such as the trial of the woman who was the minister of public welfare under the Kerensky government. But since the establishment of the extraordinary commission, I do not know of any such trial. There are replicas of this extraordinary commission in other places. There is one in Petrograd. They are made up, usually, from amongst the most fanatical and fiercest of the local terrorists.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know how many serve on this commission?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; I can not tell you.

Maj. HUMES. I think this morning you were just getting ready to take up the economic situation in Russia.. Will you go ahead and state to the committee the economic conditions there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The situation has two aspects, as it seems to me. It has the moral aspect and the economic aspect. I mean moral in the broad sense, of all morality; not sex morality, of course, which is the frequent narrow use of the word here.

The moral aspect has rather been touched upon by the description of the terror—of the actual cases, many of which can be cited. I never have personally had any great interest in telling thrilling stories to make people's nerves tingle. There are plenty of stories, and you may hear others, and I think the case is sufficiently put by the statement of the Bolshevik Government, in which they do not deny the use of terror, but justify it. The moral side is one side.

The other side is the economic side. In other words, has the movement succeeded in bringing about any kind of an economic prosperity? I do not mean a paradise, or anything like it. To that I can only answer most decidedly no; that there is a complete chaos in Russia; that there is as near to anarchy as there could be and anything go on at all; that the center of the whole thing is really the railroad system, which is conducted out of previous habits of good order, and because there is the need of living by the railroad men themselves, who, I might say, deserve great credit for this, in my opinion. That serves to connect the various parts and keeps, to a certain degree, things going. The railroad transportation is slowly declining, day by day. When we passed out through Siberia and passed back again the side-tracks at the stations were filled with locomotives, some of them American, all rusty, with parts missing, with perhaps a connecting rod off, or a throttle taken off, or a cab boarded up, every one of them lacking this or that or the other part. Engines had broken down, and they had taken this or that or the other part off of one of these engines to make repairs. The rolling stock wears out day by day, and there is no repair shop, and the repairs can not be executed for lack of material and because the labor conditions are so unfortunate.

The production in any factories that have material has dropped off very greatly, in enormous percentages, anywhere from 500 to 1,000 per cent. There is lack of discipline in the factories and there is lack of food.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by 1,000 per cent?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I mean 10 times, sir; 10 times 100 per cent. There is lack of food.

Senator WOLCOTT. Just what do you mean?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I mean that a factory, for instance, that might make formerly 10 locomotives a month now makes 1; such as the Kolomensky works. The cotton factories are closed down. There was next to no cotton raised in Turkestan this last year on account of the disturbances.

Senator OVERMAN. Heretofore they have been spinning all their own yarn and not importing it. The cotton they use comes from where?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Oh, about one-half of it from outside, from Egypt and from us—it did come—and about one-half from themselves, as I remember it. They produced a great part, the principal part, of their own needs in cotton goods, and they have some very, very large factories for this purpose, founded by Englishmen. A German began the movement, but brought over English foremen and superintendents, and their successors remain there still, to this day—or did.

There is in the factories not only the lack of discipline and chaos in the administration, except where there has been effected a sort of agreement between the men and the foreman-proprietor, who gives his brains to the running of the factory, which has sometimes occurred, but there is hunger. A factory inspector of the Young Women's Christian Association, who visited practically every factory in Moscow, and whose report I have read, says that in many cases there was lack of work because there was lack of food, in addition to the other causes.

There is no banking, in the accepted sense. It is impossible to transfer money from one town to another town. If there is any payment to be made, it is paid in cash. If you want to make a payment, you send a man, preferably, with a suitcase with the money in it. The banks, formerly private banks, are now called departments 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the People's Bank of the Federated Socialist Republic of the Soviet. So that you have perhaps the Siberian bank of Petrograd being called department No. 1, and the international bank, department No. 2, etc. They carry on no banking business, ordinarily so-called, except the passing out of paper money which is paid out to factory organizations, those who are still running at all, for the payment of workmen.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they abolish liquor while you were there—vodka?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That was done before I arrived.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they really abolish it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It was very efficacious, and for the masses there was no liquor when I arrived in Russia. There was liquor for people who could get it by corrupt methods which have always prevailed in Russia, and have never prevailed there to the extent to which they prevail to-day. When we left Russia, passing out, although we had the visé of the authorities of Moscow, as soon as we got to Petrograd we were held by a commissar, who was unfortunately killed while we were there, and he finally let us go. He said he would not recognize the authority of the men of the foreign office in Moscow. I mention this at this point to show you that whereas they have a sort of authority, the authority of their so-called government is not very firm, and when it comes to issuing a constructive or definite restraining order they can not do it. An order to loot or to take they can get obeyed, but many times they can not get obeyed the other orders they issue.

We were held up, although we had our passports in order. When we got to the border we had to pay tribute to get out of the country, and did pay tribute to the Red Guard, who were at the border and who hustled the baggage, and also to the official at the border who conducted it.

Senator OVERMAN. Is the Russian naturally a cruel man?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; I should say not. He is naturally a kind man, a very easy-going man.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they hospitable people?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Very, under normal circumstances.

Senator OVERMAN. Under present conditions, under this Bolshevik movement, the very contrary is the case?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. A peasant, for instance, who has been taught that his landlord is his enemy—although that may not have been the case, because many landowners were kind to the peasants—a workman who has been taught the creed of Lenine and Trotsky, which is the class warfare; and which says distinctly that your employer is your natural enemy, naturally, when he has been so taught, and he is hungry, will strike the employer, and he may regret it a week afterwards. On the walls of the stairway in the Metropole Hotel in Moscow when I went in there the last time in August with two others, in perfectly good English, undoubtedly written by Mr. Tchitcherin, there was a copy of a poster which they were planning to launch up on the Murman coast, for the British and American soldiers. This piece was well written, and very logical, and the only trouble was with the first statement. I can not quote it exactly, but it started in this way: "Comrades, workmen of Great Britain and America, why do you come to our shores of this workmen's republic? You have nothing in common with your employer. He is your enemy. Turn around and go home and fight him, and you will achieve happiness." That is the creed, and when it is taught to simple people who are hungry, it produces that effect. The people are, apart from that, very kind, and easily led, easily to be had for any idea.

Senator OVERMAN. What proportion of the people are educated?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The estimates vary about that. The best estimate I have ever seen for the army which I thought was trustworthy was 50 per cent for the army. I have seen others higher, but I can not, from personal experience and contact with these men, believe them. If we accepted 50 per cent for the army, then you would have to figure that the army is only a portion of the population and does not include the women, and the women have had much less opportunity than the men, and our percentage of literacy in the country would seem to me, even with a very broad definition, certainly to be low; would certainly not be much more than a quarter, on a very broad definition of literacy—I mean, not asking that a man know too much, but that he be able—

Senator OVERMAN. Do women take part in these mobs, these lynchings and murders?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In mobs there have been women present. In many murders, no, sir. I have seen the victims of murders after they were killed, but I have not been present. As, for instance, one morning in the embassy news was brought of the killing of the liberal minister of finance in the Kerensky government, Mr. Shingaryov, who had been a little doctor in south Russia and had come up to the Duma had learned state finances and had been one of those who fought officials of the old régime in putting their schemes through of getting money for the Czar's favorites. This man was arrested and was lying in the prison of Peter and Paul with another of the Kerensky ministers, Kokoshkin, who was ill, and they allowed him and another man to go to the hospital of the Liteiny Prospect. Into that hospital one night at 11 o'clock armed men got by the guards and got up to the room of these men and shot them in their beds as they lay there.

That story came to the embassy on Sunday morning and was not believed, and so I went, at the special request of the ambassador, to the hospital on the Liteiny and personally passed through the crowd and into the morgue and passed along by the marble slabs in the morgue and stopped before the slab on which lay the body of Mr. Shingaryov, and next to him this other man, and, knowing him personally, I readily identified his body and went back and reported. Such things I have no desire, as I say, to tell. I have no desire to tell thrilling stories, but of such incidents I can call to mind a good many.

Maj. HUMES. Are you familiar with any atrocities of the kind committed against women? Did you come in contact with anything of that kind?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No. Personally, the only atrocities that I know of, the only mistreatment that I know of on the violent scale, I know from the town of Irkutsk, from the actions of the guards on entering certain houses there to loot, and who pretty roughly handled the women, but did not kill them. I believe there are undoubtedly such cases, but I, personally, have not seen them.

Maj. HUMES. Proceed with the economic matters.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The keynote is entire absence of production. That is why I am mystified, sometimes, when I read accounts that production is going on well. There must be entire lack of production, because there is not only lack of discipline but lack of material. The government is founded on demagoguery, and therefore has not been able to work constructively. We have tried to work with them constructively on a number of occasions. We tried, for instance, to feed the city of Moscow from the Volga, and had practically a plan for doing that under the International Red Cross when Trotsky blocked that, because, for some reasons of his own, he feared it would react unfavorably upon his régime. Besides the lack of real administrative ability amongst these men, there is also the constant additional difficulty that they are not interested in building, but they are interested primarily in propagating.

Propagation of their doctrines is the prime idea. The prime idea is to get these doctrines propagated, to get the social revolution, as they see it, throughout the world, and then do your constructing. Such constructing as they have conducted to-day at home has been only such as was forced on them or such as they wanted to do for the effect on the outside world. Now they are constantly trying to evince that their construction is a success. They are not, from a normal man's standpoint, capable of constructive work. What constructive work is done, is done by neutral people whom they employ on occasion; as, for instance, an engineer friend of mine in the ministry of railways, whom they appointed director of transportation. He found it impossible to keep on with them, because when he issued any orders that were not satisfactory to the workmen they were not obeyed. And when he went to the soviet, which guaranteed him aid and protection—even going so far as to say they would shoot people who did not obey, because they were bound to put the country in shape and Mr. Lenine said that production was what was needed—when he went to them they were afraid of the people in his offices, and these people appealed to demagoguery and said that they would not stand to have this or that measure put through, and the soviets, of course, gave in. Having founded their power on demagoguery, they could not do otherwise. They would gladly have made use of us and of other foreigners.

The foreigner, as a rule, has had a better chance than a Russian. Among the foreigners there were clever men and trained. Some of them in Russia are some of the cleverest men in the world. The Bolsheviks made offers of "cooperation" to the American Embassy, and wanted men for constructive work. This was in December, a month after they had been in power, and they would promise anything. They wanted to get experts from America. They knew that the people were very badly disciplined, and they thought if we would send special men to help them build up their new socialistic state, they would punish workmen or peasants who would not obey them. They were bound to have discipline and were bound to have the work done. Unfortunately, like all the rest of it, it does not get beyond words and the paper that it is printed on.

Senator WOLCOTT. According to their program, if people do not do like they want, shoot them; if they will not work, shoot them; if they will not work to suit them, shoot them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; but that is all, of course, because a great good is coming out of all this; and the fact that a few hundred people are killed, in their minds does not mean anything.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; of course, the worst tyrants that ever lived always appealed to the ultimate good in their behalf.

Maj. HUMES. What about the production of raw materials?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. As to the basic raw materials like coal, for instance, European Russia is not well provided with coal, to begin with. Coal has been in the Ukraine, and they have juggled with the transportation and juggled the situation with the Ukraine so that there is none coming from there.

The petroleum came from the Caucasus, but they brought about a political situation and an industrial situation in Baku by which no more petroleum is produced, and petroleum no longer comes up the Volga.

As for cotton, on account of the conditions in Turkestan, where the social war has been going on, and especially on account of the local religions and tribes there, cotton production has been very low, so that they have not cotton.

Food there is considerable of, in various points. There was food in the south of Russia. There is food in the north of Caucasus. There is food in Siberia. But the political situation which they have brought about and the breakdown of transportation have made it impossible to tap that food; and more than that, there is food in the hands of peasants, and would be more—that is the chief difficulty—but their treatment of the peasants has made it impossible for them to get any food into the towns. The peasants will not give up the food, in the first place, because no goods are exchanged, nothing but money, and money is valueless. In the second place, they will not give it up at the fixed prices, which bear no relation to the other things which they have to buy.

In Siberia, where there was much food, but under the Bolshevik régime I have been in towns where it was very difficult to obtain, and yet close outside of those towns there was plenty of food, but the peasants did not bring it in. We had meat brought to our house in Irkutsk by a peasant girl who had raised the calf and killed it and brought it in to sell. She was stopped by a Red Guard, who took the calf away from her. She said that she was a peasant girl, and she said, "I am going to take this calf in and sell this meat." She said, "I am a poor girl, and I am going to sell this meat." The Red Guard said, "You will have to sell it to me and you will have to sell it at the normal, set price for meat." She refused to do this, and the result was a battle of words between her brother, who happened to be fairly good sized, and herself, and this man; so that finally the calf, in that instance, was given up, and we ate it.

Maj. HUMES. Go on with any other phase of the economic situation that you have in mind and are familiar with.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Evidently here it is very difficult for people living under normal circumstances, as we do, to make any picture of life there. In the towns like Petrograd and Moscow, as soon as you come into them you immediately mark a strangeness. In Petrograd, in September, the town in the first place was very empty. As many people had gone away as could. The streets, which are very wide and fine, were almost empty. A sorrowful aspect over the whole place was very terrible. When I arrived there I fortunately had food with me, as every one else had. Everyone brought his food. An old servant of the house where I lived offered to share her one-eighth of a pound of black bread with me, so that I had a chance to see how big that portion was.

As far as the theaters are concerned, it is often urged that the theater is an amusement place, and as the theaters are running, life there must be normal. I can only say that some of my principal lessons in the Russian language were taken from one of the best actors there—one of the second-rate actors, I mean, who never played the first rôle—of the Alexander Theater of Petrograd, and that he was heart-broken over the whole matter, and recounted to me the reaction of all his actor friends to it, and I was able in the theater afterwards to see the reaction on the performance of these people. These theaters, like the Art Theater of Moscow, which is perhaps the cleverest in the world, seen in 1918 and seen in 1917 were two different pictures; and doubtless the people act in order to get bread, but there is no heart in it.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the normal size of Petrograd?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Petrograd and Moscow are nearly the same size—2,000,000 apiece. Population in war time swelled by the influx of refugees.

Senator OVERMAN. When you left there, how many people were left in Petrograd?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not know. I have seen and heard estimates, but I have no way to tell except by the general aspect of the town and the lack of people on the streets; no more movement, no life, no "go" about it; the shops, many of them, boarded up.

Senator OVERMAN. Did the people leave the city on account of the terror?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Terror and lack of food.

Senator OVERMAN. It is so in Moscow also?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Moscow was a little better placed, because Moscow is nearer the center of the country and it has more railroad lines running into it, and is nearer the food-producing area. When I speak of the better class of people I do not refer to the old court, necessarily, at all. The favorite comparison is made now as if Russia was only in two parts, the old court and the new Bolsheviks, and as if the Bolsheviks had made the Russian revolution, which they did not; but it was made by those people, liberal people of all kinds, people who have been fighters against the old régime in bygone days.

Senator OVERMAN. Where did those better people go; where did the merchants and bankers and men of substance go when they left the city?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Most of them ran to Scandinavia. Some of them went to the Ukraine, some of them into the Baltic Provinces, which at that time were better places. Some ran to Finland, but that got difficult because the Finns did not want more people over there. They had too little food themselves.

The better class, the richer class, including some of the wealthiest class, whom Lenine thought he had broken, are to-day to be found in Copenhagen, London, Paris, living along quite all right, while some of the finest of the old Liberals and strugglers are living in Moscow in apartments, like some friends of mine there, not knowing when they will have to get out of the apartment; having people thrust on them; being peremptorily told that this and that man will come and live with them to-morrow; and on their saying, "We have not any room; every room is occupied," being told, "Well, you will have to double up." They may never have seen this man, but that makes no difference. One has no personal liberty. And then, as they have grown more desperate the terror has increased, and there comes the constant risk that one's life may be taken.

Maj. HUMES. Have you any idea how many of those people came to this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think comparatively few came to this country, because it was very difficult to get passports, very difficult to get out—to get out through the west gate. To get out through the gate running from Petrograd to Stockholm you had to get a passport from the Swedes before you could leave Russia, because Sweden had a rationing of food and did not want to take refugees, and if you could get your passport from America, then you took it to the Swedish and Norwegian authorities, and then with those and a Bolshevik passport you could presumably leave and get away if you could pass the German blockade on the Baltic Sea on the way across.

It is rather interesting, since the international point of view of these people does not seem to be comprehended here, and the fact that they worked for an international movement, to recount the story of how Mr. Ransome went to Stockholm. He is an English writer of very considerable brilliance and he was in very close relation with the Bolshevik government. I have not seen him doing so, but some of our Americans reported to me seeing him in the Bolshevik foreign office chatting and shaking hands with the German representatives. That, of course, was perfectly in line with his creed, which he never denied, so far as I know, of being an internationalist and not recognizing the German as his enemy.

He came to the Swedish consul general one day in Moscow and asked the consul general for a passport—to visé his Bolshevik passport; not his usual passport, but his Bolshevik courier's passport; that is, the passport of a courier carrying documents, which covers the courier and the documents in a sealed bag, which he carries. He did not show his British passport. He had a Bolshevik passport. He asked for a visé on this. The Swedish consul general looked at him and said, "Why, you are an Englishman." He said, "Yes." He said, "There is no use my viséing your passport. You will get on that boat and they (the Germans) will put you off at Helsingfors," which was the prominent point where their boats stopped. "They will take you off the boat there." He said, "No; they will not." The consul general said, "I am not going to make a fool of myself and visé your passport." Ransome came again and was refused in the same way. The consul general said there was no use to talk about it. He said, "You will be arrested. I do not care to be foolish about it."

Finally he came a third time, and he had with him Mr. Karl Radek, who was the representative of the Bolshevik foreign commissariat in charge of western European affairs, whose name has prominently figured in the Bolshevik group in Germany recently as directing their operations or advising with them. Mr. Radek told the Swedish consul general that they wanted Mr. Ransome's passport viséd. He was told by the consul general, "It is useless for me to do that. The Germans will take him off, with a passport viséd. They know he is an Englishman." Mr. Radek said, "You leave that to us. Mr. Ransome is going out to the outside, to tell the truth about our work." This is rather interesting, at a time, of course, when no messages for any of the allied countries could pass out, nor could the newspaper correspondents pass out except at great risk, through underground channels; yet to tell the truth about their movement Mr. Ransome was being sent by the Bolsheviks, and on his voyage to Sweden guaranteed against capture by the Germans, to do this work.

Senator WOLCOTT. As a sequel to that, did Mr. Ransome—I do not know anything about the man, but did he get out with the rest of the world?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; he got out into Stockholm. I do not know where he is now. In Stockholm, I suppose he is.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether he is writing any articles for the papers for publication?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; I think so.

Senator WOLCOTT. Any that are being published in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; he is a very interesting writer.

Senator WOLCOTT. From what you say, we are entitled to say that anything Mr. Ransome puts out in this country over his name is the expression of an agent of this Bolshevik bunch of people in Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It is certainly the expression of a man whom they regard as a good propagandist, or interpreter of their spirit and work; yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you seen any of his articles in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir; I have not.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you observed in this country, since your return, any Bolshevik propaganda going on—any appearance of it in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have been here a short time, and I have made very little study of the matter up to this time, since I have been mostly engaged with the organization of my own work, which is Russian-American trade relations, preparing for the future. It seems to me, though, that this is not a case for fine-drawn distinctions. If it be urged that the Bolshevik Government is honest and fair and true, if it be urged by speakers here that it be recognized and dealt with, when you had read to you this morning that its object is to upset every government in the world—to urge people to have such friendly relations with it is tantamount to urging them to have relations with an agency which contemplates their ultimate destruction. Unless it has repealed and taken back these principles which it has, all along, been enunciating (of which I do not know), by actual design or favorable consideration and the condoning of the terror it seems to me one makes it easier for these same people to then spread the doctrines which they preach, and which there is no hypocrisy about, it being a matter of public record in our country and other countries.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you notice, when you were over there, any effort to make propaganda of these and other doctrines in other countries?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Constantly. That is the chief thing they have tried to do—the chief thing they have done up to this time.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you going to some other subject now, Major?

Maj. HUMES. I was going to take that right up.

Are you familiar with any particular instances where the agencies of the Bolsheviki régime went into neutral countries for the purpose of carrying their propaganda, financed from Russia?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. When I was in Sweden in September, it was brought to my attention by a Socialist friend, who arrived on a boat from Petrograd, that the former commissar of finance, Mr. Gukovsky, had come on that boat with a young lady, and Mr. Gukovsky had 18 trunks and the young lady was reported to have had three, and the chief contents of the trunks, or one of the chief articles contained in the trunks, was said to be upward of 60,000,000 rubles of old currency, or at least currency printed on the dies of the old régime—the fine old bills. Those bills were worth in Stockholm at that time, where there was a considerable market, about 52/100 of a Swedish crown, depending upon the market, whereas the new so-called Kerensky money, printed from the new designs, was only 41/100 of a crown. The small shin plaster “kerenki,” in denominations of 20 and 40 rubles, brought about 30/100 of a Swedish crown.

Maj. HUMES. What is the money of the Bolshevik régime worth, then?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. At that rate, that quantity of money would represent something like 30,000,000 Swedish crowns, or by the exchange of that day, about 10,000,000 American dollars, for propaganda purposes.

Senator OVERMAN. For Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. For propaganda purposes. For propaganda purposes in Sweden they had a legation. I did not go into it, but of course many people have been in it. They had there a score of people.

In Copenhagen they had another such legation. In Bergen they had their agent; but chiefly in Copenhagen and Stockholm they had large legations that were steadily at work all the time putting out propaganda into the Swedish and Danish nations, with the idea of catching the workmen in those countries.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of any effort in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have made very little study of it, sir; but there are appearing lately, apparently in the last few days, journals which I have seen, which certainly advocate a very friendly attitude toward the Bolshevik, in which certain articles, written by them, appeared. As, for instance, a journal called “The Liberator,” in which an article by Mr. Lenine appeared; and others like that, advocating their system, have appeared.

Senator OVERMAN. It seems from what you say that they have a large fund outside of Russia for this propaganda work in order to overturn all the governments of the world.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. That is my understanding.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you think they go into England and Germany also, with their propaganda?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I know that they have been in Germany, working as hard as they can. In England they are working, yes, too.

Senator OVERMAN. And in France?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; oh, yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Coming back to this man Ransome—what is his full name?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think his first name is Arthur. I do not know any other name.

Senator WOLCOTT. It runs in my mind, in a rather hazy way, that I have seen some articles in newspapers in this country by that man.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. He wrote for the New York Times, for a service in which they were partakers, and for a long time, I was told by one of their editors, they printed his articles because they thought they were interesting and because it gave the other side of the story. They said they used to print them and put a headline over them explaining who he was. I have never seen that. I was not here at that period.

Senator WOLCOTT. He came out of Russia when?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I could get the exact date, perhaps, out of a diary or a notebook. I should think it was in July.

Senator WOLCOTT. In 1918?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; maybe in August.

Senator WOLCOTT. Apparently the Russian Bolshevik official who induced the Swedish consul to visé his passport had some connection with the German authorities which was of such nature that this man Ransome would be allowed to go on to his destination, showing that there was some connection between the Bolsheviks and somebody in Germany. Were the Spartacans at that particular time in the ascendancy in Germany?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; the change in Germany had not taken place. Their relations were founded upon a treaty of peace and comity.

Senator WOLCOTT. Oh, yes; that was in July, 1918. Of course, that was before the armistice?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes. That treaty was with the Imperial German Government.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Kaiser was still on the throne?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. They carried the red flag. That is what it means, "the Reds"? Is that what these Bolsheviks carry?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The flag is, of course, simply of the socialist revolution.

Senator OVERMAN. It is simply revolutionary?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Do the socialists carry it, also?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And do the I. W. W. carry it, also?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. The I. W. W. have a red flag, the Bolsheviks have a red flag, and the socialists have a red flag. What does that all mean—the red flag? Is it just an emblem of revolution?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It means not always the same thing.

Senator OVERMAN. On the railroads something like that means danger ahead. On automobiles, in the rear, it means danger.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the case of the Bolsheviks it means internationalism without regarding nationality, and the spirit of the social revolution throughout the world.

Senator OVERMAN. What does it mean with the socialists?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. In the case of the socialists, in the case of the honest socialists, as far as I understand it—of course I am defining it as an outsider—it means a symbol of the emancipation of society which they hope to achieve by honest methods.

Senator OVERMAN. What does it mean in the I. W. W.?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not know about the I. W. W. I have not been in contact with that organization.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not very significant that all these associations have the same flag, the red flag?

MR. HUNTINGTON. That has occurred to me, but I have not followed it.

Senator OVERMAN. That they all should adopt one flag, is not that significant?

Maj. HUMES. At the time of the Ransome incident, is it not true that the Bolshevik government had an ambassador in Germany?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Oh, yes; they had—

Maj. HUMES. That was after the treaty of peace, and they were officially represented in Germany?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Yes; they were in friendly relations with Germany. There was no reason in the world why they should not have relations with Germany after the signing of the treaty of peace with them.

Maj. HUMES. So that they were at that time on friendly terms with the German Government and in touch with the German Government through their diplomatic service?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Oh, yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know what sort of flag the nihilists have? Is that a red flag also?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I do not know.

Senator OVERMAN. And how about the anarchists?

MR. HUNTINGTON. The anarchists have a black flag.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether or not there are any speakers or writers in this country who are acting in the interests of this world-wide Bolshevik movement?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I do not know. I only can tell anything at all by reading the speeches and contributions of people in the press, and where they appear to be not only friendly to the Bolshevik government, but to desire that it be aided and helped; and either they do this in ignorance or they do it hoping that the ideals of the so-called soviet government will be realized in this country or other countries where they may be working.

Senator WOLCOTT. At all events, you do see in the public prints in this country, at one time and another, things that are entirely in harmony with these Bolshevik expressions?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you go to this meeting at Poli's Theater that people have been talking about?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Was that speaking there in line with that?

MR. HUNTINGTON. What was done there was very definite. There were two speakers, a gentleman and a lady, who each one in his own way handled this question, and who spoke from experience in Russia, and who praised the movement there, and who justified its activities there.

Senator OVERMAN. Were they American citizens?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I think so.

Senator WOLCOTT. They had just come from Russia?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I do not know how lately. I do not know the exact date of their arrival here; within a few months, I think.

Senator WOLCOTT. My recollection is that that meeting was a meeting that was called for the purpose of telling the people here in the Capital the truth about Russia. Was not that the express purpose of the meeting?

MR. HUNTINGTON. That was the caption in the newspaper advertisement.

Senator WOLCOTT. They used the same phrases exactly as were employed by the Bolshevik man over in Russia when he was inducing the Swedish consul to visé the passport of Mr. Ransome, who, according to the Bolsheviki, was going out into the world to tell the truth about Russia?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Were you present at that meeting?

MR. HUNTINGTON. In Washington, here?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

MR. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. What do you say as to the statements made by those persons being the truth about Russia?

MR. HUNTINGTON. Well, I took careful note of many of them, and it seemed to me that, in the light of my own knowledge, they were not true, at all. What this was founded on, whether on poor observation or ignorance of the subject or willful misrepresentation, I do not know; but I do not believe that the audience heard the truth about Russia.

Maj. HUMES. Do you or do you not know, as a fact, that the man who spoke on that occasion came to this country purporting to officially represent the Bolshevik government?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I do not know. I have heard that, but I do not know of my own knowledge.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know from your own knowledge of an attempt made, while you were in Russia, by an emissary of the Bolshevik government to present credentials of the Bolshevik government in this country?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I know of it simply because of having been employed in the American Embassy, that there was a request made by the Bolshevik commissar of foreign affairs, the date of which I do not recall, since it was not my business—it was told to me as a matter of interest only by another whose business it was—to accredit Mr. John Reed as consul general of the people's soviet government in New York.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he the man that is interned now?

Maj. HUMES. No; he has been indicted.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was it his wife that was at this meeting, speaking?

MR. HUNTINGTON. I understand so.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did she call herself Mrs. Reed?

Maj. HUMES. No; Louise Bryant was the name she went by here.

Senator WOLCOTT. She is the wife, then, of an aspirant to the office of consul of the Bolsheviki?

Senator OVERMAN. Did she speak here?

Maj. HUMES. Yes, sir; under the name of Louise Bryant.

Senator OVERMAN. I noticed a communication in that document you had, from John Reed?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And there is one from Lenine.

Maj. HUMES. Can you point out some of the erroneous statements that were made by these two speakers at the meeting in question? I do not want to go over their addresses in detail, but just as you think of them, just the high spots.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If that would be of value, I have notes, but not with me, on that. I could take those up if it should be thought desirable to do so.

Maj. HUMES. I do not know whether the committee would care to take that up in detail or not.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think it is rather long.

Senator OVERMAN. I think he has told generally about it—that it is the Bolshevik doctrine that they are preaching there, and it is not true.

Maj. HUMES. You stated a few moments ago that the Bolsheviki were represented in Germany by an ambassador. What other country received ambassadors or ministers?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They had relations with the neutral Scandinavian countries, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, and they also had relations with Holland and Switzerland. Holland's minister has left, and the Swedish minister and all the consular officers have been recalled, and I understand the Norwegian also, and it has since appeared in the papers that the Danish minister appeared in Paris at the peace conference. The papers also stated that the Swiss minister had some difficulty in getting away. I can not say whether he has finally left or not.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether this Bolshevik movement is in Switzerland, Norway, and Denmark?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They are all free countries, all democratic countries, and from time immemorial Switzerland has been a country in Europe where people might say what they liked, and take refuge, and these people have enjoyed Switzerland's hospitality like many others.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there an effort to infuse that doctrine among the Swiss?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Most decidedly.

Maj. HUMES. You said something with reference to graft in Russia. What do you know about the question of graft in the present régime?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Well, I can only repeat the words of a business man who was trying to do business there. When I asked him that question, he stated he had never found it so expensive to do business as now. As a matter of fact, the places in the ministry, or so-called commissariats, are filled by chance men, and these men are changed often, and lots of times these men are simply men who have never had much opportunity in life, and therefore perhaps have not built up strong characters or principles, and also because they think they may need the money. As a matter due to the lack of morality, and an anarchical condition, the use of money for such purposes is very frequent and usual.

Senator OVERMAN. Was not that so under the old régime, that there was bribery and corruption?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There always has been in Russia, which partakes of the Orient in that way, but never to such an extent as now.

Senator OVERMAN. If you wanted things done you would have to grease them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes: but strangely enough under the monarchy the bargain was observed, and if the grease had been given, as a rule it was thoroughly standardized—if you will overlook my apparent cynicism—and the promise that was given was kept, while at present people have no hesitancy in accepting money and turning on the giver, which seems to be a little worse than the other, although neither is defensible. The difficulty under the old régime was the oriental character of the people, and was in many places also due to the low pay of the government officials, who came to regard these fees which they received as a part of their income. An official in the ministry of commerce, we will say, through whose hands certain applications and papers passed, and who by signing a paper quickly could forward it and get a matter through, instead of the slow progress it usually made, would accept a fee for it, salving his conscience by saying that he ought to receive it from the government, and since they did not pay it he would take it from these men.

Senator WOLCOTT. Coming back to this Washington meeting for a moment. You say you were down there and took notes. While there was praise of the soviet government of Russia, was there or not any criticism or denunciation of our form of government in this country?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I was at the meeting from 2 o'clock until about half past 4. That was the period of the two speeches and of the introduction. There was no more criticism of our form of government in that time, as far as the introducer or the speakers were concerned, than would be usual in a political discussion on their part. During the period I was there the criticism was only by implication; that is, they defended and advocated and urged aid for and consideration for, and justified, a government whose avowed purpose is to overthrow ours. They did not, during the time I was there, say anything directly about the overthrow of the Government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Doctor, do you know anything of an incident or a rather gruesome thing that occurred in Russia that had to do with throwing some dukes or grand dukes down into a well and firing hand grenades in on them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. There was a thing of that kind reported in the Ural Mountains, in the city of Ekaterinburg, which is a sort of capital in the Urals, a city of some size, and a mining center. It was in this city that the Czar and his family were confined. Also grand dukes had been confined there, and some others at times. The letter, written in November by an American business man, who was there, states it as a fact that this was done, and that the bodies were recovered. That is all I know.

Senator WOLCOTT. How many of them were thrown in there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not know.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was it into a well that the letter stated they were thrown?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. And hand grenades thrown on them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Thrown on them; yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And all of them killed in there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; that was the account.

Senator OVERMAN. How is the treatment of women and children?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Why, nothing special. The Bolshevik theory of government, which has got all the liberal innovations—the good with the bad, all kinds, of course—is the equal rights of women. The practice is all right toward them as far as any attention is paid at all to the women and children, except the women and children of the former so-called upper classes, who are considered as class enemies and who may be let alone or who may be arrested. The Official Gazette of September 5, which I did not read this morning but of which you have a copy, said that they arrested Kerensky's wife and children as hostages. There are reports that the children have been killed. I could not state.

Senator OVERMAN. They regarded men and women as equals, and if they imposed cruelties on men they treated the women the same way, taking the property away from them?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Certainly, as far as that is concerned.

Senator OVERMAN. They made no difference with women, either for or against?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; except that the women come less in contact with them from the fact of having more to do at home. They come under the tyranny; as friends of mine did who were called before a commissar and were told that they must take men into their quarters to live there; and they may be embarrassed by them living in small places, and not being able to be shut off from people whom they have never seen. I do not know of anything besides that, out of my personal knowledge. I know—not personally, but by an account given by another—that in Moscow many women were imprisoned, and in a particular instance a Russian lady in whose house a British diplomatic representative lived, was in the same prison and described the conditions. That is all I know of any particular case.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there any considerable number of women in the army over there?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir. There was the so-called women's battalion under the government of Kerensky, which doubtless represented on their part, or at least of part of them, a noble striving, and on the part of others a spirit of adventure; but it had no material weight in the scale at all.

Senator OVERMAN. There was not any considerable number?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Any questions, Major?

Maj. HUMES. I have no other questions at this time.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If there is anything else that I can tell you, I am at your disposal.

Senator OVERMAN. Thank you. If we need any other testimony, we shall call on you.

Now, is there any other witness that you can put on this afternoon?

Maj. HUMES. Yes, sir; Mr. Harper.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SAMUEL N. HARPER.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Harper, where do you live?

Mr. HARPER. Chicago.

Maj. HUMES. In what business or profession are you engaged?

Mr. HARPER. I am a teacher in the University of Chicago.

Maj. HUMES. Have you during a number of years past given special attention to Russia and to Russian conditions and Russian history?

Mr. HARPER. My special topic of study has been Russia. My official title in the university is assistant professor of Russian language and institutions. I have devoted the major portion of my time during the last 15 years to the study of Russian institutions, Russian history, and Russian political movements.

Maj. HUMES. How much time have you spent in Russia during that period?

Mr. HARPER. An aggregate, I should say, of about four years, but it has been spread out. I have been able to go to Russia frequently by arrangements with the university or other institutions with which I have been connected. I have made to Russia 12 visits, varying in length from two to six months.

Maj. HUMES. When were you last in Russia?

Mr. HARPER. In 1917. I arrived in Russia the end of June, 1917, and left the end of September of that same year, 1917.

Maj. HUMES. That was during the so-called Kerensky régime?

Mr. HARPER. Yes. I arrived when Prince Lvoff was still prime minister of the first provisional government.

Maj. HUMES. Have you during the last few years been in the service of the Government in connection with any Russian work?

Mr. HARPER. I have not been in the service of the Government in the sense of being officially appointed as a Government official or attached officially to an embassy, but in my last two visits to Russia, in 1916 and 1917, I offered my services to the ambassador, and my services were used occasionally as an interpreter. But I have had no official connection with the Government in the sense of being appointed to a definite task or being paid for a definite piece of work.

Maj. HUMES. Now, Professor, will you outline the changes in the Government of Russia, commencing with the overthrow of the monarchical government, the different forms of government, and the theories of government of the different régimes?

Mr. HARPER. The form of government before the revolution was somewhat difficult to define in our terms.

Maj. HUMES. What do you mean by revolution?

Mr. HARPER. Before the revolution of March, 1917. The head of the state was an emperor so that we call it a monarchical form of government. The fundamental laws, what would be our Constitution, spoke of him as an autocrat. There had been instituted since 1905 a representative elective assembly, the Duma, elected not by direct suffrage, but elected on a system of elections by which all groups of the population were represented, though not in proportion to their number. It was in that sense a representative body. It had legislative functions, but it did not have much control over the administration. In view of the fact that they had a legislature elected, it was technically called a constitutional form of government, though in actual practice the parliament had very little independent voice in the affairs of the country. It had no control over the administration. It did control legislation to a certain extent.

This institution was introduced in 1905. From the very start there was conflict between what was called the government, that is the executive, and this legislative body. The first Duma sat only two months and was dissolved. The second Duma sat only two months and was dissolved. A change in the election law was introduced by which a larger share in the voting and dominant control of the elections was secured to the landlord and manufacturing classes in the third Duma.

Senator WOLCOTT. That change in election law was made by whom?

Mr. HARPER. It was made by the sovereign, by the Emperor, and this was quite distinctly a coup d'état. It was an infringement of the constitution—the fundamental laws.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was not made by the legislative body of the nation?

Mr. HARPER. No. It was made by the sovereign.

Senator WOLCOTT. Had this Duma any real legislative power?

Mr. HARPER. In the fundamental law one clause read that no measure could become a law without the sanction of the imperial council—which was an upper house, half appointed and half elected—and the Imperial Duma. Various devices were used to get around that provision. I will cite just one. In the fundamental law there was also a provision that in the event of emergency the administration or executive could introduce a measure, and could apply that measure immediately, the provision being made, however, that within 60 days after the reconvening of the legislature the measure must be submitted to the legislature.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was it under the emergency provision that the Czar proclaimed the change in this election law that you spoke of?

Mr. HARPER. No; he did not. In the manifesto dissolving the second Duma and introducing the new electoral law, though I do not recall the words exactly, he pointed out that this second Duma had not proven worthy; that the system of election was faulty; and he appealed to his historic right to change the law. It was frankly a coup d'état.

This third Duma was elected, if I remember correctly, in 1907. It went through its full period of five years, but toward the end of its session, despite the fact that it had been elected under this new law which gave to the propertied classes the majority of the seats in the electoral colleges that elected the Duma—it was an indirect election—the Duma developed an oppositionary spirit.

During the elections for the fourth Duma in 1912—I happened to be in Russia at the time—the administration was able, through its local officials, to exercise a very definite control over the elections, and the fourth Duma had even a larger majority of the landlord and manufacturing classes. They were politically the more conservative element of the community, and this election law was a very interesting law in that it definitely provided for representation of all groups of the population. I avoid the word "class," and call them groups—economic groups. The Russian community had been divided into economic groups very rigidly for a great many generations. The system of taxation was perhaps the most important factor behind this distribution of the population into economic groups. Roughly, a man who was a landlord owning a large estate would be in the landlord group; the manufacturer would be in the manufacturers' group. There would also be the workmen group and the peasant group. Those were the largest groups. The clergy were also a group by themselves, the basis not being economic entirely, although to a certain extent, because the clergy under the old régime received not only a salary but were assigned a certain amount of land, which the village priest either cultivated himself or had cultivated, and that was part of his means of subsistence.

This electoral law provided for the representation of each of those groups, and it provided that the peasants must elect a peasant representative from their own number to this assembly. Without going into the detail of that law, the result was that one found in the fourth Duma, on the eve of the war, landlords, one found manufacturers, one found peasants—that is to say, men who came from the villages—and one found workmen who were elected under this electoral system from the factories. In one sense it was a very representative body, in that all groups had their spokesman, the basis of the law being that workmen's interests could be represented only by workmen, and peasants' interests by peasants.

Theoretically, then, all groups were represented, and it was a question of the weight that the electoral law gave to each group. If I am not mistaken, of the 450 members of the Duma, only 13 or 14 were workmen, and the peasants were about 80, one from each of the provinces, and some had slipped in in addition to the peasant deputies that had been elected under the provisions of the law from each province. Then the rest were professional men, men of the liberal professions, landlords or manufacturers, the landlord and manufacturing classes being given by the law a majority in the assembly.

The fourth Duma worked with the government for the first period of its existence, but very early, before the war, there developed the conflict between the Duma, representing the beginning of constitutionalism in Russia, and the government. This conflict was very bitter on the eve of the war. The first reports from Russia after the declaration or outbreak of war in August, 1914, spoke of a session of the Duma that was called. The Duma was called, was convened in extraordinary session, and the reports of the speeches there showed that all the leaders of the various parties in the Duma—and there were social democrats and reactionaries—were going to drop their political strife in support of the government, and the Duma voted the war appropriations asked for by the government.

When the war began to go against Russia, and members of the Duma saw the inefficiency with which the war was being conducted, they demanded a reconvening of the Duma, which took place in the early months of 1915, and at that meeting it was clear that conflict was again developing between the Duma and the government, not on the basis of any internal political questions, but on the basis of the acts and methods of the government in organizing the machinery for the prosecution of the war. This conflict took a sharper turn in the beginning of the second year of the war after the defeats and military disasters on the southwestern front, and in Poland particularly, and the Duma was convened but not allowed to sit for a very long period.

I left Russia, on my second visit since the outbreak of the war, in September, 1916, and by that date the conflict between the Duma and the government had become very definite, and those of us who were following that phase of the situation saw very many evidences pointing to an open conflict between the public, which was represented with the limitations that I have indicated in this Duma, and the government, or administration, the ruling group.

The history of the revolution, as given by Dr. Huntington, points out that during the period of the revolution itself, that first week, the Duma played a very important rôle, and it was from the committee of the Duma that the first provisional government was appointed, in collaboration—that is, after consultation—with the leaders in these other institutions, the soviets, that emerged from the first days of the revolution.

The first government after the revolution was the provisional government. It was called the provisional government, the word "provisional" indicating that it was not a permanent government, but provisional until the convening of a constituent assembly that would determine the form of government for Russia. This first provisional government was not in a technical and political sense responsible to anybody. It did not consider itself responsible to the Duma. This Duma committee had met during those first days of the revolution and selected this government, and continued to meet but really as a private gathering. The Duma was not abolished. It was a very moot question as to what the status of the parliament of the old régime was after the revolution. The government was not responsible to these new institutions, the soviets, that had grown up, that had emerged with the revolution, institutions organized definitely on the class basis, councils of workmen and soldiers and councils of peasants.

In the first provisional government there was one member who was at the same time the vice president of the central committee of the Petrograd council of workmen and soldiers' deputies, which was the first of the councils to emerge, and that was Kerensky, but he was not in there as the representative of the council, and he was not technically responsible to the soviets. This first provisional government was, therefore, as its name indicated, a provisional government exercising a kind of supreme authority. One could hardly call it a dictatorship, but it was not responsible to any legislative body. It recognized the influence of the soviets as shown by the facts that in the second month of the revolution two members of the government resigned largely because of the attitude and the criticisms of their policies and of their acts in the soviets. The soviets instituted themselves as the organization of what was known as the revolutionary democracy of the workmen, of the peasants, and of the soldiers. They did not pretend during those first two months of the revolution to exercise political power in the technical sense.

The resolution of the soviet executive council said definitely that they would support the provisional government so long as it clearly by its policies showed it was following a democratic line. The soviet constituted itself as a kind of watchdog over the provisional government.

After the resignation of the two ministers of the first provisional government, because of the attitude toward them of the soviets, the question of a frank coalition government in which should be represented members of all parties, was taken up, and the nonsocialists insisted on the formation of what is generally known as and what was specifically called in Russia a coalition government, in which there should be representatives of all parties, socialists, nonsocialists, and the socialist members who were in this coalition government were also members of the soviet.

Again, it was not a question of their being selected by the soviets, elected from the soviet to represent the soviets in the government. They merely recognized their personal responsibility to the soviet, and were constantly reporting to the soviet on their policies, appearing before the soviets, justifying their measures before the soviets. That was the coalition form of government that was introduced in June. It still called itself a provisional government, waiting for the constituent assembly to determine the final form of government in Russia. There were later changes in the composition of the provisional government at moments of crisis. At such moments of crisis many persons would resign, and there were a whole series of crises from July on. Other members would be brought in. The coalition idea was maintained, however, up to the time of the Bolshevik coup d'état, there being in the provisional government always representatives of the two main political groups or tendencies, the nonsocialists and the socialists.

We could hardly speak of that as a definite form of government. It was a provisional form of government to carry the country through the first months until the constituent assembly could be convened.

The revolution was in March, 1917. The date for the convening of the constituent assembly was fixed for September, 1917. That date was later postponed to December, 1917, the postponement being made when Kerensky, who was prime minister, saw that it would be impossible to conduct the election, not because no preparations had been made, but because the economic organization of the country had collapsed, and the war burdens and general disorganization of the country, not produced by the revolution entirely, but inherited from the old régime, made it impossible to carry out the reelections of local government bodies which were to take place before the general elections for the constituent assembly.

In July and August they started to reelect, under a new law, the local government bodies, the municipal councils, and what the Russians call their provincial councils, somewhat similar to our county councils, local government in rural as opposed to urban communities. These elections took place in July and August. The system of election was universal suffrage, direct vote, proportional representation. These new bodies were to be elected on the basis of election lists that were prepared during the registration of those first months. Then, one of their first tasks was to be the verification of the registration or election lists, so that on the basis of these verified election lists the election for the constituent assembly could take place.

We often hear the statement that the provisional government deliberately postponed the convening of the constituent assembly. I have personally felt that that statement was not a correct statement; that the reasons given for postponing were perfectly valid. The Kerensky government stated definitely, as I recall it, that it would be a mistake to sacrifice regularity of election in order to have the constituent assembly meet a little earlier. Those of us who were there at the time saw the confusion of the country, and knew that when there had been elections in Russia before they had been on a class basis, the community having been divided into groups; that there never has been held a general election; this was to have been the first general election in a country covering an enormous area and a large population. Taking those facts into consideration, I think that those of us who were there saw that it was a physical impossibility to have an election earlier, always having in mind the need for taking every precaution for the regularity of the elections.

It was just on the eve of the elections for the constituent assembly that the Bolsheviki accomplished their coup d'état. They had previously advocated frankly in their papers the overthrow of the provisional government and the passing of all power to the soviets. They were opposed to the idea of coalition, of cooperation between the socialists and nonsocialists, or, to use other terminology, between the proletariat and the bourgeois elements. They had opposed the provisional government on principle, and they had attacked it specifically for certain policies, and they had advocated that the soviets take over all political authority.

In the summer, in the time that I was there, the Bolsheviki did not definitely abandon the idea of a constituent assembly. It was sometimes rather difficult to reconcile their attacks on the Government for postponing the constituent assembly with their other statement that all power should pass to the soviets. It would seem that their idea was to play one against the other. By November it was evident that they had decided to play the first point of their program, the taking over of all power by the soviet, and that was what their coup d'état implied. The soviets were to take over forcibly the government and organize definitely a dictatorship of the proletariat for the period of transition to a new order of society, what they now call a socialistic federated soviet republic.

Senator OVERMAN. Who devised that scheme? Was it Lenine or Trotsky, or more intelligent men than either of them?

Mr. HARPER. That would be difficult to say. The two most outstanding intellectual forces, the two deepest thinkers, the two best known because of their records, are the two men Lenine and Trotsky, men who have been known in Russian revolutionary circles for a good many years.

Senator WOLCOTT. Trotsky also?

Mr. HARPER. Trotsky also. He was known as an active and prominent participant in the revolution of 1905, that was referred to this morning, and Lenine was prominent in the revolutionary movement. Both of the men, because of conditions in Russia, had lived abroad. Both of them were writers and publicists, had written books, and had contributed to—I believe they were even editors of—newspapers, organs representing the views of the Russian socialists.

The publications of the Russian socialists had to be printed abroad during the last 15 or more years. There had developed from a very early period in Russian revolutionary movements, from the fifties of the last century, what is known as the foreign press of Russia, publications in Russian published abroad but intended primarily for the Russian public, published abroad because of censorship conditions in Russia, smuggled into Russia by various methods. Lenine and Trotsky were prominent participants in this foreign literature, and all of them debated and carried on polemics in regard to the government. And in the congress of Russian socialist parties Lenine and Trotsky were prominent.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. HARPER. I did not know Trotsky personally. I of course know his writings, and I heard him speak on several occasions last summer. I did not know Lenine personally, although of course I had known of Lenine and of his name as far back as 1905.

Senator OVERMAN. Were they peasants?

Mr. HARPER. No; Lenine came from what is generally translated as the nobility class. That is hardly a correct translation. That is the class that includes the landlord class, but it includes many who are not landlords. Perhaps I could bring my point out more clearly by saying that a man who gets a university degree is by that very fact put into the nobility class though not hereditary nobility. The fact that he was in the nobility class did not mean that Lenine was a landlord or was sympathetic with that class. It meant that he was not a peasant. He was not a workman who had grown up from the peasantry, because a workman, in the modern sense of the word, is a comparatively new phenomenon in Russia. Russia had serfdom until 1861, and before that there was a very small percentage of free hired labor—wage earners. He was not a workman, nor a merchant registered as one of the merchant guild. He was not an artisan. He was in this other category, the nobility class.

Maj. HUMES. Is it not a fact that his occupation during all his life has been as an agitator? You have told us what he was not. What was he, in other words?

Mr. HARPER. His brother was involved in one of the earlier revolutionary movements, and I know this simply from the accounts of Lenine's history. The fact of his brother's past meant that he was watched particularly when he was a student in the university, and was subjected to police surveillance and supervision, as a very large percentage of the university students at that time participated in student demonstrations against the existing form of government; sometimes against the very severe regulations with regard to student activities and student life. It would seem that from the very start he was not only a socialist, but joined in the conspirative organizations that existed among the radical element of the Russian educated class—among university students particularly. He came to grief because of his publication work, his writings, and had to leave. I can not give the details. I believe he went to Siberia. Because of his revolutionary activities in 1903, he was one of the well-known thinkers and leaders of the Russian social democratic party. He was living abroad because conditions in Russia made it impossible for him to reside there.

Maj. HUMES. Let me ask the question in another way. How did he make a living? Did he have a competency?

Mr. HARPER. I presume he made a living as a writer.

Maj. HUMES. That was what I was trying to get at.

Senator OVERMAN. What is his racial extraction?

Mr. HARPER. He is a Russian; a Slav.

Senator OVERMAN. What is Trotsky?

Mr. HARPER. A Russian Jew—of Jewish origin.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is this man Tchitcherin?

Mr. HARPER. Tchitcherin, the present commissar of foreign affairs, is a Russian Slav, also of the nobility class.

Senator WOLCOTT. These three men are all in the nobility class?

Mr. HARPER. I can not give you the exact past of Trotsky. Legally they were in the nobility class, but that meant simply from our point of view that they were men of liberal education; writers.

Senator WOLCOTT. The nobility class, with respect to them, simply meant that they were educated?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. What universities were they from?

Mr. HARPER. I can not tell you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Russian universities?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Proceed, Professor.

Mr. HARPER. Shall I proceed on the question of the form of government?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. HARPER. They established, in November, this proletariat dictatorship under a definite program and tactics, to carry through the period of transition for the establishment of the socialist federated soviet republic. The theory of this soviet government—the soviet form of government, has already been outlined by Dr. Huntington. For the period of transition, the bourgeois class was to have no right to vote in the election of soviets, or to be elected to soviets. Only those who labored were to have a vote. That did not exclude intellectual thinkers, men who were in sympathy with the soviet idea, who were ready to cooperate with the idea and lend to the soviet their intellectual abilities. They were considered workers, but the constitution provided definitely that those who derived income from the exploitation of the labor of others, or from rents and profits, or interest, were to be excluded from participation in the elections, and were to be excluded also, it was definitely stated, from being elected.

Now, these soviets were to be local and central. The country was to be covered with a network of soviets built up from the smaller units. The villages were to elect soviets and delegates to the district soviets, which were in turn to send delegates to the soviets of the larger administration district, which was to send delegates to the all-Russian congress of soviets, which was to meet at certain intervals. The constitution provides that it was to meet at least twice a year. I believe since November, 1917, there have been six all-Russian congresses which have been convened more frequently because of the many problems during the transition period. These all-Russian congresses of soviets were to sit for as long as necessary to determine the broader lines of policy of legislation on the more important sides of public life, political, and economical, but they were not to be a permanent assembly. They were only to be, perhaps, periodically convened policy-making bodies, constitution-making bodies. They were to elect an executive committee which was to sit permanently and act as a kind of permanent parliament, which was in constant session.

The executive committee was responsible to the all-Russian congress, which as I have said was to meet at least twice a year, and has, in fact, met more frequently. The executive committee is to elect the commissars, or people's commissars, who correspond to the heads of the government departments, and the chairman of the councils of the people's commissars, who would in our western parlance be called the prime minister of the government.

The local soviets were to be allowed considerable freedom in the administration of local affairs, but they were to follow in their local administration the principles established by the resolutions of the all-Russian congress of soviets.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they form a constitution?

Mr. HARPER. The third congress drew up certain general resolutions for their organizations, and the fifth congress definitely voted a constitution. I have not seen that in the original, but I have seen translations of that constitution which have been published in America in English.

That is the theory of the soviet government. The champions of that theory point out that it provides for participation in local and central affairs of the workers, the peasantry, the workmen, and those who have thrown in their lot with the working class.

Senator OVERMAN. Is the soviet part of the Bolshevik government? Is it one and the same thing?

Mr. HARPER. In my opinion, it is one and the same thing. Efforts have been made to point out that the Bolsheviki are simply a political party as opposed to the institution of the soviets, and that at the present moment they merely have the majority in the local soviets and in the central soviets. The parallel is often drawn that the soviets are like a parliament of a western country, while the Bolsheviki are simply the majority party in that parliament. But inasmuch as the idea of turning over to the soviets all power of organizing the country on this soviet basis is the Bolshevik idea, opposing the idea of the other socialists' parties, and, of course, of the bourgeois parties. In actual fact I do not see what distinction can be made between the Bolsheviki and the soviets. In July of last year, or June, during the summer, we had in our American newspapers a report that the Bolsheviki had definitely by decree expelled from the soviets, from the central soviet or executive committee, and had issued an order of expulsion from the local soviets, of all the social democratic Mensheviki and the right social revolutionaries. I have not seen a Russian paper describing this fact in detail, though I have seen in one of the Russian papers published in this country a summary of the account of the meeting at which that decision was made, and I accepted the statements of those persons that have come out and the statements in this paper, as supporting the cable news that we had on that point.

I state again that the Bolsheviks definitely expelled from the soviet, from the executive committee of the soviet, and ordered the expulsion from their local soviets, of the right social revolutionaries and of the Menshevik social democrats, the pretext for the expulsion being that the two groups were counter-revolutionists and were working against the soviets, and their presence therefore could not be tolerated. In fact, they were counter to a revolution of the Bolshevik brand, not the revolution of March, 1917. One of the general facts that we can accept is that the right social revolutionaries and the Mensheviks have refused to go in with the Bolsheviks, and have opposed them, and in view of the expulsion of these members, because of their opposition to the program of the Bolsheviks and the use that the Bolsheviks have made of the soviets, or the way in which they have worked out the soviet form of government, it seems to me that one can not make a distinction between the soviets and the Bolsheviks.

Maj. HUMES. Well, doctor, can you outline from your study of the situation an authoritative opinion on the effect of the practical application of the Bolshevik government to the life of Russia?

Mr. HARPER. I left Russia, as I said, in September, 1917, before the Bolsheviks came into power. Inasmuch as Russian political institutions is my subject, I have followed with the greatest care the reports that have come out, either in our daily press, in the cable reports, or in articles contributed to our press by men who have come out from Russia. I have made it a point to talk with a great many of our Americans who have come out of Russia or neutrals who have come from Russia, and with Russians who have come out.

There have been two definite sets of statements with regard to what one might call the fruits of Bolshevism. I tried to study as carefully as possible those reports and, as I say, check up one statement against the other. There are these two sets of statements. In a general way one group says that the experiment is a great success; a success in the sense that it has the support of the workmen and peasants; a success in the sense that it is solving the economic problems of the country. Those that make these statements admit the great difficulty of the first months when there was the disorder, disorganization; a great deal of it not made by the Bolsheviks, but the accumulation of a great many decades of shortsighted policy of the old régime; a good deal of it a result of the war burdens; a good deal of it the inevitable result of the revolution of March, 1917.

As I say, the champions of the success of the experiment admit these difficulties, but insist that the Bolsheviks, largely through the support of the workmen and peasants, are solving these problems and are going to be able to start in, if they have not already done so, on constructive work.

The other set of statements gives a quite different picture. It points out the increase in the economic disruption of the country, and points out the failure of the efforts of the Bolshevik leaders to introduce constructive policies. The other set of statements points out the beginning of the definite disillusionment of the masses of workmen and peasants with this program that was to bring them to the promised land, peace, and bread.

As I say, naturally, I have been confused by these two conflicting reports, and have had to weigh the one against the other, taking into account the number that brought out one set of statements and the number that brought out the other.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is the only thing you have taken into account, the number?

Mr. HARPER. Because of the wider field of observation.

Senator WOLCOTT. And the character of the witness?

Mr. HARPER. I took into account the bias. If it was a business man, I took that into account. If it was a man who had been interested in radical movements, I recognized clearly that there was a spiritual background to the revolution and a very definite background to the revolution of March, 1917, that appealed not only to the radical but appealed to the liberal.

So I took into account that, and took into account of course my own knowledge of the earlier conditions of Russia and what I had seen up to September, 1917; and without hesitation, as a student, I have come to accept the statements that, first, the economic conditions in Russia have become insuperably worse; that the workmen and peasants are suffering as a result of the further economic disruption of the country; that it is not simply the bourgeois that have paid the cost of what I have considered an experiment, but that it is the workmen and peasants that are paying that cost, and that they are beginning to see that, though this Bolsheviki program sounded good, it has not proven good, and they are becoming disillusioned as to the soviet and the Bolsheviki.

Senator OVERMAN. What proportion of the Russian population do you think is behind this Bolsheviki movement?

Mr. HARPER. In percentages it is rather difficult to say, for the total population. Now that the peasants have received more land, I do not think they are back of the Bolsheviki movement, the political program, because it has not brought order or economic development. I have had from a great many people the statement that the peasants have definitely in certain districts kicked out the soviets, even the peasants in those districts that are in the area controlled from a military point of view by the Bolsheviki or central Soviet; that they have kicked out the soviet because they did not like the way it ran things. There was too much graft. And the peasants have gone back to their former system of an elected elder. The resentment of the peasants toward the Bolsheviki is of a more definite character in those districts where the red guards have gone to the peasant villages to seize the grain. I should say, on the basis of the information that has come to me, which I have gone over very carefully, that the larger percentage of the peasantry has gone against the Bolsheviki. The Bolsheviki recognized that the peasants were interested first of all in land, and in their previous discussions of how they would act if an opportune moment came, they definitely stated that there would be this peasant antagonism toward their proletarian dictatorship, but they definitely said that that antagonism would be allayed by the turning over of the land, and they also had the definite idea of stirring up in each village a class war between the more prosperous elements of the village and the poorer elements of the village. In the first decrees of the Bolsheviki government they never used the words "Government of the workmen." They used the expression, "The workmen and the poor peasants." They made a distinction between the more prosperous peasants of the community and the poorer peasants, men who perhaps have no land of their own because they had been unfortunate and were at the bottom of the economic scale in that particular community.

Senator OVERMAN. We are trying to get what is going on in this country. Do you know anything of Bolshevism in this country—any movement in this country for Bolshevism?

Mr. HARPER. May I define Bolshevism for myself?

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to have it for myself.

Mr. HARPER. AS I have read the accounts with regard to Russia, and talked with those who have come out, and heard speeches in regard to Russia by those who have come out, or read the discussion of the Russian problem, this word "Bolshevism" has been used, in my belief, to represent two distinct things. It has been used frequently to mean a state of mind. I know before the Bolsheviks came into power in Russia, when the Bolsheviks were agitating in September, 1917, I often heard the expression "The country is going Bolshevik. There is a great deal of Bolshevism in this country."

Senator WOLCOTT. Speaking of this country?

Mr. HARPER. No; Russia. There was confusion of mind as to how to solve the many problems. And I now read in our papers with regard to America, about the spread of Bolshevism in the United States. As I have discussed such a point where it has been made, I find that they speak simply of confusion of mind as to just how we are going to solve the problems before us, problems of our own, problems with regard to the reconstruction, problems with regard to the settlement of the war. In that sense I believe there is a great deal of Bolshevism in the United States.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to say that I never heard it used in that sense, simply to express the idea that we do not clearly see our future and how we shall solve the problems of the country.

Senator OVERMAN. Why not look at it from the way we have been treating it, the idea of overthrow of all the governments of the world: not only the United States but other governments of the world; chaos?

Mr. HARPER. I have not heard, myself, any preaching of the doctrine of the Bolsheviks, the overthrow of the Government in America, as I heard it frankly preached by word of mouth and in the press in Russia. I have read in their papers that the experiment in Russia has been very successful and has been of the greatest interest and the greatest value.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you think about it?

Senator WOLCOTT. About the success of the experiment?

Mr. HARPER. I consider that it has been a failure from the point of view of the peasant and the workman; that it has not brought—

Senator WOLCOTT. It has also been a failure from the point of view of national obligation—performing a national duty—has it not?

Mr. HARPER. It meant, of course, the withdrawal of Russia from the war, because it was clear to such leaders as Kerensky that one could not carry on the foreign war and an internal class war at the same time. That was why Kerensky, for example, stood for the principle of coalition government on principle; not simply because of the existing conditions, but on the principle of cooperation of the groups of the population. Now, the declaring of a class war and the putting into practice of the principle of class warfare inevitably would lead to the withdrawal of Russia from participation in the war in which Russia was then a participant.

Senator OVERMAN. Doctor, we have what we call nihilists, anarchists, I. W. W.'s, socialists, and Bolsheviki in this country. You have heard of those things. As a student and as a thinker, do you see any relation between those five organizations?

Mr. HARPER. Nihilists is a name that has been used in a very loose way to apply to all Russian revolutionists. There were in Russia in the sixties, the last century, a group that were called by another person, by a writer, nihilists. They never accepted the name, but they were called by their opponents nihilists.

Senator OVERMAN. Did not the Bolshevists come from the nihilists?

Mr. HARPER. There is the element of nihilism in the Bolsheviki. The nihilists about 1860 were the people that had gone through the most oppressive régime in recent times, the police régime of Nicholas I, which had created in the younger generation the spirit of protest. The Russian writer, Turgenev, spoke of them as "the Nihilists." They represented this protest against the conditions of the previous régime, of the previous reign. It was one of the most violent of the protests, but it was in its first stage an intellectual movement, a mental protest. It was only later that it developed into a political movement, and many of those who were in the student organizations which were called by Turgenev "nihilists" later became members of frankly revolutionary political organizations, such as the land and liberty. There was a series of political parties, revolutionary parties, with different programs, from 1860 on.

Senator OVERMAN. Is not that all developed in the Bolsheviki, the protest and this fight for the majority, a fight against those that have, to give to those that have not?

Mr. HARPER. There is this element of protest in Bolshevism; a protest against the existing order, the injustice of the existing order.

Senator OVERMAN. Is not that so with the I. W. W.?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not so with the socialists?

Mr. HARPER. A protest against the injustice of the existing order.

Senator OVERMAN. So, then, there is a relationship between all five of them, and most of them have the same flag?

Mr. HARPER. They have the same red flag, but they differ as to program and as to tactics.

Senator OVERMAN. They differ as to many things, but in basic principles are they not the same?

Mr. HARPER. They represent a protest against what they consider the injustices of the present organization of society. Some of them go so far as to say that the present form of the organization of society can not be corrected, and must be overthrown and replaced by another.

Senator OVERMAN. The uniting of those five great organizations under the red flag in this country—do you consider it a menace?

Mr. HARPER. I think the fact that they use the red flag does not imply any actual unity. Many men are socialists who are not Bolsheviki. The Bolsheviki say that a great many socialists are not true socialists.

Senator OVERMAN. You are a student and a thinker. What is the reason that they all have this red flag?

Mr. HARPER. The first of the protests of this general character came in the early half of the last century. They used the red flag. I think it is little more than a tradition, and I have always looked upon the red flag as not the emblem of the Bolsheviki, the emblem of the socialists, the emblem of the I. W. W., but as representing this mental protest.

Senator OVERMAN. Does it not all at last come down to the idea of revolution?

Mr. HARPER. The word "revolution" is used with a great many qualifying adjectives, which are sometimes used to express ideas which it usually fails very carefully to express. We have industrial revolutions, political revolutions, and mental revolutions.

Senator OVERMAN. Revolution against the Government; of course that would mean industrial revolution.

Mr. HARPER. Revolution in the sense of overthrow of the existing form of government?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARPER. I do not think that can be said. Many men call themselves socialists and recognize the red flag as the flag of socialism, which will represent an effort to bring about changes of an economic and sometimes purely political character within the existing political order.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the I. W. W.? What is their idea?

Mr. HARPER. As far as I know, the program of the I. W. W. is to attempt by direct action to bring pressure upon the existing authorities for changes, but within the existing political system. I have not read I. W. W. literature definitely advocating the overthrow of the existing political order.

Senator OVERMAN. So that you think that there is no connection between them by reason of the fact that they have this red flag, which actually means a menace; no connection because they use a common flag.

Mr. HARPER. I think there is no connection. With regard to Russia I can say quite definitely that there are definite differences of program and tactics.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not think that there is much harm being done by the Bolsheviks in Russia?

Mr. HARPER. I do think there is an enormous amount of harm being done in Russia. But I consider that that experiment, this venture tried on Russia, exhausted by the first three years of the war, has cost the Russian people in wealth, in property, in values, I should say, and in lives, enormously.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you been over there to observe the conditions of the prosperous?

Mr. HARPER. I have not been in Russia since September, 1917.

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, are you familiar with any of the representations that are being made in this country by the Bolsheviki, as to whether or not they are true? In other words, is there a tendency or an effort on the part of some agitators to misrepresent the real facts, in their literature or in their publications?

Mr. HARPER. It seems to me that a general statement without any background, without any filling in of detailed facts, that the Bolshevik experiment has been a successful experiment, or if not entirely successful, is a hopeful experiment, is not a true picture of what has been going on in Russia since the Bolsheviks came into power. One gets that very general statement that it is a hopeful experiment, and one gets the more specific statement that it has been a successful experiment, developing that general idea by describing the election of the soviets, and not paying any attention to the statements that have been published by Americans who have come out, by neutrals who have come out, by Russians, as to the methods used by the Bolsheviks to control the elections.

Senator WOLCOTT. And you say you do not agree with those statements?

Mr. HARPER. I do not agree with those statements on that basis. In other words, I accept the other set of statements. It has been very difficult to decide between those two sets of statements. As I have said, it was my special study, and I have devoted my time and what intelligence I have to the verification back and forth. I give it as my personal opinion, based on a careful study, that the set of statements with regard to the Bolshevik experiment, the set of statements that describe it as having cost the country enormously in values, in lives, the set of statements that state that at last the workmen and peasants have become disillusioned, and are opposed to the soviet régime and the Bolshevik régime, that set of facts is the one that I have accepted. Of course, we have had misstatements back and forth. We have had a good many exaggerated statements from Russia, carried on our cables to the newspapers. We have had exaggerated statements or misstatements from both sides—from both groups.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not think we are getting the truth about Russia?

Mr. HARPER. It is difficult, of course, in view of the chaos, to get all the facts.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is there not one fact upon which they all agree, that the Bolsheviks have seized and confiscated property of individuals and have taken it over from the people, and run on a career of theft and robbery?

Mr. HARPER. According to our conceptions here in this country, on that point there is no difference of opinion. There is difference of opinion as to the extent of the terrorism.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then, can there be any doubt in your mind that that thing is an abominable failure, that it is a program of confiscation.

Mr. HARPER. When I speak of it as a failure, I qualify it to this extent: That it has proven itself a failure for the Russian workmen and the Russian peasants.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not agree with the teachings of Lenine and Trotsky, do you?

Mr. HARPER. I do not.

Maj. HUMES. Professor, you are familiar somewhat with political parties and groups in Russia. What proportion of the Russian socialist movement do the Bolsheviks represent?

Mr. HARPER. In June of 1917, in the first all-Russian congress, the Bolsheviks were polling about 20 to 25 per cent, on certain occasions; on other occasions, less. That was in the all-Russian congress of soviets. In the Petrograd soviet, which was composed of the workmen of Petrograd and the garrison soldiers of Petrograd, the Bolsheviks had a majority. In Moscow the Bolsheviks were strong—in the Moscow soviet. We have, then, certain votes on which to base an estimate of the strength of the Bolsheviks as a party. The election returns of the constituent assembly as a result of the elections held during November, when the Bolsheviks were in power, would indicate that the majority were against the Bolsheviks.

Maj. HUMES. Now, Professor, we hear of persons who are advocating Bolshevism in this country, or the recognition of the Bolshevik government in this country, insisting upon even a greater freedom of press and freedom of speech in this country than we now have. Do they, in their form of government, recognize the right of freedom of the press and freedom of speech, or is it their policy to deprive individuals of any of their rights that may be used to interfere with their particular form of government and its activities?

Mr. HARPER. They definitely state in their constitution that during the period of transition they must protect themselves against those whom they have thrown out, and that they can not allow the use of freedom of the press. During the first weeks after the Bolshevik coup d'état a great many bourgeois papers continued to come out—a great many non-Bolshevik and nonsocialist papers continued to come out. I was able to get hold of many copies of papers published in November, 1917, in which the non-Bolshevik socialists attacked the Bolsheviks and spoke of them as adventurers and as traitors, so that during these first months the non-Bolsheviks could express their opinion. But my interpretation of that fact was that during those first months the Bolsheviks did not have time or did not feel secure enough to suppress freedom of the press. But now in no case, according to the constitution, do they allow the publication of non-Bolshevik articles.

Senator OVERMAN. You think they were justified in that, do you not?

Mr. HARPER. No, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Then they are advocating free speech and free press in this country, but are not permitting it in their own country. That is the first proposition that we can accept, is it not?

Mr. HARPER. They complain that they are not getting an opportunity to present the facts of the situation to the American people.

Senator WOLCOTT. They complain more than that. I read an article in one of the Washington papers the other night, in which a man was complaining that the criticism of this meeting that was held in Poli's Theater Sunday night, I believe a week ago, was a suppression of free speech; that the very fact that they were criticized for expressing their views constituted a suppression of their constitutional right.

Mr. HARPER. I do not follow the reasoning.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not follow the reasoning, either. I think it is nonsense. I am telling you what they claim. They claim more than you stated a moment ago. If there is anybody on earth who ought to stand abuse and criticism, it is that crowd.

Mr. HARPER. The complaint that I have read is, first that the capitalistic press does not publish certain facts, certain statements in regard to what is going on in Russia, that come into their hands, and that they publish without proper discrimination all sorts of reports coming from all sorts of sources which are gross exaggerations, as proven by later developments.

I think perhaps that there is no question that we have had in the American press a good many misstatements with regard to Russia. Just for an illustration that came to my attention, it was called to my attention recently that a well known Russian revolutionary leader, Catherine Breshkovskaya, called, popularly, "The Grandmother of the Russian Revolution," was reported either killed or as having died in prison several times in the course of the last year. The other side also reported with regard to Catherine Breshkovskaya, insisting that we were not getting the truth about Russia. They insisted that the press was simply sending these reports that Catherine Breshkovskaya had been killed, in order to stir up antagonism to the Bolsheviks. In an article written in a publication called "One Year of Revolution," printed in November, 1918, this other statement is given, what the writer, Mr. Nuorteva, claims is the true statement with regard to Catherine Breshkovskaya. [Reading:]

Catherine Breshkovskaya has never been imprisoned by the soviets. When she died,—not of privation, but of old age,—the soviet government, although she was its opponent on many questions of tactics and principles, gave her a public funeral and hundreds of thousands of Moscow workers, members of the soviet, turned out to pay their respects to "The Grandmother of the Russian Revolution."

Senator WOLCOTT. Neither one of them is right.

Mr. HARPER. I believe Catherine Breshkovskaya is coming to Washington. I had several hours' talk with her in Chicago the other day.

Senator WOLCOTT. One said that she was killed, and the other said she was given a respectable funeral by the soviets, and both are wrong.

Mr. HARPER. But on the question of the use of terrorism, and on the question of the confiscation of the property of the bourgeois, there is no difference. There is no difference of opinion between these two groups.

Senator WOLCOTT. No; that is fundamental, of course.

Mr. HARPER. One group will say that it is not against the taking over of property, and admit that there was a certain amount of irregularity which we can characterize as looting; and the other set of statements, in covering this question of the confiscation of property, says that it was irregular, mere seizure, mere legalized loot, and that in many cases it was the bribe that gained temporary support for the bolshevist program by workmen groups, peasant groups, and some soldier groups.

Maj. HUMES. To summarize for a minute, professor, as I understand it from your outline of the present régime, we can gather this conclusion: That in order to maintain themselves they are conducting a reign of terrorism, keeping people in fear; secondly, they are depriving people of the right of the press and the right of free speech, and preventing them from getting information as to what is actually going on; thirdly, they provide for a compulsory military service for their purposes; they provide force for the disarmament of everyone that is not in sympathy with their cause and does not belong to the particular element with which they are affiliated, and of which they are a part. Then to establish their control further in elections, they have limited the right of suffrage as to the persons who have been grouped, so as to prevent their overthrow in a popular election, by way of disfranchisement, have they not?

Mr. HARPER. Up to the last statement, the last point, every point is supported by their own decrees or by provisions in their constitution.

Maj. HUMES. The last statement is that they have, in order to make it possible to control elections, disfranchised a considerable element of the population.

Mr. HARPER. By law they have disfranchised, of course, the bourgeoisie.

Maj. HUMES. Is that all? I call your attention to this provision of their constitution; if this is not disfranchisement I would like to know what it is:

"The following persons, even if they should belong to any of the above-mentioned categories, may neither elect nor be elected:

"a. Persons using hired labor for the sake of profit."

That would include anyone that had anyone in their employ for the purpose of conducting a business, as a merchant who had a clerk in his employ.

Mr. HARPER. He would be a bourgeois.

Maj. HUMES. And the person who had a domestic would also be deprived of the right of suffrage under that provision.

Mr. HARPER. He is getting profit from the work of that individual.

Maj. HUMES. Wherever help is necessary to conduct a business, it contributes to the profit, does it not? And those people are——

Mr. HARPER. Those would be the bourgeois classes.

Maj. HUMES (reading):

"Persons living on unearned increments such as: interest on capital, income from industrial enterprises and property."

Now, everyone that has an unearned income is disfranchised?

Mr. HARPER. Yes; that is what they call the bourgeois class.

Maj. HUMES (reading):

"Private traders, trading and commercial agents;"

Whom does that include? That would include all persons engaged in any undertakings as the representatives of individual concerns, would it not? The salesmen class would be included in that, would they not?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Would not merchants be included?

Mr. HARPER. Certainly.

Maj. HUMES. All merchants are traders?

Mr. HARPER. That is directed against them.

Maj. HUMES (reading):

"Monks and ecclesiastical servants of churches and religious cults."

Mr. HARPER. Yes; it is directed against them.

Maj. HUMES. Well, then, the disfranchised include that element of the population. It also includes the disfranchisement of clergymen and persons in the service of the church, does it not?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. It includes clergymen. Why?

Mr. HARPER. I do not know just why they do.

Maj. HUMES. They would not be comprised in the term "servants"?

Mr. HARPER. I have never seen any of their statements with regard to the clergy except that clause which you have read, in the accounts with regard to Russia, and I do not know what reasons they give for that.

Maj. HUMES. I do not care about the reasons. We are talking about the application of this thing and just what they are doing. That includes the clergymen and the priests in the service of the church. That would include even the janitor, under that class that the constitution here disfranchises, would it not? We have all that class eliminated from the Government?

Mr. HARPER. As to the question of the janitor, if the house has been taken over by the State, or by the local soviet, then the janitor becomes an employee of the State.

Maj. HUMES. We will disregard that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let the janitor vote.

Maj. HUMES. Yes; we will let him vote.

Senator OVERMAN. He is about the only man that can vote, so far.

Maj. HUMES (reading):

"Employees and agents of the former police, of the special corps of gendarmes and of branches of secret police departments, and also members of the former reigning house of Russia."

Of course that relates to those that were connected with the monarchical form of government?

Mr. HARPER. It says "members of the secret police and of the ruling house." That would not exclude necessarily, on that ground, the landlord.

Maj. HUMES. But as the landlord was receiving an income from property, that would exclude him. Then, Mr. Harper, it is a fact, is it not, that under the Soviet Republic, instead of giving universal suffrage as is proclaimed from the platform by many advocates of bolshevism, and by many newspapers that are supporting bolshevism, instead of creating universal suffrage, instead of according universal suffrage to persons over 18 years of age, men and women alike, a very large percentage of the population is disfranchised, is it not?

Mr. HARPER. They do not, in the first place——

Maj. HUMES. Just answer the question.

Mr. HARPER. A very large percentage.

Maj. HUMES. Now, what percentage?

Mr. HARPER. I should say that theoretically, according to this law——

Maj. HUMES. It is not theoretical, it is practical. It is the constitution.

Mr. HARPER. That would exclude at least 10 per cent. It would not exclude—the difficulty in answering that question is because of the status of the peasants after this nationalization of the land. If a peasant, as was said this morning, had bought and owned land——

Maj. HUMES. How many peasants can operate any quantity of land without having hired help?

Mr. HARPER. Very few.

Maj. HUMES. Then if they have hired help they are excluded because of that fact, so that would exclude all the peasants that had any considerable amount of land under cultivation.

Mr. HARPER. That would exclude at least 10 per cent of the population, but it would not exclude more than 20 per cent of the population. That is to say, after this exclusion, 80 per cent of the population would have the right to vote.

Senator OVERMAN. What class would be allowed to vote?

Mr. HARPER. The peasants, the workmen, and those of the educated class who were not tillers of the soil or workmen in the factories but who had thrown in their lot with the workmen and the peasants.

Maj. HUMES. But how could a man in that class live unless he had some income from interests or investments, or something of that kind?

Senator WOLCOTT. As soon as he gets in that class he is disfranchised. In other words, is a man disfranchised who accumulates enough property to get an education for himself: is he at once disfranchised by virtue of the other clauses of the constitution?

Mr. HARPER. Of course, they have contended——

Senator WOLCOTT. Is not that the practical application of it?

Mr. HARPER. They contend that as they work out the system——

Senator WOLCOTT. I am not asking what they contend. I am asking what the facts are.

Mr. HARPER. They have given up their property and have become workers, and are therefore eligible to vote and eligible to election.

Senator OVERMAN. It is a pretty good constitution, you think, do you not?

Mr. HARPER. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now that industries are paralyzed, where are those people working? There is no work, and where are they working?

Mr. HARPER. That question I have often asked myself and have put to a great many men with whom I have talked. How does the country go on? You know that the industries are not working, that the means of transportation are breaking down. The answer was that there are accumulated goods, shelter and food on which the industrial and urban populations still manage to exist. The peasants have sufficient food of certain kinds. The peasants before the industrial changes in Russia often supplied many of their needs, and manufactured articles through their household industries, and those industries are being developed so that the peasant does manage some way or another to get enough cloth, and to hammer out enough iron to put ends on his wooden plows, and the country is continuing to exist, it is my opinion, on the accumulated goods, manufactured goods, and on the food and shelter that is accumulated.

Senator OVERMAN. It is a great country over there.

Mr. HARPER. I have had statements from several men who left there as late as October who said that in view of the conditions that they saw in the cities, they do not believe that those urban centers will be able to avoid literal famines and epidemics during these winter months. Now, as to the extent of these famines and epidemics in the last months we do not know, because our reports from Russia, particularly in the last month, have been very inadequate.

(Thereupon, at 5.45 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 12, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

(The following was subsequently ordered inserted here in this record, having been handed in too late for inclusion in the hearings under Senate resolution 307:)

MAYOR THOMPSON'S PLEDGE TO UNITED SOCIETIES.

EXPRESSION OF VIEWS BY CANDIDATE FOR PUBLIC OFFICE TO THE UNITED SOCIETIES FOR LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The undersigned respectfully represents that he is a candidate for the office of Mayor on the Republican Ticket of the City of Chicago at the election to be held, Tuesday April 6th, A. D. 1915.

That he favors and will promote in every way the objects for which the United Societies for Local Self-Government were organized; namely: Personal Liberty, Home Rule, and Equal Taxation.

That he believes every citizen should be protected in the full enjoyment of all the personal rights and liberties guaranteed him by the Constitution of the United States and the State of Illinois.

And, that if elected Mayor of the City of Chicago, he will use all honorable means to promote such objects:

1: That he will oppose all laws known as "Blue Laws" and that he especially declares that he is opposed to a closed Sunday, believing that the State Law referring to Sunday closing is obsolete and should not be enforced by the City Administration. And that he is opposed to all ordinances tending to curtail the citizens of Chicago in the enjoyment of their liberties on the weekly day of rest.

2: That he is in favor of "Special Bar Permits" until three o'clock A. M., being issued by the City of Chicago to reputable societies or organizations for the purpose of permitting such societies to hold their customary entertainments.

3: That as mayor he will use his veto power to prevent the enactment of any ordinance which aims at the abridgment of the rights of personal liberty or is intended to repeal any liberal ordinance now enacted, especially one repealing or amending the "Special Bar Permit" ordinance now in force.

4: That he will oppose the further extension of the Prohibition Territory within the City Limits, unless such extension is demanded by a majority of the residents in a district in which, at least, two-thirds of the building lots are improved with dwelling houses.

5: That he is unalterably opposed to having the Anti-Saloon Territory Law extended to the City of Chicago.

6: I hereby declare, that I have not signed the pledge of the Anti-Saloon League, any other so-called "Reform-Organization" and have not given any pledge to any newspaper.

Chicago, March — A. D. 1915.

(Name) WM. HALE THOMPSON,

(Address) 3200 Sheridan Rd.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10.45 o'clock a. m. in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. Maj. Humes, whom do you desire the committee to hear this morning?

Maj. HUMES. We would like the committee to hear Mr. Simons.

TESTIMONY OF REVEREND MR. GEORGE A. SIMONS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, where do you reside?

Mr. SIMONS. At the present time, in the parsonage of the Washington Square Methodist Episcopal Church, 121 West Fortieth Street, New York City, of which church I am pastor.

Maj. HUMES. When did you return from Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. On October 6, 1918.

Maj. HUMES. In what work were you engaged in Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. As superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Petrograd, Russia.

Maj. HUMES. For how long a period of time had you been in Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. Since the fall of 1907.

Maj. HUMES. Now, Doctor, this committee desires to secure information with reference to conditions in Russia and the practical operation of the existing government in Russia. If you would prefer in your own way to go ahead and make a statement of those facts, you may proceed in that way.

Mr. SIMONS. I think you better ask me some of the main questions in your mind, and then, as I find that there are things necessary to be elaborated, I will give you whatever data I have at my disposal.

Maj. HUMES. Well, Doctor, were you in Petrograd at the time of the March revolution?

Mr. SIMONS. I was.

Maj. HUMES. What was the nature of the revolution? Was it a socialistic revolution?

Mr. SIMONS. You are referring to the——

Maj. HUMES. The so-called Kerensky revolution.

Mr. SIMONS. That is, of the winter of 1917?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. SIMONS. I received the impression that it was partly socialistic. It started with large parades of workingmen clamoring for bread when most of them were getting not only sufficient bread but more than enough, and the object of all that, so most of us understood, was to bring on a revolution. Of course, Rasputin had been already put out of the way.

Senator WOLCOTT. By the way, he was a monk, was he not?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; a very illiterate man; uncouth; rough.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was he supposed to be a German agent?

Mr. SIMONS. We have had all kinds of statements about Rasputin having been a pro-German, and the Czarina being pro-German. I have no direct evidence, but the people that claimed that both the Czarina and Rasputin were pro-German are well qualified to stand as truth-loving persons. Some of them are well-known editors; and some of the finest people that I have become acquainted with in Russia maintained that the Czarina and Rasputin both were pro-German.

Senator NELSON. Were you then at Petrograd when he was killed?

Mr. SIMONS. I was.

Senator NELSON. As I understand it, he was inveigled to the house of a certain member of the royal family, a prince somebody—I can not think of his name—and there he was killed.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; certain members of the Russian nobility assassinated him.

Senator NELSON. The man to whose house he was inveigled and killed was connected either by blood or marriage with the royal family, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Well, Doctor, after this revolution was successful, what was the condition in Russia up to the time of the November revolution?

Mr. SIMONS. Under the provisional government it was quite apparent that different political groups were working with might and main to get the upper hand, and they had, roughly speaking, over 20 different political groups. I have a document which came out at the time of the Bolsheviki revolution, showing the program of the various parties. I had it translated and copies of the translation given to our embassy in Petrograd, and also our consulate, and one copy was sent, I think, to the Department of State in Washington, as I recollect. Very near the end of this list of groups we found the Bolsheviki, as they call them. I have the thing here, and have gone through it, and it simply bears out the statement which has been made in many books on Russia and the Russians, that when you have a thousand Russians the chances are that you will have at least one hundred different groups among these Russians.

I have spoken with people who have traveled widely in Russia, even in religious circles, and they say it is very amusing that in one village of a thousand people, Baptists Sectanti, they have not less than twelve different Baptist groups. It is a peculiarity of the Russian mind and psychology, and it is my contention that if there had not been such a large number of political parties Kerensky might have won the day with a provisional government.

Soon after we noticed a pro-German current quite marked—

Senator WOLCOTT. Soon after when?

Mr. SIMONS. After the great revolution of the winter of 1917.

Senator WOLCOTT. In March?

Mr. SIMONS. Let us say it made itself felt within two months. I can not tell you just when Trotsky and Lenine came in. I have no data here.

Senator WOLCOTT. You speak of the revolution of the winter of 1917. We had it referred to yesterday as of March, 1917. Is that what you mean by the winter of 1917, along about March?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. I did not want any confusion in the time.

Mr. SIMONS. They had the old calendar system there, which is 13 days behind ours.

Senator NELSON. It culminated in March?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; the new style, I should say. We then soon noticed that whereas at the beginning of the so-called new régime there was a disposition to glorify the allies and to make a great deal of what the French Revolution had stood for; within from six to eight weeks there was an undercurrent just the opposite, and things began to loom up in a pro-German way.

I could not bring any of my papers that we had collected over there along, because everything was examined as we passed the border—the Russian-Finland border—last October, but in our church archives we have all these papers, and we have saved every scrap; and I think at least 50 of my friends have collected data for us.

Senator NELSON. Let me call your attention to this. Was it not one of the first acts of what we call the Kerensky government to issue a general pardon to offenders?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And did not that result in bringing back Lenine from Siberia?

Mr. SIMONS. Lenine, as you recall, did not come from Siberia, but came from another part of Europe, passing through Germany.

Senator NELSON. But he had been sent to Siberia?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. He had been sent to Siberia either as a convict, or had been deported, and he came back by way of Switzerland and Germany.

Mr. SIMONS. Well——

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that?

Mr. SIMONS. We knew that he came from Switzerland.

Senator NELSON. With German passports?

Mr. SIMONS. With German passports, and the Germans expedited his transit, and the exit of those who came into Russia at the time when this movement had already been under way.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which movement had been under way?

Mr. SIMONS. The movement which became known as the Bolshevik movement.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, you do not mean that he came in after this pro-German undercurrent had developed? Did he come after the appearance of that pro-Germanism, or before?

Mr. SIMONS. He came while that thing was growing.

Senator WOLCOTT. And, of course, he did not try to stop it any, did he?

Mr. SIMONS. Kerensky was spending a good deal of his time running up and down the front, trying to hearten the Russian soldiers in their warfare, and he was generally accredited with being a fine orator and doing splendid work, and I do not doubt but what he did manage to keep the men longer than they otherwise would have stayed in, but we were told there were hundreds of agitators who had followed in the trail of Trotsky-Bronstein, these men having come over from the lower East Side of New York. I was surprised to find scores of such men walking up and down Nevsky. Some of them, when they learned that I was the American pastor in Petrograd, stepped up to me and seemed very much pleased that there was somebody who could speak English, and their broken English showed that they had not qualified as being real Americans; and a number of these men called on me, and a number of us were impressed with the strong Yiddish element in this thing right from the start, and it soon became evident that more than half of the agitators in the so-called Bolshevik movement were Yiddish.

Senator NELSON. Hebrews?

Mr. SIMONS. They were Hebrews, apostate Jews. I do not want to say anything against the Jews, as such. I am not in sympathy with the anti-Semitic movement, never have been, and do not ever expect to be. I am against it. I abhor all pogroms of whatever kind. But I have a firm conviction that this thing is Yiddish, and that one of its bases is found in the East Side of New York.

Senator NELSON. Trotsky came over from New York during that summer, did he not?

Mr. SIMONS. He did.

Senator OVERMAN. You think he brought these people with him?

Mr. SIMONS. I am not able to say that he brought them with him. I think that most of them came after him, but that he was responsible for their coming.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether the Germans furnished them any money to come?

Mr. SIMONS. It was generally understood that Lenine and Trotsky had been financed by the German Imperial Government. Documents were afterwards issued showing that these leaders of the Bolshevik movement had received German funds. Mr. Nicholas A. Zorin, a personal friend of mine, who is the vice president of the so-called society for promoting mutual friendly relations between Russia and America, worked out a treatise, as he called it, showing that the German Imperial Government was backing this thing, and he had gotten hold of certain documents, and he issued this thing privately, and scores of copies were sent to us for distribution. These were mimeograph copies. I could not bring one over with me, but I suppose the contents of his treatise are known to the State Department, because I handed copies to our embassy and our consulate.

Senator NELSON. Have you got copies yourself, at home?

Mr. SIMONS. No; I did not dare to bring that across the border, because it might incriminate me.

Senator NELSON. We ought to get that document and put it in the record.

Mr. SIMONS. I think you will find a copy in the Russian division of the State Department. I am pretty sure they have one.

Senator OVERMAN. It would be a very remarkable thing if the Bolshevik movement started in this country, financed by Germans, would it not?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not think the Bolshevik movement in Russia would have been a success if it had not been for the support it got from certain elements in New York, the so-called East Side.

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, you have referred to Lenine coming from Siberia through Switzerland. Is it not a fact that Lenine went from Siberia to Switzerland about the time or shortly before the outbreak of the European war in 1914, and was in Switzerland from that time up until the time he returned to Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not paid particular attention to that phase of Lenine's career. I only know he was given the privilege by the German Imperial Government to have a hasty transit through Germany, and that they evidently seemed to be very anxious to get him as quickly as possible over to Russia.

May I state at this juncture that before the outbreak of the war—that is, before Russia entered into the war—we were apprised, and it is a fact, that hundreds of thousands of rubles had been put at the disposal of certain labor leaders in St. Petersburg, as it was then known, to create a strike in the factories. A large number of factories in Petrograd, as well as in Moscow and other parts of Russia near these large centers, have been controlled by British and German capital. It was apparent at that time that Germany was trying to cripple Russia economically by getting her into the throes of an awful strike. I have spoken with men who were high up in official life in Petrograd, and they said they had proofs. The thing afterwards came out in the Russian press, and, of course, there was a very strong anti-German feeling there as the result of that. Well, that strike did not prove successful because the old régime had so much power that it succeeded in squelching it.

I have noticed again and again in Russia that there is a strong German element there. I gave a copy to our ambassador, Gov. Francis, of a so-called German yearbook which was suppressed, as well as a German daily newspaper, the oldest newspaper, so they claim, in all Russia, which was suppressed soon after Russia's entrance into the war, and when the Bolsheviks came into power all these things were started up again. German papers were not only published, and everything that was German and pro-German fostered, but we also knew that at the outbreak or before the outbreak of the Bolshevik revolution of October, 1918, there were several German officers in the seat of the Smolny government, so called.

There were two institutes that had that name, and one of the buildings Lenine and Trotzky and their forces took even while Kerensky and the provisional government were governing, and one of the oldest teachers in the Smolny Institute had occasion to come over to the building where the Bolsheviks now had their guns, doing their work of propagandizing the Russian proletariat. She is a lady over 50 years of age, and had been teaching in the Smolny Institute, I presume, over 20 years, and has been attending our church for about 10 years, and is related to some of the most distinguished Russians. She came to see me and said, "I have had an opportunity, because of being a teacher in the Smolny Institute, to visit certain rooms in the building now occupied by the so-called Bolshevik government. I have seen with my own eyes German officers sitting at the long table around which sat the leaders of the Bolshevik movement. I have heard German spoken there. Because they believed in me I have had the privilege of passing through certain rooms, having to take certain things over for our teachers and our pupils, and what not, and several times I have noticed German documents on the table, with the German stamp"; and one time she told me that she had become impressed by one thing in the Smolny Institute, that more German was being used there than Russian. It may be she heard Yiddish, because Yiddish is partly German. It seems strange to me, but when you talk with the average man from the lower East Side he is not going to speak English or Russian, but he is going to speak Yiddish. It may be that she heard Yiddish and thought that she heard German; but anyway, that was her testimony.

Senator NELSON. The Yiddish language is distinct from the Hebrew?

Mr. SIMONS. It is German. It is a mixtum compositum.

Senator NELSON. It is a mixture of Hebrew and German, is it not?

Mr. SIMONS. There are some Slavic terms, some Russian, and some Polish in it, and it may have some English, too. The Yiddish that is spoken on the East Side of New York has ever so much of the English in it, and the Yiddish that is spoken in Petrograd, Moscow, Warsaw, and Odessa, would have quite a lot of Russian in it.

Senator OVERMAN. This institute was the nest, the beginning, of this government, was it not? That was where it started, was it not?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have made one statement here which to me is very interesting, largely because it may be intensely significant. Some time back in your testimony you said that it was your contention that if it were not for these elements that had come from the East Side of New York City, the Bolshevik movement would have been a failure. That to me is very interesting, because if it is true it is very significant. There are many people in this country, I think—I am sure there are many people—who rather look upon this Bolshevik movement as just a passing fad, and of no deep significance; but, of course, if the success of this monstrous thing in Russia is due to the men who came out of New York City, then this country has not anything to deal with that is trifling, at all.

Now, because of the very significance of that, can you tell us anything in the way of detail that leads you to the conviction that the presence of these East Side people in Russia contributed to the success of the Bolshevik movement?

Mr. SIMONS. The latest startling information, given me by some one who says that there is good authority for it—and I am to be given the exact figures later on and have them checked up properly by the proper authorities—is this, that in December, 1918, in the northern community of Petrograd, so-called—that is what they call that section of the Soviet régime under the presidency of the man known as Mr. Apfelbaum—out of 388 members, only 16 happened to be real Russians, and all the rest Jews, with the exception possibly of one man, who is a negro from America, who calls himself Prof. Gordon, and 265 of the members of this northern commune government, that is sitting in the old Smolny Institute, came from the lower East Side of New York—265 of them. If that is true, and they are going to check it up for me—certain Russians in New York who have been there and investigated the facts—I think that that fits into what you are driving at. In fact, I am very much impressed with this, that moving around here I find that certain Bolsheviki propagandists are nearly all Jews—apostate Jews. I have been in the so-called People's House, at 7 East Fifteenth Street, New York, which calls itself also the Rand School of Social Science, and I have visited that at least six times during the last eleven weeks or so, buying their literature, and some of the most seditious stuff I have ever found against our own Government, and 19 out of every 20 people I have seen there have been Jews.

And as I move around to give my lectures, usually I am pursued by Bolsheviki propagandists, and in one big church in New York I was interrupted, on the east side of the church—it so happened that they were sitting on the east side of the church—by two Bolsheviki agitators. I suppose they were agitators because they tried to agitate while I was giving my lecture on Russia, and they grumbled and growled, and the assistant pastor stepped up to them and tried to calm them, and they instantly remarked to him—I hate to repeat it, but if you want to know I will tell you—"Everything that man says is a damn lie." When the pastor assured them that that language was not quite proper in the church, and so on, and asked them to speak with the speaker himself afterwards, they said it was no use speaking with him, "He knows nothing. But this book will tell you all about the thing, and give you the truth," and they handed him this book by Albert Rhys Williams, "76 Questions and Answers on the Bolsheviki and Soviets," and he turned it over to me.

On several other occasions men have tried to disturb our meetings, using this pamphlet of Williams.

I have analyzed certain questions and answers, especially with regard to this paragraph on religion, and I have no doubt in my mind that the predominant element in this Bolsheviki movement in America is, you may call it, the Yiddish of the East Side.

Senator WOLCOTT. You said that you met many of these New York East Siders on the streets in Petrograd, did you not?

Mr. SIMONS. I met a number of them on the Nevsky Prospect in Petrograd, yes; and spoke with them, and a number of them have visited me.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was how long ago?

Mr. SIMONS. That was, I should say, well, along in, I think, June and July. I have all these things checked up over in Petrograd, but they are put away in a trunk just now in the embassy, so, of course, if I do not strike a date right—

Senator WOLCOTT. Approximately.

Mr. SIMONS. I should say it was just before they made their first attempt in July, 1917, to oust Kerensky, but he had enough strength to put them down.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you able to say whether or not the appearance of these East Side New Yorkers, these agitators, was a sudden appearance there; did they seem to come all at once, a flock of them, so to speak, or had they been around, but just started to talk?

MR. SIMONS. I was impressed with this, Senator, that shortly after the great revolution of the winter of 1917 there were scores of Jews standing on the benches and soap boxes, and what not, talking until their mouths frothed, and I often remarked to my sister, "Well, what are we coming to, anyway? This all looks so Yiddish." Up to that time we had very few Jews, because there was, as you may know, a restriction against having Jews in Petrograd; but after the revolution they swarmed in there, and most of the agitators happened to be Jews. I do not want to be unfair to them, but I usually know a Jew when I see one.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean they are apostate Jews?

MR. SIMONS. Apostate Jews; yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You mean Christianized Jews?

MR. SIMONS. No, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by the term "apostate"?

MR. SIMONS. An apostate Jew is one who has given up the faith of his fathers or forefathers.

Senator WOLCOTT. But he has not accepted any other?

MR. SIMONS. He has not accepted any other, except the Bolshevik faith or anarchistic faith, whatever it may be.

Senator OVERMAN. Were any of these men you met over there afterwards promoted by Trotsky or his people in the cabinet?

MR. SIMONS. Some weeks before I left Petrograd I became quite well acquainted with one member of the Soviet government, who was the commissar of the post and telegraph, Sergius Zorin, and I tried to get a dictum from him as to what would happen to me if I stayed there, inasmuch as a decree had been issued by the Soviet government that all subjects of allied countries remaining in Russia, from 18 to 45 years of age, would be considered as prisoners of war. Our embassy had urged all Americans residing in Russia, in the fall of 1917 and the winter of 1918, to leave that territory. Finally, Consul Poole, who was in Moscow up to about the middle or end of September, 1918, wrote a letter to me stating that the American Government demanded that all American citizens should leave Russia immediately, and that I should use whatever influence I had with the other Americans in Petrograd to have them leave also.

I then and there decided that I ought to find out just what would happen in case I could not get out—what would happen to me and my sister. I was not quite 45, but was within six months of my forty-fifth birthday, and I wanted to get from some of these commissars what they would do to me. The president of the northern commune section would not receive me. They told me he was not receiving anybody, that he was strongly guarded, and never slept in the same room twice.

Senator NELSON. What was his name?

MR. SIMONS. Apfelbaum. That is his real name, but his assumed Russian name, like many of them, is Zinovyeff. His real name is Apfelbaum.

Senator NELSON. That means apple tree, does it not?

MR. SIMONS. Yes. But his second or third secretary—they were all Jews there—referred me in a rather vague way to any other com-missar that I might see. There had been threats made to kill not only Lenine and Trotsky, but Apfelbaum, and just prior to that another man, who, as was said, held the lives of all of us in his hands, and who was responsible for the killing of so many people without even a trial given them, was assassinated by a Jew. There was an awful terroristic atmosphere in Petrograd, and we were expecting still worse things to happen every day. With a view to finding out what my real status quo was in Soviet territory, and not having had any success with Mr. Apfelbaum, I went to the commissar of the post and telegraph, Sergius Zorin. I had learned that he had come from New York, where he had spent eight years.

Senator NELSON. What was his real name?

Mr. SIMONS. I never asked him, but when I called on him—I will get up to that point presently—he told me that so long as the American troops did not take the offensive on Russian territory, we Americans residing in Russia would not be considered prisoners of war. I cabled that immediately to our authorities in New York, through the Norwegian Legation, who had the protection of American citizens and interests in Russia at that time.

Senator NELSON. Did he speak to you in English, this man?

Mr. SIMONS. He spoke in English. His English was quite fair.

Senator NELSON. He had come from this country?

Mr. SIMONS. He had been in this country.

Senator NELSON. From the East Side?

Mr. SIMONS. I imagine so.

Senator WOLCOTT. How do you spell his name?

Mr. SIMONS. Sergius Zorin, the commissar of the post and telegraph. Commissar Zorin was very gracious, not only to me but also to Capt. Webster, with whom he soon after became acquainted, who was the head of the American Red Cross mission to Russia. While discussing different things Zorin told me that he was anxious to hear from his brother, a certain Alexander Gumberg, who he said was the secretary of Col. Raymond Robins.

Senator NELSON. Where was he?

Mr. SIMONS. He had left Russia, and Zorin was anxious to hear something from him. He said he had not heard from him for a long time, so he asked me if I, getting any papers from the outside or any mail, could get any word out to his brother. I said I would be glad to do that for him, and I wrote a letter to that effect to Col. Robins, which I believe he has never received. When last I met him he said he had not received it.

Senator NELSON. Who is this Col. Robins?

Mr. SIMONS. Col. Raymond Robins was identified with the American Red Cross mission to Russia.

Senator NELSON. Was he there in Russia, or here?

Mr. SIMONS. At the time I was speaking with Mr. Zorin he was here in America, and Mr. Zorin spoke of him highly and said that he was the greatest American of all, and he hoped that he would be ambassador to Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. He is the chairman of the Progressive Party, is he not, Raymond Robins?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know very much about him, except what I have seen in Who's Who. I had always thought highly of him until he came over to Russia and embarrassed our embassy in many ways and got into the press, and our ambassador was obliged to come out again and again with certain statements, and finally the unpleasant controversy, if we may call it such, was brought to an end by a statement made by Ambassador Francis that he and Col. Robins were friends, and he did not know who was trying to cause enmity between them, or something to that effect, and he hoped now that this thing would be put at an end.

I read all those things in the Russian press, and we felt very much distressed over it, because we thought that our ambassador, who was doing such magnificent work over there, ought to have the support of every last American. There was no reason why anybody should pose even as a candidate, so called, for the ambassadorship to the Soviet government.

Senator WOLCOTT. What was the nature of the controversy that you speak of between the ambassador and Mr. Robins, that was published in the papers?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not the papers here. I think Prof. Harper is probably in possession of those papers, or they must have them in the Russian division of the Department of State.

Senator WOLCOTT. Can you not tell us in a general way what it was?

Mr. SIMONS. As I recall the whole thing, the Soviet government was feeling very strongly about the attitude which the allies and America, for that matter, had taken in regard to the Lenine-Trotsky régime in not recognizing them, and withdrawing their representatives, their ambassadors, and so on, and Gov. Francis issued, several times, messages in the Russian press to the Russian people assuring them of the good will of America, and so on; and coming out very plainly with this statement, that the Brest-Litovsk treaty would not be recognized at the peace conference, and in our Thanksgiving service in the American church in Petrograd in November, 1917, the ambassador said a similar thing. I have a copy of that speech. There were quite a number of distinguished Russians present, and that speech of his irritated the Bolsheviki very much.

Then, his Fourth of July message, which was given in Vologda, on the 4th of July, 1918, distressed them very much, too. That was afterwards printed in thousands of copies in Russian and widely circulated, and Gov. Francis in that message, of course, even more strongly than ever stated that the Brest-Litovsk treaty would not be recognized at the peace conference, but that America would stand by the Russian nation and had a real affection for the Russian nation. I am only quoting in a general way, because I have not the data here before me.

Col. Robins was quoted again and again as being the typical American, having been a workingman himself, having been down in the mines, and whatnot, and he knew the needs of the laboring people, the laboring element, and so on; and then our Ambassador Francis was placed as being a typical capitalist, and they rang off a good deal of that, and he was persona non grata with the Bolsheviki officials for that reason. The criticisms against the Root mission were just along that same line.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was all that accompanied by the suggestion that Mr. Robins ought to be ambassador?

Mr. SIMONS. That came out again and again; that he really was going to be, and he ought to be, the American ambassador to the soviet government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is that what Mr. Apfelbaum wanted, too?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not spoken with Mr. Apfelbaum.

Senator WOLCOTT. I mean the other fellow.

Mr. SIMONS. Mr. Zorin?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. SIMONS. Zorin was very enthusiastic about that proposition. Then he asked me if I could get in touch with his brother, Alexander Gumberg, who was supposed to be with Col. Robins somewhere in America; but when I came here I did not find him. I was told that he had gone back to Europe, and possibly was going to Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Did Robins make any statements over there, showing he was ambitious for this place and was siding with the Soviet government?

Mr. SIMONS. He was reported as having said certain things, but I am not in a position to say that he really made those statements. I only know this much: There was a strong feeling on the part of the real Russian element against this thing. It became very nauseating to the people who really had admiration for America, and for our own American representative, Gov. Francis, whom I esteem most highly, as also his staff. I think we were most fortunate in having those men over there. I do not know any finer set that we ever had.

Senator NELSON. Now, to bring you back to the chronological order of events, after Kerensky got in charge of the government, he attempted to prosecute the war against the Germans, did he not?

Mr. SIMONS. Kerensky, I believe, was sincere in that.

Senator NELSON. He carried that on for a while, and was successful, until finally the Russian Army got demoralized and insisted on controlling their officers and everything else, and refused to fight, is not that true?

Mr. SIMONS. That is true.

Senator NELSON. Do you know anything about how that movement demoralizing the army was inspired; by what element?

Mr. SIMONS. I have heard from somebody recently, and I could check it up within a few days, that there was one American in the Y. M. C. A. that actually saw German money being passed over from the German front to the Russians.

Senator NELSON. Among the Russian soldiers?

Mr. SIMONS. And to the men who were authorized to receive the money for propagandist purposes.

Senator NELSON. Among the Russian Army?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; and I do happen to know that soon after the great revolution of the winter of 1917 tens of thousands of copies of the communist manifesto, in Russian, were circulated among the Russian soldiers. It contained the official program of the Bolsheviki. That is the communist manifesto, and this is the thing that made the Lenine-Trotsky propaganda successful over there. This is an English translation.

Senator NELSON. Was not the collapse of the Russian Army, and the demoralizing of that army, by which the soldiers refused to fight, and even went over to the enemy, one of the means of helping Trotsky and Lenine to get control of the Government?

Mr. SIMONS. Most assuredly.

Senator OVERMAN. And did these Yiddish from the East Side, who were there assisting Lenine and Trotsky, discuss this question of Bolshevism with you, or how did they impress you?

Mr. SIMONS. They were very guarded, because they knew that as a 100 per cent American, and as a Christian clergyman, I would not be in sympathy with the ideals and spirit, and the means which they were thinking of employing; but when I spoke with these men I always told them that our Methodist Episcopal Church in America, in the general conference of 1916, had passed very fine resolutions with regard to labor reform, and what not, and that ours was really the people's church. I had said that, and said also that I was a Christian Socialist, of course reserving for myself the definition. I am a Christian Socialist in the sense that every Christian who takes the New Testament as his ideal would be, standing very much where Charles Kingsley and Morris stood, believing not in revolutionary socialism, but evolutionary socialism, taking the Sermon on the Mount of Christ, and the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, as the ideal, believing that not by force but by moral persuasion shall we really succeed in making a brotherhood out of the whole human race.

Senator KING. You recognized that a brotherhood was compatible with the maintenance of orderly government?

Mr. SIMONS. I certainly would.

Senator KING. And your ideal of Christianity did not mean the subversion of government?

Mr. SIMONS. First, last, and all the time I stood for what we consider the most ideal government the world has ever had, the Government of the United States of America; and I had no sympathy at all with the red flag propagandists.

Senator KING. You believed in a government that recognized the right of contract, the right of acquisition and the possession of property, and all those personal rights which we enjoy under our representative form of government?

Mr. SIMONS. I certainly do.

Senator KING. You believe in this form of government?

Mr. SIMONS. I certainly do.

Senator KING. You do not believe in any socialism which has for its object the destruction of our form of government?

Mr. SIMONS. I absolutely repudiate all that.

Senator KING. So your classifying yourself as a Christian Socialist does not mean an opposition to our form of government?

Mr. SIMONS. When I say Christian Socialist I mean that I take that term and I put it as high as it ever could be put, taking the teaching of Jesus Christ with regard to the principle of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, standing by what Christ taught, the very best kind of socialism the world could ever hope for. That is where Kingsley and Morris stood. That is where I think every real man would stand who knows anything at all about the New Testament. If, of course, they had known what I had back in my mind, they would not have recognized me even as a tenth-rate Socialist.

Senator NELSON. You were there when the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was entered into?

Mr. SIMONS. I was.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us anything which actuated the Bolsheviks in entering into such a treaty? By that treaty they relinquished the Ukraine, they relinquished Finland, they relinquished Courland and the Baltic coast, all, to the Germans. At all events, they gave up all, so that they left Russia with no access to the sea except at Petrograd; and they also got considerable gold from the Russian Government or from the Bolsheviks.

Senator KING. You ought to add to that, Senator, the Aland Islands, which are at the mouth of the sea, so it made the harbor of Petrograd valueless.

Senator NELSON. The Aland Islands are southwest of the Finnish coast.

Senator KING. But they are really a protection, as a naval base, very largely, to the entrance to the harbor that goes in to Petrograd—that arm of the sea that extends into Russia.

Senator NELSON. Now, what information can you give us about that, Doctor?

Mr. SIMONS. I am not a military expert, as you know. I read the papers and I heard the account of their proceedings at the Brest-Litovsk meeting, and so on, with scores of others who were in the British, American, and French colonies in Petrograd and Moscow, and Russians who were well qualified to pass judgment on the thing. I also had a strong conviction that the Brest-Litovsk performance was largely a German thing, and that for the simple reason that while Lenin and Trotsky and their helpers were saying all kinds of bitter things about the allies, I hardly ever, up to that time, caught them saying anything very bitter against Germany. I had seen their proclamations, and only last summer, in July and August. One particularly I have in mind, which was addressed to the whole civilized world and posted up all over Petrograd, and that referred in no delicate language to the allies as being flesh-eating and blood-drinking allies.

Senator KING. That included the United States, of course, in that category.

Mr. SIMONS. Well, then they went on to speak of England and France. As I recall, I do not think they mentioned us, but in a number of conversations that I had with officials in the Soviet régime I discovered that there was a tendency to remain, if possible, friendly with America, which was interpreted by men in the diplomatic service of the allied countries as being an attempt, if possible, to separate America from her allies. And then again, when the Bolshevik régime would fall to pieces there might be an asylum to which the Bolshevik demons might escape. Excuse me for calling them demons, but I have seen so much that I have not been able to find a better word to characterize them.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know this man Gordon that you spoke of—this negro from the United States?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; I knew him. He came over to me to get married to a so-called Russian lady, who was an Esthonian. He lived with her only a short time.

Senator OVERMAN. Where did he come from, do you know?

Mr. SIMONS. He came from America. He was a pugilist, and issued cards as being a professor of physical culture, boxing, and what not, and for a certain time he was the doorkeeper in our American Embassy in Petrograd.

Senator OVERMAN. You spoke of him as being mixed up with this Bolshevik crowd in the institute.

Mr. SIMONS. I think that is the same Gordon—Prof. Gordon.

Senator OVERMAN. You spoke of his being in with these Bolsheviks.

Mr. SIMONS. That is the last statement that we had.

Senator OVERMAN. That he was with them?

Mr. SIMONS. That was the last statement.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think the Germans absolutely controlled the situation at the time that the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was entered into, and that they practically had their own way?

Mr. SIMONS. I certainly do.

Senator NELSON. Do you not believe that Trotsky and Lenine were really in the toils of Germany and willing to do what Germany wanted?

Mr. SIMONS. I have been led to believe that most of the men in the Bolsheviki service, who are real Bolsheviks—there are some who are not—most of them are avowedly antially, and have a strong hatred toward England, and an affection for Germany. That has come out again and again.

Senator NELSON. Were you there when the revolution of Lenine and Trotsky, as distinguished from the former revolution, took place, in November, 1917?

Mr. SIMONS. I was present.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us about what took place then?

Mr. SIMONS. It is a long story. To give you a graphic picture of it would take hours. I can only say this—

Senator NELSON. Give us an outline.

Mr. SIMONS. I can only say this, that the air was pregnant with the most hellish terrorism that any fine grained person could ever experience. I dressed up again and again as a Russian workman and put on a Russian shirt that hangs down almost to the knees, and I put on an old slouch hat and nickel spectacles so that my sister said I really looked like a Bolshevik, and I went out and moved among those fellows and I heard their talk. I moved into the barracks. I wanted to get inside information inasmuch as I was preparing a book. I felt that history was being made, and I believed in Russia, I loved Russia, but I did not believe in this thing, and I wanted to see just what it would do to the Russia that I expected to live, and I wanted to get first-hand information, and as I moved among the hoi polloi, I found that the average man did not know the difference between his elbows and his knees. These agitators would come and speak for Lenine and Trotsky, and they would say, "That is entirely correct, entirely correct." And then, after those agitators had left with their truck auto, another auto would come along, and there would be some other agitators.

Senator NELSON. Who were those agitators? Were they workmen or soldiers, or of what class or community?

Mr. SIMONS. They were made up of professional agitators, and some of them had on the Russian uniform, and some of them were simply clad as workmen, with the black robosa or workman's shirt.

Senator KING. Had any of them been in the United States, and gone back?

Mr. SIMONS. Some of them had.

Senator KING. From the East Side?

Mr. SIMONS. From the East Side, as I happen to know.

Senator WOLCOTT. This man Apfelbaum was not from the East Side?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know. I have not been informed as to his antecedents, and so on. I have a paper here which was circulated when Lenine and Trotsky were asserting themselves, in August, September, and October of 1917, giving a list of about 20 names, showing the Jewish in one column, and then the assumed Russian name in the other. That thing was considered a very dangerous document, but it was being circulated everywhere, and one copy came to me. In that document I found Apfelbaum's name, and his assumed name. Beyond that I do not know anything about Mr. Apfelbaum.

Senator KING. I interrupted you when you were answering Senator Nelson's question.

Senator NELSON. I would like to have you go on further and tell us.

Mr. SIMONS. We could not escape this observation, that the success of the Bolsheviki revolution was largely due to the fact of having employed terrorism.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the nature of the terrorism?

Mr. SIMONS. They had practically all their men armed. The workman there got so inspired with the holy zeal of the great cause, which was to kill off the capitalist and enthrone the proletariat, that he felt he was in a holy crusade for humanity's sacred cause. That is the way those men talked: and these men were given arms. I have one paper here which shows that they used it as a slogan. It reads something like this, "The surety of the proletarian cause lies in putting the gun into the hand of the workman." It was that thing that made the Bolsheviki revolution a success. Without having the so-called proletarian element armed, I do not believe it would have succeeded.

Senator NELSON. The masses of their people, then, were armed, and paraded the streets in armed bodies, did they not?

Mr. SIMONS. Many of them; yes.

Senator NELSON. And that parading of these armed men bred this spirit of terrorism?

Mr. SIMONS. They then took opportunity to oppose all political parties that were not in favor of the Bolsheviki program. The different parties were defined, and they were still hoping that they might succeed in having their constituent assembly, but soon after the Bolshevik revolution had succeeded, even those banners were torn down, and it was considered the most dangerous thing to even speak in favor of a constituent assembly.

Senator KING. A constituent assembly representing all of them?

Mr. SIMONS. All of the parties.

Senator KING. Which gave them all a chance to participate?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator KING. The peasants, the workingmen, the laboring men; proletariat and capitalistic classes?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator KING. A sort of general democratic government?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were there any threats manifest at that time to kill those who had property or were intellectual people?

Mr. SIMONS. After the Bolsheviki came into power one paper after another that stood out against them was suppressed, and it was not long before we had only one kind of press there, and that was the Bolshevistic or anarchistic. I have a few copies here, and in these papers they employ the harshest terms that I have ever found, in regard to putting out of the way all groups or institutions that were not in sympathy or in accord with the Bolshevik ideal, spirit, and program.

Senator KING. Do you mean assassination and murder to accomplish that end?

Mr. SIMONS. It became quite evident that they had that as their—what shall I say?—trump card, and many of their proclamations breathed not only an intense diabolical class hatred, but also murder. and for weeks and weeks they were fine-tooth combing the different sections of Petrograd—and Moscow, for that matter—trying to get hold of the officers who up to that time had been holding out against them. Many of them had already made their escape and gone over to the allies.

Senator NELSON. You mean the army officers?

Mr. SIMONS. The army officers. And they were rushing from one home to another. Some of them even came to us and asked whether they could not spend the night with us. They said, "It will be only for one night"; but we never did that, for the simple reason that we did not want to be found guilty of that sort of thing. Scores of these officers—and some of them who were high up in the Russian Army under the old Government and under the provisional government—called on me when the embassy was no longer there, and asked me to give them either a card or a letter to our embassy in Vologda, which I did. These men gave me a good deal of information, too. I have made memoranda of some of these conversations, but all that lies in the trunk over in the American Embassy in Petrograd, awaiting the day when I can go there and use it for later publication.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us of the acts of barbarism and the destruction of life and property that took place there? Can you tell us anything about that?

Mr. SIMONS. I beg your pardon.

Senator NELSON. You have spoken of the terrorism they engendered by being armed. Can you tell us what they did?

Mr. SIMONS. Here are a few things that came under my own immediate observation: It was a short time before Ambassador Francis left Petrograd that we invited him to have dinner with us. It must have been either in December or January—I am not sure, but I am inclined to believe it must have been in January or February, 1918—but about an hour and a half before he came, accompanied by two of his secretaries, one of the most horrible things I have ever witnessed happened right in front of our American property there. I was in my office at the time, speaking with our head deaconess, and I heard shots and groans, and looked out of the window, and right in front of our property there was a crowd of people, all excited, shouting, and two Russian soldiers running, with several Red Guards—Bolsheviks—right after them, and I witnessed them shoot each of those men as they were falling, three or four times in the head.

Our own household became somewhat alarmed. We did not know just what the nature of this was. Possibly it was something that would involve us. I at once called for the sexton or janitor—in this case he was both—of our church, and asked him to investigate. He then learned that these men had been in a tea-drinking room down the street, and had been charged with having tried to steal, but whether or no they were guilty never came out. But the Bolshevik Red Guards never stopped to ask whether a man was guilty or not; they would shoot on the spot. I have seen that again and again. I had an instance of that brought to my attention in the case of two brothers, where the one they wanted was not there, and they shot the other man by mistake, and the other one went free.

In this particular instance we felt queer, because in a minute the ambassador might come to see us, and it did not look quite palatable to have a pool of blood with two dead bodies, like that, in front of one's house, when a distinguished man like Gov. Francis was to come to dinner. But he came, and it was then already dark, fortunately, and he did not see any of that. I told him about it, and he seemed to enjoy it. I mean he was keen on hearing any of these things. He was a brave soul, and referred to his own fearlessness, and incidentally always having a good little friend in his back pocket—a Browning. This did not unnerve the ambassador in the least. He then told me a number of things that showed that he had experienced possibly more than we had.

On another occasion the Bolshevik Red Guards, of a morning, about half past 2, tried to break into our house. They were climbing up the emergency ladder, and our janitor, like most other people in Petrograd, who were only getting dried fish to live on—there was hardly any bread to be had—was afflicted with the same malady that others were suffering with, and he was up that night, fortunately, and he looked around and saw two men climbing up the emergency ladder, trying to get into our house and to break into the garret. A few days before that time the door leading to the garret had been tampered with, and I suspected that something was being done, and I had the old lock taken off and a new one put on, and then a second door properly fixed up with a padlock, so they would have a kind of a hard time getting into our premises. At all events, he approached them and he said, "Comrades, what are you desiring? What do you wish?" They said to him, "You hold your mouth shut, and you will get 5,000 rubles," and quick as a flash he answered and said, "You think I am a Jew?" And then they remarked to each other, "Let us go," and they ran as fast as their feet could carry them through the yard and over the fence.

I investigated that thing afterwards and found there was a plan to get me to pay money. I was looked upon by certain Bolshevik officials as being a capitalist. I was the trustee of our property, because it was found up to a certain time that we could not very well have our legalizing papers, but we took counsel with our lawyer, who was also the lawyer for the ambassador, and he said the best thing to do was to keep your property for the time being, until things became normal and Russia had a new law, in your own name. I was, because of being known as a property owner, put in the fourth category, which, of course, was to be starved out and in due time expedited.

I happen to know that some of the Americans who had property over there were blackmailed; one man in particular, Mr. Hervey, with whom I had had long talks up to the time I left. They had arrested him, and he was to pay a fine. He had a factory over there, and he had invested something like $100,000, so he told me, and the reason he stayed there was to protect his property. For some violation of a decret, he had to pay a fine. They were getting out new decrets every week, and a man did not know what he could do and what he could not do, because of the multiplicity of decrets.

Senator KING. They were the basis of confiscation, were they not?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. They were working out, if you please, a new scheme of government, which touched every conceivable thing in a man's social and economic existence. We at times felt so nervous that we did not know what next to expect. Where we used to have to pay 3 rubles a year as a dog tax—we had two English fox terriers who did excellent police duty for us—under the Bolsheviks we had to pay 50 rubles for each dog. The telephone bill used to be something like, as I recall it, 85 rubles. Under the Bolsheviks it was in the neighborhood of 300 rubles—that is, for our class. For a business man it would be, I suppose, from 500 to 600 rubles. And so all along. If you had a bathtub, or if you had more windows than ordinarily a man ought to have, or if you had a piano, or an organ—and the last thing, that distressed us very much was that all typewriters were to be registered. I tried to get our new American typewriter put in the embassy, and the old Russian one as well. Those were never registered. I was advised by the secretary, who is still there, to do as others had been doing.

Senator OVERMAN. They had the idea of fixing a tax on typewriters?

Mr. SIMONS. They had the idea of laying their hands on everything. They could not get away from that, because they simply had a diabolical zest for grabbing; and they were putting it really through in such a cruel way; they came in with such a diabolical glee and they would be so offensive in their language. I have had occasion to speak with some of these men, who were usually Jews, and I would never mince matters with them. I would say, "Do you know who I am, and what I have done for Russia?" and so on. "Why do you proceed in this way?" Usually when I got through they would be ready to kiss my feet, which was not necessary; and I have this impression, that there is a large criminal element in the Bolsheviki régime. Anybody that knows anything about Russia knows this, that when the great revolution of the winter of 1917 came, all the courts with their documents were destroyed. For days and days we saw tons of old documents smoldering on the streets. They threw those things out of the buildings and set fire to them, and what not. The same thing happened to the police buildings. We had a police precinct, so called, diagonally opposite our property, and I was on good terms with the captain, so called, of that precinct. He was a fine gentleman. I knew the other men in the office very well. That is only on the side. Out of the prisons which were destroyed by fire—they placed machine guns on them—out of the prisons, out of the houses of detention, out of the other institutions where certain people had been kept by order of the court, came thousands of the worst type of criminals. Kerensky and the provisional government tried to rearrest some of those. They succeeded in getting some of them back under cover. But when this Bolsheviki, anarchistic movement effervesced, in the summer of 1917, there were groups that would swarm around certain of these places to get their comrades out, and so by the time the Bolsheviki revolution was pretty well under swing there were practically no criminals in a place where they ought to be kept, and we know it to be a fact that some of the worst characters have been holding positions under the Bolsheviki.

Senator KING. And those that were not elevated to such positions—

Mr. SIMONS. Were engaged as agitators.

Senator KING. And many of them were armed and constituted a part of the Bolsheviki armies?

Mr. SIMONS. And afterwards, because of their relation to the Bolsheviki régime, and having their protection, went out and raided houses; and when the banks were to be confiscated, socialized, and nationalized—those were the three terms we were hearing there all the time for their damnable robbery—there were men who were known to be criminals going into these banks and helping to do that sort of thing. That is a well-known fact, and you can get the names over there.

Senator NELSON. Did not the Bolsheviki also absorb and take into their fold in one form or another the old nihilists?

Mr. SIMONS. They would take anybody in. They would even take a monarchist in, provided the monarchist would say, "I will help you to run this department."

Senator NELSON. Doctor, will you go on and tell us what you saw in reference to the efforts of the proletariat to take possession of the property of the capitalists?

Senator KING. If I may be pardoned, you asked him a question a few moments ago, in answer to which the doctor gave one or two instances of cruelty that came under his own observation. Generally speaking, without going into details, what can you say as to there being a reign of terror involving murder, assassination, and the driving of people from their homes, and the starving of men, women, and children, particularly those who did not belong to what might be denominated the Bolsheviki?

Mr. SIMONS. I could speak for hours on that and prove that the thing is diabolically terroristic, and that they have a strong animus against everybody who is not in their class, which they call the Black Workmen's Class. As a property owner there and the head of our church I had a good deal to do with them administratively. We were sought by the hour to write out all kinds of documents, according to their scheme, and we were having to run to and fro. They were nearly all Jewish persons we had to deal with, and they were all nasty in their way of speaking of the people of the other class, offensively so, and they would sometimes come into the house and begin to stamp around, until they were given to understand they were not dealing with a Russian citizen but with an American citizen.

A dozen armed men came in there and surrounded my sister and abused her.

Two of them came in there armed one night, for no other reason than that they suspected I was anti-Bolshevik, and, consequently, I must be an anarchist. They banged away at our back door, and my two fox terriers ran after me, and I had to throw them first into the kitchen. I was losing time, and in the meantime these men were getting impatient, and they were just about to break through the door when I opened it. I had to lose some time there because we had a Yale lock, and a bolt, and then an old-fashioned Russian lock on the door, and I had to turn the key in that Russian lock twice, but when I got it open they ran right up to me and held out two revolvers against my chest and threatened to shoot me, charging me with being an anarchist. I smiled and called them "Comrades," and told them there must be a mistake; that I was not a Russian, to begin with, but that I was an American, and was a born democrat and never knew what it was to have any monarchistic ideas at all, and that I was for a republic first, last, and all the time, and long before they were born.

Senator NELSON. And I presume you told them you were a Christian Socialist?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, afterwards that came out; but they stormed around there for a while. But when they saw they had made a mistake they asked whether we had a telephone.

Senator NELSON. Did you talk with them?

Mr. SIMONS. I certainly did.

Senator NELSON. Did they speak English?

Mr. SIMONS. They spoke Russian. Those two Red Guards were not Russians; they were Letts. The way they spoke Russian I could tell they were not real Russians, but were Letts, and the Letts, by the way, are, perhaps, the most cruel element that we had in the revolutions of 1905 and the revolutions of 1917 and 1918.

Senator KING. The Letts constituted about 25 to 30 per cent of the Bolshevik army, as it was constituted about six months ago, and the Chinese about from 50,000 to 60,000, and the criminals about 100,000, with a few Russians, a number of Germans, and a few Austrians scattered among them. Is not that about the situation as it was about six months ago?

Mr. SIMONS. I think you are quite correct, generally speaking. I have learned that there are thousands of German prisoners of war, and Austrian prisoners of war, Austrians and Hungarians, who became infected with the Bolshevik idea while they were in prison camps in Siberia. I have met a few men who were Russians, and had been out there and investigated the thing, and they told me that even last August those men said, "We do not care one way or the other about the Bolshevik government. What we care about is having plenty to eat and good clothes and"—I beg pardon for saying this—"all the women we want." There has been a strong appeal to that thing. The immoral element is so ever present that I hate to say it in this promiscuous company, but I am a Christian clergyman and I know you want testimony. I am not responsible for ladies being here, but the thing is so immoral that it distresses me, especially when ladies are around.

Senator NELSON. Who are the Letts, as contradistinguished from the Russians?

Mr. SIMONS. The Letts are from that section in and around Riga and they constitute a very large part of the population of Riga. When the Germans came in there and suppressed the revolution of the Bolsheviki proletariat in the Baltic Provinces, these Letts, who had done very good fighting under the old régime and were considered the best fighters in the Russian Army, were forced out, and they came from what they considered their own fatherland down into Russia proper, and were, if you please, without their bearings, and Lenine and Trotsky made use of them, offering them large sums of money; and although these Letts are known to have never had any affection for the Germans, especially for the Baltic Germans, and very little affection for the Russians, here came the question of having plenty of food, good shelter, and warm attire, and—I repeat what they have said themselves—the privilege of doing whatever they wished in the cities of Petrograd and Moscow. Lenine and Trotsky both have said, and they have borne it out in their actions, that they would not rely on Russians to protect them, but they would rely on the Letts; and the Russians, on the whole, have no affection for the Letts. I believe the average Russian thinks less of a Lett than he does of any other nationality or race.

Senator NELSON. The Letts are an offshoot of the Finnish race, are they not?

Mr. SIMONS. No; the Esthonians are an offshoot.

Senator KING. The Letts are Slavs, and the Finnish are——

Mr. SIMONS. The Finnish are related to them, and they understand each other quite well. If a Finn is speaking, an Esthonian will catch everything he says, and vice versa.

Senator KING. The Chinese formed a considerable portion of the Red Guards, did they not?

Mr. SIMONS. Chinese coolies, quite a number of them, were up in Finland at that time, doing work under the old régime in Russia, chopping down trees, and doing other manual labor there, and when the Red movement in Finland was suppressed thousands of these Chinese, who were also called coolies, came into Russia proper. We saw quite a number of them in Petrograd; and we had quite an epidemic of smallpox, which was due to these people.

Senator KING. Were they not employed in building that road up on the Kola Peninsula, and the harbor there on the Murman coast?

Mr. SIMONS. I did not have occasion to go up there, so I can not say.

Senator KING. But those Chinese were employed on building that road. Doctor, of your own knowledge, would you say that the Chinese and the German and Austrian soldiers who claimed no citizenship anywhere, men who had been prisoners in Russia, constituted a part of the Bolshevik military establishment?

Mr. SIMONS. I will go this far in saying that but for this element there never would have been a nucleus to the Red army.

Senator KING. So, then, these former German prisoners and former Austrian prisoners, and the Chinese coolies and the Letts, with some Russians, constituted the major part of the army?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; and, of course, they were getting thousands of Russian workmen. That we saw with our own eyes, that they no longer could get any work, because nearly all their factories were put out of business; and there is a long story connected with that which involves German agents, and much machinery was destroyed for no other purpose than that, as we knew, Russia was to be crippled economically and made dependent upon Germany for various products; and we also knew—and this I state emphatically—that at the time of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, thousands of commercial men from Germany were already walking the streets of Petrograd and Moscow and other large centers, taking orders.

Senator NELSON. For German goods?

Mr. SIMONS. For German wares; and it looked very much as though Germany had it in her mind to cripple Russia economically, and the Bolshevik régime had——

Senator NELSON. Winked at it?

Mr. SIMONS. Helped it very much. Whether they did that knowingly or not I do not know; I am not going to say; but it looked rather suspicious to many of us who were eyewitnesses. I knew men who were at the head of the work at the factories, and they said, "Just to think of it! These workmen came in here and they stormed around, and they pulled the finest machinery to pieces, and when we tried to prevail with them not to do this, that it was bread and butter, they said, 'Ha, our bread and butter! We are now demolishing capitalism.'" That was put into their heads, "We are now abolishing capitalism;" but they were killing the goose that laid the golden egg. They did not quite see the connection between having a factory that was kept intact and the possibility of having a livelihood. The sad part of it all is that most of those people were illiterates, and it was a foregone conclusion that many of these things could not be otherwise.

Senator NELSON. Doctor, will you go on and describe to us the soviet plan of government, their scheme of government, and the way they propose to put it into practice?

Senator KING. Before that, if you will permit me, right there in sequence: You spoke about their cruelties and atrocities. What did it result in with respect to the bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. It resulted in this, that thousands of the best people of Petrograd and Moscow and other parts had been losing all their property, and in many cases were having members of their own households arrested. Ever so many of these things came under my personal observation. They had only one wish, and that was to get out of Russia. But the Bolsheviks were not letting people get out of Russia. It was the hardest thing to get permission from them if you wanted to leave Russia. But they were making their escape by all kinds of methods. I will not go into that. Many of them succeeded, and we succeeded in getting some very distinguished people out of Russia ourselves by hook and crook, because some of them said:

"If we do not get out we know we are going to be murdered, because our names are on the lists of the thousands who are held as bourgeois hostages."

Senator OVERMAN. Hostages? What does that mean? It is not used in the ordinary sense, I understand.

Mr. SIMONS. To state it popularly, their idea was to hold certain people of the bourgeois class, whose names they had down to be arrested, and perhaps put out of the way if anything befell the Bolshevik government; for instance, like the attempt to kill Lenine, or the successful assassination of Uritzky, commissar in Petrograd, who was killed by a fellow Jew; and these people were held as hostages.

Senator KING. To illustrate, they are holding now as hostage the wives and the families of some of the Russian officers whom they have forced into their army?

Mr. SIMONS. They are.

Senator KING. And if they do not run the army as they think they ought to, they threaten to kill their families?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know whether I ought to come out with this statement, but scores of them have come to me and said that it was breaking their hearts. They say, "We have to do this, but we think you and others ought to know, and hope you will square us with the allies." Some of the finest men I have known have said, "If we do not go in they will shoot us right down." Some were shot; some made their escape; some were in hiding for months and months, never sleeping in the same place two nights in succession. Some of these horrible things were being enacted for weeks and weeks right in our own section, and some Americans were arrested and then afterwards released.

You asked me about their terroristic methods. I was an American and was known to be a friend of Russia, and a friend of the working people, and yet in our open meetings it became so apparent that there was a strong feeling against the Christian religion, against everything that was Christian, especially against the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association and the Salvation Army, and all Christian bodies, that threats were made like this: A group of ill-clad workmen stood in front of our house at the close of an open-air meeting which I had conducted one Sunday afternoon, which we have been doing ever since the great winter of 1917. One of our members overheard one of them say, "Before sundown we are going to stick out the eyes of that man with the spectacles." They never got as far as the spectacles.

Another case was this, where an intoxicated self-confessed Bolshevik was moving around the pulpit. We had to take our pulpit and put it on the stone stoop that we had on the side of the house, and then we would have hundreds of people facing us, and he would move around that pulpit and I would talk kindly with him, and I told him that it was evident that he was tired, and so on, and wouldn't he take one of those chairs. We had a few chairs out there for some of our elderly people. He refused to be seated, and he came back to the pulpit again. One of our oldest members talked with him and he said, "I am going to put that man out of business," and he lingered around our property for a couple of hours. After the meeting was over this one member felt very nervous about it. He had been imbibing, so this friend of ours, a member of our church, took him all around those streets near the garden, as they call it, or Haven of Petrograd—so that he finally, when it grew dark, did not know where he was—and then left him, and we never saw him again.

I could relate a few other things—how they tried to break into our house early in the morning, and one of the men was promptly killed by a Red Guard.

Senator KING. Doctor, what I was trying to get at is the extent of the terror and the effect on the bourgeoisie and the mass of the higher classes: whether they are forced to starve to death or not?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. We saw them as walking shadows in the streets of Petrograd. I have seen with my own eyes people dropping dead. First, before they pass away over there, their faces bloat up; and we had at one time, when we were not getting bread, an average of 60 horses dropping dead on the street.

Senator KING. Per day?

Mr. SIMONS. Sixty horses per day. I have seen many of them myself lying there. A Mohammedan and a Jew came up, and they would dicker with each other before the horse had gone to the place of his fathers, and they would say, "If we could keep him alive a few hours more, he would be worth more." They would sell horse-flesh. I have seen people standing there—I recollect in one instance a man in a general's uniform, a man with a white beard, stood on Bolshoi Prospect with tears on his cheeks, asking, "For God's sake, give me a few kopecks." None of the workmen would give him any. He stood there. I almost collapsed myself, because I had suffered myself and seen so much of this diabolical business, this antihumanitarian régime; yet I wanted to see that. I thought that would be effective in my book. And some people of the second and third and fourth categories, who had a few spare stamps—we had no coins any more—would give him 20 or 30 kopecks. I have been in homes where they had not had any bread for weeks, and I recall one case now—

Senator KING. Would these be the bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. But they were also putting the screws on people who were not bourgeois, but who were—I presume the best thing would be to call them the middle class—people that believed in the use of a clean handkerchief once in a while, having perhaps a gold ring; but that immediately would put them under the condemnation of being bourgeois. I had occasion to speak with people who were working and people who were not bourgeois. I interviewed hundreds, and I asked them, "Well, what do you think of this thing?" "Well, we know that it is first of all German, and second, we know that it is Jewish. It is not a Russian proposition at all. That became so popular that as you moved through the streets in Petrograd in July and August and September and the beginning of October, openly they would tell you this, "This is not a Russian Government; this is a German and Hebrew Government." And then others would come out and say, "And very soon there is going to be a big pogrom." As a result of that, hundreds of Bolshevik officials who happened to be Jews were sending their wives and their children out of Petrograd and Moscow, afraid that the pogrom would really come. I cabled something of that in a quiet way to our authorities, and it came to them through the State Department.

Senator WOLCOTT. I gather from what you say, Doctor, that this whole régime over there is sustained by a small minority of these elements that are entirely out of sympathy with the great Russian people, and that they are imposing their will upon that nation by force and terror. Is that correct or not?

Mr. SIMONS. Absolutely correct, and I have seen with my own eyes how they have been marching hundreds of people down the Bolshoi Prospect, on which our property was situated, and I have seen them marching hundreds of them down to the garden or haven, and from there they were taken down to Kronstadt and put in the fortress there; and then through members of the Norwegian legation, the Danish legation, and the Swedish legation, we would learn that scores of them were being killed.

Senator KING. Was that a constant occurrence?

Mr. SIMONS. That was, Senator, after the assassination of Commissar Uritzky.

Senator WOLCOTT. By the way, have you ever had any occasion to make a rough estimate of the number of murders committed by this Bolshevik régime from the time they got in the ascendancy in November, 1917, until the time you left?

Mr. SIMONS. It was almost impossible to get any statistics on that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Not even approximate?

Mr. SIMONS. I would not dare even to guess.

Senator WOLCOTT. In the hundreds or thousands?

Mr. SIMONS. I should say that if what they have said in their speeches, in their proclamations, and in their Bolshevik press, would be any indication, already thousands of the bourgeois class have been killed; because they came out openly and said, "For every one of the proletariat that is killed we shall kill a thousand of the bourgeois class."

Senator KING. What do you say as to the starvation, the extent of it among the bourgeois and the better classes?

Mr. SIMONS. They had a system which divided the population into four classes. The first category—they used the term "category"—was made up of the black workmen's class. They were to have any food that might be available.

Senator KING. The soldiers came first, did they not?

Mr. SIMONS. And the Red army; yes.

Senator KING. Then the black workmen?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, I am speaking now of this particular thing they were sending around to us. I have a copy with me here, and I could show you that in translation. The first category was the black workmen's class. That constituted, if you please, the nobility of the proletariat. Then came the second category, of men who were working in the stores and offices. If anything was left after the first category got theirs, they came in. Then came the third category, which included the professional people, teachers, doctors, lawyers, clergymen, artists, singers, and so on. I belonged to that category, as a pastor. Then came the fourth category, made up of the property owners and the capitalists.

The third and the fourth classes, they said openly in their Bolshevik press and proclamations and speeches, were to be starved out. If I have heard it and read it once, I have come across that statement scores of times, and they even had cartoons showing how the people of culture and refinement were being treated like dogs who are watching for a crumb that falls from the table. I have seen some of the most inhumane pictures in the month of August, 1918. As a member of a category I was entitled for the whole month to one-eighth of a pound of bread, and my sister likewise. Our head deaconess was treated in the same way. We were doing charitable work, too, but all that had no influence; and the fact that we were trying to get food into Russia, and they knew that we were cabling, and all that, did not weigh with them at all. We were simply put in the same category. We ought to be starved out.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me ask you: Suppose a workingman living in Petrograd had, by his hard labor, saved enough to buy himself a little home, and lived with his wife and children in his home, which he had been able to buy by hard labor and saving all his life, what class would he have fallen in?

Mr. SIMONS. If he had worked in a factory and was a member of the factory unit in the so-called workmen's book, with his portrait in it, that came in under the Bolshevik régime as a substitute for the passport; he would usually be considered as a workman, and under the present Bolsheviki would not be molested because of owning property.

Senator WOLCOTT. Suppose he was not working any longer?

Mr. SIMONS. If they had suspicions that he had a bourgeois spirit and ideals and wanted to wear a white shirt and to use certain things that we people of refinement are accustomed to, he might fall into disgrace with them.

Senator WOLCOTT. He would be marked for starvation, would he?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, now, that is hypothetical. Judging from what I have seen there, I would say that they would mark him. I think so.

Senator WOLCOTT. When a man is marked for starvation, are his wife and children in the same category with him, under their way of reforming the world?

Mr. SIMONS. You are speaking in a general way. There are exceptions over there. I know of many cases where even people of the third and fourth categories, by properly manipulating the subway resources, have been able to get almost everything they wanted. The Bolsheviki official is just as weak to accept bribes as the officials were under the old régime, and if you have enough money you can have almost anything you please; and if you find that you are listed to be arrested and killed, if you have enough money your life will be spared. I have had such cases under my observation. Money talks, over there.

Senator KING. By confiscating property have they been able to get money to pay their men and soldiers and officials?

Mr. SIMONS. I am not informed as to how much real money they got into their hands. I understood that when they rifled ever so many safe-deposit vaults there was a great disappointment. They did not find all the gold they expected to get.

Senator KING. They are using paper money almost exclusively?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; but they were after gold.

Senator KING. Has the population of Petrograd and Moscow been largely reduced by reason of the terrorism and starvation?

Mr. SIMONS. The last I heard was that Petrograd, which used to have—I am speaking now of the period under the great war—a population of over 2,000,000, and it got up to about 2,300,000, as I recall, has dropped down, so we are told, to 600,000 or 800,000.

Senator KING. Up to the time you left?

Mr. SIMONS. Up to the time I left.

Senator KING. Could you witness a great reduction in the population?

Mr. SIMONS. Why, I noticed this, that we had very few of the middle class left, and of the so-called aristocracy hardly any. At that time they were making arrangements to have the working class enter the palaces and mansions and the fine homes and apartments. The president of the northern union came out with a very red-hot proclamation—I think it was in July or August, 1918—in which he began by saying, "The English have a saying, 'My house is my castle.'" That was his theme. Then he used a good deal of inflammatory language, and upheld to the hoi polloi, the proletariat of Russia, to take what belonged rightfully to them. All property belonged to the proletariat. It was the blood of their forefathers and fathers and brothers and themselves that had paid the price for it, and now they should take what belonged to them; and he closed his proclamation—I am only giving you this as I have it in my memory—by saying, "Yes; my house is my castle, and the Russian work-ing-man is going to defend it with a gun."

Senator NELSON. Are Lenine and Trotsky Yiddish?

Mr. SIMONS. Lenine is from a very fine old Russian family, so we are told, and is intellectually a very able man. A fanatic, he was called the brains of this movement. Trotsky is a Jew. His real name is Leon Bronstein.

Senator KING. Why are they so bitter toward religion, especially the Christian religion?

Mr. SIMONS. There is a gentleman here in America who last night called on me, Dr. Harris A. Houghton, I think is his full name. I knew him out in Bay Side when I was the pastor of that church. He called on me last night. He is a captain in the United States Army. I had not seen him for six years. He asked me whether I knew anything about the anti-Christian element in the Bolshevik régime. I said, "Indeed, I do. I do know all about it." He said, "Did you ever come across the so-called Jewish protocols?" I said, "Yes; I have had them." "I have a memorandum," he said, "and last winter after much trouble I came into possession of a book which was called 'Redusti, anti-Christ.'" Now, Dr. Houghton in the meantime had investigated this. He had come into possession of this book, which is quite rare now, because it was said that when the edition came out it was immediately bought up by the Jews in Petrograd and Moscow. That book reflects a real organization. That book is of some consequence. But the average person in official life here in Washington and elsewhere is afraid to handle it. Houghton says that even in his intelligence bureau they were afraid of it.

Senator KING. Tell us about the book. What is so bad about it? Is it anti-Christian?

MR. SIMONS. It is anti-Christian, and it shows what this secret Jewish society has been doing in order to make a conquest of the world, and to make the Christian forces as ineffective as possible, and finally to have the whole world, if you please, in their grip; and now in that book ever so many things are said with regard to their program and their methods, which dovetail into the Bolshevik régime. It just looks as if that is connected in some way.

Now, I have no animus against the Jews, but I have a great passion for truth. If there is anything in it, I think we ought to know. The man who wrote it is considered a truth-loving man, a man held in the highest esteem by the authorities of the Russian Orthodox Church.

SENATOR KING. Of course, that book or any teachings in that book would not appeal to the Letts or the Chinese coolies or the German soldiers, or to some who are controlling these Bolshevik movements. What I am trying to get at is, for my information, why Bolshevism is bitterly opposed to all sorts of religion or sacraments of the church—Christianity; because I suppose they recognize that Christianity is the basis of law and order and of orderly government. I was wondering if you had discovered why they were so bitter against Christianity, and if you found that all the Bolsheviks were atheistic or rationalistic or anti-Christian?

MR. SIMONS. My experience over there under the Bolshevik régime has led me to come to the conclusion that the Bolshevik religion is not only absolutely antireligious, atheistic, but has it in mind to make all real religious work impossible as soon as they can achieve that end which they are pressing. There was a meeting—I can not give you the date offhand; it must have been in August, 1918—held in a large hall that had once been used by the Young Men's Christian Association in Petrograd for their work among the Russian soldiers. The Bolsheviks confiscated it; put out the Y. M. C. A. In that large hall there was a meeting held which was to be a sort of religious dispute. Lunacharsky, the commissar of people's enlightenment, as he was called, and Mr. Spitzberg, who was the commissar of propaganda for Bolshevism, were the two main speakers. Both of those men spoke in very much the same way as Emma Goldman has been speaking. I have been getting some of her literature, and recently I have been very much amazed at the same line of argumentation with regard to the attack on religion and Christianity and so-called religious organizations.

SENATOR KING. She is the Bolshevik who has been in jail in this country and who will be deported as soon as her sentence is over?

MR. SIMONS. I do not know as she will be deported.

SENATOR KING. I think she will be.

MR. SIMONS. She ought to be put somewhere where she can not issue any more of that literature. Lunacharsky and Spitzberg came out with pretty much the same things that she has been saying and printing. This is one of these theses: "All that is bad in the world, misery and suffering that we have had, is largely due to the superstition that there is a God."

SENATOR KING. I noticed in yesterday's paper that in their schools the children are being taught, wherever they have schools at all, positive atheism. Did you verify that?

Mr. SIMONS. Lunacharsky, as the official head of the department of education, commissar of the people's enlightenment, said, "We now propose to enlighten our boys and our girls and we are using as a textbook a catechism of atheism which will be used in our public schools." Yet he had the audacity to say: "We are going to give all churches the same chance." And a priest replied to him, saying: "Then you ought not to put your catechism of atheism into the schools."

Senator KING. Did you find, then, that atheism permeates the ranks of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir. And the anti-Christ spirit as well.

Senator NELSON. In this book that you refer to is there anything that goes to show that this Bolshevik government of Russia are supporting, directly or indirectly, this book of protocols?

Mr. SIMONS. Before answering that question I should like to see that translation, because I do not know how this thing has been done. (A pamphlet was handed to the witness.)

Senator NELSON. You have seen the original book?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. Some very finely educated Russian generals of note have told me that they considered this as an authentic thing, and they say the marvelous part of it is that nearly all of that is being executed under the Bolsheviks.

Senator KING. Before you leave that, one other question: I have seen a number of translations—have seen the Russian and the translations of what purported to be decrees or orders of some of the so-called soviets, in effect abolishing marriage and establishing what has been called "free love." Do you know anything about that?

Mr. SIMONS. Their program you will find in the Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engel. Since we left Petrograd they have, if the newspaper reports are to be relied upon, already instituted a very definite program with regard to the so-called socialization of women, each woman from 18 to 45 being obliged to appear before the commissariat and be given, nolens volens, a man with whom she shall live.

Senator NELSON. In marriage?

Mr. SIMONS. You can call it marriage or whatever you want to call it. I have seen a number of people over there under the bolshevistic modus operandi. One was an American. He married a Russian girl. He was married in the commissariat and had to answer a few questions and sign his name, and she signed her name, and among other questions that they asked were these: "How do you propose to be married?" "How many children do you propose to have?" And things of that kind. And then later he came to our headquarters and we married the couple there in Russian and English; and other cases have come under my observation. But what they are doing now I am not in a position to say, authoritatively, except what has been in the papers.

Senator KING. Doctor, you have read and heard of and come in contact with the I. W. W.'s of this country, and their destructive creed, their advocacy of the destruction of our form of government. I will ask you whether or not, from your observations of the Bolsheviks and the I. W. W., you see any difference?

Mr. SIMONS. I am strongly impressed with this, that the Bolsheviks and the I. W. W. movements are identical. Zorin told me, the commissar of the post and telegraph——

Senator OVERMAN. He had been an American?

Mr. SIMONS. He had been eight years in New York, and knew some of our leaders here in our own Methodist Church.

Maj. HUMES. Had he been naturalized in this country?

Mr. SIMONS. He had not; no. But he said he had been eight years in New York, and had been in religious disputes with some of our own leaders. Zorin said to me, "We have now made our greatest acquisition, Maxim Gorky, who used to be against us, has come over to our side. He is now with us and has taken charge of our literary work. You know we have conquered Russia. We next propose to conquer Germany and then America."

Senator NELSON. A big job.

Senator KING. Do you know to what extent they sent out their representatives in the surrounding countries of Europe, giving them money with which to carry on the propaganda of Bolshevism?

Mr. SIMONS. We had heard again and again that they had been sending out sums of money into different parts of Europe, and when nobody except people of the diplomatic class were permitted to send out anything at all they were sending, day in and day out, from Petrograd over to Stockholm, and over to Copenhagen, large bags. Now, what those bags contained we can not say with any surety, but it is suspected that those bags contained very likely Bolshevik literature, and perhaps money, and perhaps also valuables which were being confiscated, because many of the rare old jewels and historic things which have been kept intact for decades in the past, and so on, have disappeared and no one knows where they are.

Senator KING. One other question: Did you see any coordination, if I may use the term, between the German troops, after Germany sent troops into Russia, and the Bolshevik troops, in the Bolshevik government? That is to say, did you find that they worked together?

Mr. SIMONS. I was not in a position to follow that up, but I have heard that it is true. I have heard that from Russian officers and members of the military mission; and they used the same kind of literature in both camps.

Senator KING. Did you learn whether or not the Bolsheviks aided the Germans as against the allies, surrendered them their guns and munitions, and some of which they had been accumulating in the Russian Army to be used against the allies, including the United States? The point I am trying to get at is, did any of the munitions that the Russian Army possessed when, through the action of the Bolsheviks, the armies were disintegrated fall into the hands of the Germans?

Mr. SIMONS. That statement has been made. I do happen to know this, that came out while I was passing from Stockholm. A man who had been in the military mission at one time and was at last working with the war council at Petrograd, told me what they had discovered on a Russian battleship in the Neva; that the ship had the archives, so called, of the Russian Navy, showing where the forts and fortresses were, where the mines were laid, and the whole naval position with regard to Russia; and that there was found a letter which had been signed by Trotsky to the effect that under certain circumstances the archives of the Russian Navy would be turned over to certain German officers.

Senator KING. Well, Doctor, I did not care for hearsay. What I had in mind was what you knew personally.

Mr. SIMONS. We knew that they were preparing millions of rubles for propaganda purposes in China, for instance, in India, and in other parts of the world.

Senator KING. South America?

Mr. SIMONS. That appeared in their daily press. That was well known. They made no secret of that.

Senator KING. For the purpose of destroying all other governments and bringing them under Bolshevism?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir; and putting all other institutions out of commission that stood, if you please, for the class that they wanted to destroy. Lunacharsky and Spitzberg said in that meeting, and they sent it out in their proclamations, "The greatest enemy to our proletarian cause is religion. The so-called church is simply a camouflage of capitalistic control and they are hiding behind it, and in order to have success in our movement we must get rid of the church." Now, a frank statement like that seems to me to indicate their antireligious and anti-Christian animus.

Senator KING. Then, would this be a fair statement, from your knowledge of Bolshevism, that any persons in this country, misguided or sinister, who get up in theaters or other places on the lecture platform and advocate Bolshevism or defend it or apologize for it, are first approving the course of the Bolsheviks in disintegrating the armies, to that extent making the cause of our Government and of the allies in defeating the central powers more difficult? It would have that effect. The effect of their conduct would be an indorsement of their course? Secondly, an indorsement or approval would be the indorsement or approval of a course of a party that stands for the grossest kind of materialism and atheism, and is against marriage, against the right of property, against the democratic form of government, such as that which we have, and against the civilization which has been builded up under our form of government?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. Bolshevism stands for all those things? Its apologists are our enemies, enemies to our country and to our form of Government and to civilization?

Mr. SIMONS. Whether they know that they are enemies, or they have no clear notion as to what the American spirit means, I think it is safe to say that they are mush-headed and muddle-headed.

Senator NELSON. Are you acquainted with Albert Rys Williams, who has issued that pamphlet?

Mr. SIMONS. I know him.

Senator NELSON. Have you met him in Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. I have met him in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us about his activities and whom he associated with there?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know whether it would be wise for me to say what I did see. I am not sure whether he is an American citizen. I should first like to know whether he is an American citizen. A gentleman came up to me when I spoke before the preachers' meeting in Philadelphia and said that he had learned that Williams was not an American. If he is not, then I am free to speak.

Maj. HUMES. I may tell you that he was born in this country. Unless he has renounced his citizenship he is an American citizen.

Senator OVERMAN. He is distributing these pamphlets on the East Side of New York where Bolshevism has been nourished?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And you were approached by this Yiddish fellow with this catechism in his hand?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, I only wish to say this, that if he is an American citizen I should like to show him the courtesy due one of my compatriots, and I do not want to say anything in your presence until he has had a chance to speak for himself.

Senator OVERMAN. He may be able to speak for himself.

Senator KING. Was he associating with the soviets over there, and making speeches for them?

Mr. SIMONS. We knew at that time that he was not only very sympathetic with the Bolsheviki, but he was helping them in many ways. We know that; and he was embarrassing our own embassy and consulate in a very effective way.

Senator NELSON. Perhaps we had not better go into it further now, but we would be glad to hear you later on this subject.

Senator KING. Just one other question. I will ask you whether or not you noticed any difference in the personnel of the soviet after Lenine and Trotsky got control; that is to say, when Lenine and Trotsky came into power the soviets existed, and as I understand it, many of the soviets were elected by the people and the representatives of the soviets were fair representatives of the people. Now, what I am trying to get at is, after Lenine and Trotsky came in, whether or not the personnel of the soviets changed. My information is, and I want to know whether it is correct or not, that they would frequently send out from Petrograd and Moscow their tools, and they would supersede the soviets in various administrations and put in men who shared the views of Lenine and Trotsky.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; that was a well-known fact. That came under our observation again and again.

Senator KING. So, then, whereas the soviet in the beginning might be called a fair representative of the people, now it is merely a tool of Lenine and Trotsky and the Bolshevik administration?

Mr. SIMONS. That is correct. I happen to know that shortly before I left Russia fully 90 per cent of the peasants were anti-Bolshevik, and it was said by people qualified to judge of the situation over there that fully three-fourths of the workmen were anti-Bolshevik, and they were hoping that Bolshevism would soon be defeated.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to ask you, Doctor, if during the noon hour you will refresh your recollection and be prepared when we meet again to give us a list of all the commissars that you know or did know, with their correct names and their assumed names and the nationality of each indicated? Make up such a list, in so far as your memory can carry you.

Mr. SIMONS. I think I have mentioned the names of those that I really know.

Senator WOLCOTT. None outside of those?

Mr. SIMONS. There were minor officials.

Senator WOLCOTT. But you can add to them any others you may remember, as you think over it.

AFTER RECESS.

The subcommittee met at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of recess, and at 2.40 o'clock proceeded with the hearing of Mr. Simons.

TESTIMONY OF REVEREND MR. GEORGE A. SIMONS—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. Doctor, I understood you to say that you belonged to the Northern Methodist Church?

Mr. SIMONS. The Methodist Episcopal Church North.

Senator OVERMAN. As contradistinguished from the South? And you were head not only of your mission over there but you were the head of an educational institution, as I understand it?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the name of that?

Mr. SIMONS. We called it the English School of the American Church. That was one name, and we also had a theological seminary located there.

Senator OVERMAN. You had a regular curriculum and faculty?

Mr. SIMONS. Oh, yes.

I hope that I will not be misunderstood with regard to the facts that came out in my testimony concerning the Jewish element in this Bolsheviki movement. I am not anti-Semitic and have no sympathy with any movement of that kind, and some of my best friends in Russia and America are Jews, and as I have been moving around making the matter clear before large audiences in churches and factories, many Jews have come up and have thanked me for having said what they regarded as true, and they assured me that the better class of Jews—and there are hundreds of thousands of them in America—would stand shoulder to shoulder with the Christians in fighting the red flag.

Senator OVERMAN. I understood that all the time you were speaking of what is known as the——

Mr. SIMONS. The apostate Jews. I only wish to be properly quoted, because I should not like to offend those fine American citizens who happen to be Jews, for they are just as good morally every way as we Christians are.

Senator OVERMAN. I think our newspaper reporters will make that understood in their reports, that you are not speaking of anybody but the apostates.

Mr. SIMONS. There are hundreds of rabbis who will help us in this matter. I thank you for permitting me to clear that up.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you have any names to add to the list I asked you for?

Senator OVERMAN. There is a lady here who has a complete list of all those names.

Senator WOLCOTT. And giving their nationality, and where they are from?

Maj. HUMES. I think so.

Senator WOLCOTT. All right; we will get it from some other witness.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see this list of names that Mrs. Summers handed in?

Mr. SIMONS. I have seen at least four different lists, and the first that came out I have in my possession here. This came out about August, 1917, and was widely circulated in Petrograd and Moscow [reading]:

	Real name.		Real name.
1. Chernoff-----	Von Gutmann.	11. Zinovyeff-----	Apfelbaum.
2. Trotsky-----	Bronstein.	12. Stekloff-----	Nachamkes.
3. Martoff-----	Zederbaum.	13. Larin-----	Lurye.
4. Kamkoff-----	Katz.	14. Ryazanoff-----	Goldenbach.
5. Meshkoff-----	Goldenberg.	15. Bogdanoff-----	Josse.
6. Zagorsky-----	Krochmal.	16. Goryeff-----	Goldmann.
7. Suchanoff-----	Gimmer.	17. Zvezdin-----	Wanstein.
8. Dan-----	Gurvitch.	18. Lieber-----	Goldmann.
9. Parvuss-----	Geldfand.	19. Ganezky-----	Furstenberg.
10. Kradek-----	Sabelson.	20. Roshal-----	Solomon.

And then the last one did not change his name. That is the first list that we had.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know how many of those came from America?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not. I have not investigated.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is the list of men who were officially connected with the Bolshevik government?

Mr. SIMONS. When this statement came out it was suggested that "These are the men who are now working against the provisional Government with might and main and to bring in the Bolshevik rule." Other lists followed.

Senator OVERMAN. Why do you suppose they wanted to change their names?

Mr. SIMONS. Soon after the outbreak of the war there were many people in Russia who had German names and who had them changed to Russian names, because there was a strong anti-German movement, and they were very much discriminated against, and to have a German name was in fact to be insulted almost anywhere. It took some time before, on the whole, that feeling subsided. When the Russian revolution came along there was none of that to be seen any more, and some of these people took their names back, changed them back from the last form to the old German form; but when the Bolshevik movement came on we noticed that there were ever so many people who were Jews and had real Jewish names, who were not using them. They had assumed Russian names. Now, there may be two or three explanations given for that. One that has been offered now and then is as follows: Some of these men had two or three passports. You could get a passport if you needed it, from certain agents in Russia, and we were told that even in New York City there were certain people who were dealing in Russian passports. We knew that there were such people in different parts of Europe, especially near the German-Russian border, and the Austro-Hungarian-Russian border, who made a regular business of selling or loaning out Russian passports. A man would take a passport like that, and then he would use that particular name.

Now, that is one explanation. Another explanation given is that among the real Russians there would be an antipathy against the Jew, and a man having a real Jewish name would be discriminated against.

Then there is another reason given by some of our friends who are always up in the literary world in Russia—and one is a famous editor. These have said that perhaps the psychology of it could be stated thus: We want to make this thing appear as a purely Russian thing, and if our real names, which are nearly all Jewish names, appear, it will militate against the success of our experiment in socialism and government. People—millions of real Russians—will say "That thing is not Russian. The names all show that."

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Trotsky?

Mr. SIMONS. I did not know him. I have been quoted in the papers as having had conversations with Trotsky and Lenine, and having shown them our discipline. I do not know how that story ever became current, because I never said such a thing, never wrote it, and never dreamed it, but the newspaper men will sometimes imagine things.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you hear him speak?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not.

Senator OVERMAN. He did not change his name?

Mr. SIMONS. His name is Bronstein.

Senator NELSON. He is Yiddish?

Senator OVERMAN. Is he one of these Yiddish Jews? You call them Yiddish instead of Jews, and I want to distinguish.

Mr. SIMONS. When we speak of the lower East Side, we are thinking of hundreds of thousands of people who are speaking and reading several other languages as well as Yiddish.

I might mention this, that when the Bolsheviki came into power, all over Petrograd we at once had a predominance of Yiddish proclamations, big posters, and everything in Yiddish. It became very evident that now that was to be one of the great languages of Russia; and the real Russians, of course, did not take very kindly to it.

Senator NELSON. Now, I should be glad to have you describe the Bolshevik plan and system of government, their scheme and plan of government, and as they proclaimed it and outlined it to the people. This is the second time I have asked it.

Senator KING. I want to ask, for my own information, do you mean as they idealize it or as they apply it?

Senator NELSON. Both. I want it so far as the written documents are concerned, and as they apply it, both.

Mr. SIMONS. So far as the mechanical part of their government is concerned, I think they have been quite consistent in carrying out that end; and as far as their proclamations have been concerned, we regret to say that they not only consistently carry most of them out but put in a lot more than was bargained for, if you please, and to that extent that all kinds of atrocities and cruelties were committed under the authority of this or that decree or proclamation.

Senator NELSON. What I mean is, what is the plan and scheme of government that they offer to the people? Outline their constitution.

MR. SIMONS. It is, as you have seen in most of the papers here, a government that is to be, first, last, and all the time, predominantly a government of the industrial workers. It is to be a government of the so-called "workmen's councils," and it is a government of the proletariat. Many of their phrases they have taken from the communist manifesto of March, and one in particular, "a dictatorship of the proletariat." A Bolshevik official would be asked, "Well, how about liberty?" The chances are that he would answer as Lenine and Trotsky did on several occasions, "We do not believe in liberty. We believe in the dictatorship of the proletariat." Now, when I have mentioned that, Senator, I have given you, if you please, the heart of their government scheme, and everything moves around that.

The other part is quite, to my way of thinking, of little consequence—the machinery. They have what they call the soviet government, built up on the lines of a social democratic representation, excluding, of course, everybody that is not Bolshevik. Or if he is not Bolshevik, if he consents to work with them and to just submerge his own political opinions, well and good. He can hold office. In fact, we know that right in Petrograd and Moscow there were hundreds of men, scores of them, like myself, who were not Bolsheviks, that had been in certain ministries under the old régime, and they had continued under the provisional government, and in order to save their own lives and the lives of their families and to have food and comfort and what not, and be protected, they remained in office, although for a time some of them had held out in what was called sabotage. I knew some of these men and some of the things that we were able to do. Favors that were shown us as an American institution were made possible through men who were anti-Bolshevik, but were in the Bolshevik government; and if you will allow me to go off on a tangent—it has come to my mind while I am speaking at random—some of these men have told me, "We are staying in office in the hopes that one of these days Bolshevism will weaken and we shall be able to play the Trojan horse trick. They still had the hope that something like that would happen—either the allies would come in and do something or something else would happen—and then they would be there. As a matter of fact, one of the greatest men of Russia, with whom I have had a good deal to do—he was formerly an editor of the journal that was considered semiofficial—told me shortly before I left, "Strange to say, I have been trying to get to Kiev all these weeks, and I have had to go through more red tape than under the old régime, and in their so-called department for investigating the character of the applicant, I found the same officials seated at the desks as under the old régime. I recognized them and they recognized me and they smiled."

Now, they were not Bolsheviks at all. I knew it. I had occasion to get a certain permission prior to leaving Russia, and it was after the regular hours and I rushed into that one ministry and, lo and behold, I found one of the most active of the anti-Bolsheviks holding a prominent position there, and he said, "Why, I will get that through for you," and he did. He said, "You know I am not Bolshevik. I have been trying all these months to get out of Russia." So there are hundreds of them.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the character of the money they issue there?

Mr. SIMONS. They have now been issuing largely small currency, which is stamps. That [indicating] is a 1-kopec stamp. On the other side it says, "To be used on a par with metal money." Then they have what they call "kerenki," little bits of paper about an inch and a half or 2 inches square, without any registration number, simply "20," and then a little statement to the effect that it is to be honored as legal tender, and then the other denomination is "40"—stamped 20 rubles and 40 rubles kerenki. It became almost valueless and the people would not accept them any more.

Perhaps, Senator Overman, the committee would like to know what happened to us as we tried to get over the border, with regard to our money. The ruling of the Bolshevik government was that no one leaving Russia, even though he were a foreigner, had a right to take more than 1,000 rubles with him. The old money had largely disappeared, but still could be bought at a premium of 10 rubles on a hundred. So a couple of weeks before we left 1,000 rubles of the old money would cost 1,100 rubles.

Senator KING. That is the other way, is it not?

Mr. SIMONS. No; wait a second; it was 20 rubles on a hundred. So I bought 1,000 rubles of old Russian money, Catherine bills, those famous old bills with Catherine's portrait invisible—you would have to hold it up to the light and then you could see it; they are very rare now, but by paying a premium of 20 rubles you could get them—I bought 1,000 rubles' worth and paid 1,200 rubles in kerenki. Also for my sister I tried to get the same amount. When we reached the Russian-Finnish border, we were held up by a Bolshevik official, who took out his own pocketbook, opened it, and began to count out in kerenki 2,000 rubles. They made a very thorough search of my sister and myself, such as had never been made under the provisional government, or even under the old régime, and they discovered that we had this amount. They wanted me to sign up on certain blanks, and what not, and when they discovered that we had 2,000 rubles of good old Russian money the officer began to count out the kerenki and said to us, "You can not take out that old money. That is against the law." I said to him, "Is not that regular Russian money?" "Yes, it is; but we can not let you take it out, and here you have 2,000 in kerenki." I looked at him—he was a young man about 20 or 21, and looked like a rogue—and I said, "Young man, I have been told by Zorin, the Commissar of the Post and Telegraph, that if any disagreeable things happened to me on the border, I might telephone or telegraph him and he would straighten things out." He then grew pale, and telephoned to a gentleman higher up, who was on the next floor, and said that he had a difficult case here, and this was an American clergyman who had 2,000 rubles in Russian money, which he said he could not take out, but then this clergyman had said that Zorin was going to come to his assistance if there was any trouble; and quick as a flash he took back his kerenki and he says, "You can have your money."

Senator OVERMAN. How much in our money is this stamp?

Mr. SIMONS. The Russian ruble when last we were there was worth 10 cents. We could get 10 rubles for $1.

Senator NELSON. In normal times how much was it?

Mr. SIMONS. A ruble was about 51 cents, so we roughly speak of a half a cent for a kopeck.

Senator NELSON. There are 100 kopecks in a ruble?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. A ruble is in round numbers a half a dollar?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. It is now worth about 10 cents or less.

Senator OVERMAN. How much is that in our money, that kopeck?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, that would be about one-twentieth of a cent.

Senator KING. The Bolshevik government has issued a large amount of paper money, has it?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; very much.

Senator KING. Going into the billions of rubles?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it a misdemeanor or felony not to take that money? Suppose a man declines to take it?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; they have decrees, I understand, to that effect. The peasants got so disgusted with them that they would not take them any more. But it was no use; they were obliged to, and that of course put up the prices of commodities very much, a pound of butter selling for a hundred rubles.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was there any attempt made by the leaders of this Bolshevik movement to spread in a systematized way these immoral ideas to which you referred this morning?

Mr. SIMONS. It came under my observation that often in an avowed way, quite a self-evident way, immoral forces were being encouraged. I will try to be guarded in my remarks, knowing that there are ladies here.

Senator OVERMAN. Had we not better take that question up later and ask the ladies to retire?

Senator WOLCOTT. The doctor knows what he wants to say and he can say it.

Mr. SIMONS. Let me use a concrete case. I will try to say the thing in a way that will not be offensive to anybody. A few days before I left, the president of our Ladies' Aid Society, a scholarly woman who has been a teacher for more than 25 years in one of the famous imperial institutions, called on me. I will not give you the name of the institute because I would like to reserve that for some other occasion, as I do not want this to get into the press and back to Russia. She said, bursting into sobs, "You know what a fine big building we have. I want you to tell the women of America this," she said with much emotion, as she buried her face in her hands. "I am sorry I lived to witness all this." I said, "This is so distressing to you that you had better not try to tell me. Write it out and send it to me some time." But she said, "No; I must tell you." She said, "On the first floor of our spacious institute, which used to be a palace, you know those large rooms that we have on the first floor. These Bolshevik officials have put hundreds of red soldiers, sailors, and marines of the red army and the red navy and given orders that in the other half of the same floor the girls of our institute should remain, girls who are from 12 to 16 years." This affected her so much that she burst out into tears. "I wish I had died before I witnessed all this. But I want you to tell the women of America."

Senator WOLCOTT. Just a moment. That was not the doing of just an irresponsible crowd of soldiers, or of a soldier mob? That was the arrangement, do I understand you to say, of the Bolshevik officials?

Mr. SIMONS. That came under their administration.

Senator KING. Of course, that meant that these poor girls were left to the brutal lust of the red guards?

Mr. SIMONS. You can draw your own conclusions.

Senator KING. Was there any doubt about that, that it was the purpose of it?

Mr. SIMONS. I have seen so much of it that I would have to say yes to what you ask.

Senator KING. Is there any doubt of it?

Mr. SIMONS. No doubt in my mind. I am a little distressed here because of the presence of ladies.

Senator KING. You are stating it in a proper way. There is nothing improper in stating that you have observed brutality and bestiality.

Mr. SIMONS. They are the dirtiest dogs I have ever come across in my 45 years. They are so nasty that I can not find words to express my feelings. Some people have asked me if I was not exaggerating, and I tell them no, to go over there and see with their own eyes. Some of our own people are there as witnesses.

Well, she then went on and said, "But that is not all. The other day the assistant of Lunacharsky, who was the Commissar of the People's Enlightenment, happened to be with a group of our girls from our institute in a movie on the Nevski Prospect, and he turned around to those little girls of 12 and 15 and 16 years and said, 'Little girls, where are your bridegrooms?' And they flushed and said, 'We have no bridegrooms.' 'Why don't you go on the Nevski Prospect and do as the prostitutes are doing and get yourself one?'"

Excuse me for repeating these words.

Senator KING. As far as I am concerned, I think that individual acts would be material only as they reflect the conduct of the whole organization. I would not want to blame the Bolsheviks for the misdeeds of any individuals. If they are the acts of the individuals it would not be right to blame the Bolsheviks for that, but if those acts are the acts of the entire organization, or supported by the organization, that would be relevant. Do you get the distinction?

Mr. SIMONS. All right. I can only give you concrete examples. The tenor of the whole régime, of course, has been quite immoral. There is no getting away from that.

Senator KING. Well, to be frank, do the Bolshevik guards and the Bolsheviks, the males, rape and ravish and despoil women at will?

Mr. SIMONS. They certainly do. We happen to know that the Lett regiment which Trotsky has been courting assiduously for months refused to go to the front, and remained near the Tsarskoe Selo Vogzal, or railroad station, and were there living on the fat of the land, and the sanitar for that regiment—I will not mention his name as he was a personal friend of mine and I must not get him into trouble—reported these things to me, and he said that when there was a scarcity of bread in town—many of us had not had bread for weeks—they were having 2 pounds a day, three days before Trotsky came, and they were told, "You will also have pancakes, 2 pounds of bread a day, and extra flour; and then when Trotsky comes there is going to be an extra celebration," and they did have it. And then he said "Everything in Petrograd belongs to you." I hate to say it, but their boast was that they could have all the women they wanted, and they could break into the houses with impunity.

Senator KING. Did they pay the soldiers large sums of money to keep them in the army?

Mr. SIMONS. The reds were being given an extra wage. I understand, and were shown extra favors.

Senator KING. Senator Wolcott asked you about their propaganda. Do you know what efforts they made to extend their propaganda into other countries?

Mr. SIMONS. The statement was made again and again and vouched for by people of high standing in Russia and over in the Scandinavian countries, to the effect that down in Leipzig they were printing Russian money for the Bolshevik government. I have not been able to get any substantiation for that. But I got this from a man who was in the military mission of one of the allies, and he said that 10,000,000 rubles had been printed in Leipzig by order of the Bolshevik government, for propaganda purposes.

Senator KING. Do you know of people who were in Russia going into other countries and engaging in Bolshevik propaganda? For instance, John Reed; do you know of his having been there?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator KING. Do you know whether he came to the United States and engaged in Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not investigated that.

Senator KING. Did he come to the United States?

Mr. SIMONS. He came to the United States; yes.

Senator KING. Do you know a woman who calls herself Miss Bryant? She was his wife?

Mr. SIMONS. I know of her.

Senator KING. Was she in Russia, and did she and Mr. Reed associate with the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SIMONS. They were reported to be very close to them, and were spending a great deal of time in the Smolny Institute.

Senator KING. Did you know that?

Mr. SIMONS. That was generally known in Petrograd.

Senator KING. How long did you know of their being there?

Mr. SIMONS. I could not answer that off-hand, because I did not have any particular interest in following them up, and did not know that they would figure in this thing.

Senator KING. Is she the woman who spoke in Poli's Theater under the name of Miss Bryant?

Mr. SIMONS. I understand she is the same woman.

Senator KING. Do you know whether Mr. Reed is still in this country?

Mr. SIMONS. I understand so.

Senator KING. Major, he is under indictment, is he not?

Maj. HUMES. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. He was there connected with the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SIMONS. He was persona grata with the Bolshevik government to the extent that they wanted to make him their representative here in New York.

Senator KING. By the genuine Americans who were there, was he regarded as an American or as a Bolshevik?

Mr. SIMONS. As a Bolshevik. We had a number of those Bolshevik sympathizers there, and we thought of them as—let me use the proper expression—mush-headed and muddle-headed.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of anybody being sent to this country by the Bolsheviks for propaganda purposes?

Mr. SIMONS. I have no direct proof.

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, do you know whether or not any of these Americans were exercising the rights of Russian citizenship and are exercising the rights of Russian citizenship under the constitution of Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. I can not speak as an official investigator, but it has been brought to my attention that some of those men who were over there had Russian passports and also American passports.

Maj. HUMES. I call your attention to a section of the constitution—

Senator KING. You mean the Bolshevik constitution?

Maj. HUMES. The Bolshevik constitution. [Reading:]

Basing its actions upon the idea of solidarity of the toilers of all nations, the R. S. F. S. R. grants all political rights of Russian citizenship to foreigners, who live upon the territory of the Russian Republic, are engaged in productive occupations and who belong either to the working class or to the peasant class that do not exploit the labor of others.

Is that the provision of the constitution that makes it possible for American citizens to go over there and participate in the Russian Government as Russian citizens and exercise all the rights of citizenship?

Mr. SIMONS. I should say so, without being unfair to any of my compatriots. One case was brought to my attention within the last six months, when an American was seriously thinking of becoming a citizen of the so-called Bolshevik Russia. I do not want to mention his name, though.

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not know it as a matter of fact? Of course, if you know as a matter of fact you would be glad to tell his name, I suppose.

Mr. SIMONS. If it is desired, I could tell you in executive session who he was.

Senator WOLCOTT. If I knew that there was such a man who was desiring to acquire citizenship with that outfit, I should be glad to tell it. If you are only informed of it, that is another matter.

Mr. SIMONS. I will tell you in executive session who it was.

Senator KING. Then, if we determine it is proper for the record, it will go in.

Mr. SIMONS. I have pretty good proof that there was some connection.

Maj. HUMES. Is there any formality required in order to acquire Russian citizenship? The constitution automatically, apparently, forces it on residents in Russia.

Mr. SIMONS. I have not seen the operation of that, at all, and do not know the modus operandi in actual operation.

Senator KING. You knew Mr. Albert Rhys Williams there, who spoke with Mrs. John Reed?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator KING. Do you know whether he was participating in any meetings with the Bolsheviki?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, he was; he was taking part in their meetings there. He was reported first in the papers as having taken part.

Senator KING. Was he making speeches in favor of Bolshevism, in their meetings, or combating their views?

Mr. SIMONS. Certainly not combating. He was heart and soul with them. I met him a number of times in our embassy and also in our consulate. When I happened to express myself in a very strong way against the Bolsheviki, he was on the other side.

Senator KING. Defending them?

Mr. SIMONS. Speaking in very tender terms of them.

Senator KING. Do you know how long he associated with them there?

Mr. SIMONS. I think he was associated with them almost from the incipency of that movement.

Senator KING. Did he pretend to be a Red Cross representative?

Mr. SIMONS. No; he was a journalist. But there was another Williams who represented the Christian Herald. I should not like to have him taken for this one. He spoke in our church once. He is a fine Christian gentleman, 100 per cent American. I hope no one will confuse the two.

Senator KING. Did Mr. Albert Rhys Williams tell you that when he left there he was coming back to the United States, or did you learn from him in any way that he was to return to the United States?

Mr. SIMONS. The last time I met him was in the embassy, and things were then topsy turvy. My recollection is that he was going back to the front to investigate things. That is as I recall.

Senator KING. Do you know when he left?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not.

Senator KING. Do you know about his landing in San Francisco?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not.

Senator KING. Do you know the character of literature that he brought with him?

Mr. SIMONS. I understood that he brought some literature over which was partly in Russian, partly in English, and it was Bolshevik literature, supporting the soviet government.

Senator OVERMAN. Did Raymond Robins participate in any of these Bolshevik meetings?

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know. He is spoken of very highly by the Bolshevik leaders.

Senator WOLCOTT. They liked him, did they?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, judging from some of the things said concerning him, he was reputed to be the best American of all.

Senator KING. Give the names of some other Americans over there that you know of who affiliated with the Bolsheviki.

Mr. SIMONS. I do not know whether it would be fair to answer the question offhand, because of that expression "affiliated."

Senator KING. I will withdraw that question. I would not want to do any injustice to anybody. Do you know of any Americans over there now, or those that may not be Americans but who are now in here apologizing for or speaking for or carrying on any propaganda for the Bolsheviki?

Mr. SIMONS. I reserve my answer to that for executive session, for I should not like to be quoted as having——

Senator OVERMAN. We have had some trouble about giving names. Perhaps we had better reserve it for an executive session.

Senator KING. I want to say that, as far as I am concerned, these hearings shall be absolutely public, and whatever you tell us, I would feel that it ought to be made public after you have verified it, because everybody ought to know just what this committee does. But I am speaking for myself. I withdraw the question now.

Maj. HUMES. With reference to the treaty between the Bolshevik government and the German Government, was that treaty ever published in full in the Bolshevik papers, so that the people of Russia could know all of the facts in connection with that treaty?

Mr. SIMONS. The statement was made again and again by well-informed people in Russia that the treaty had not been fully published, and that the Russian translation which came out was a very poor piece of work. And then it was said that another translation would be made. But even then it was an open question whether or no the full treaty had been made public. It always came out that Lenine and Trotzky had kept certain things secret. What those things were we never learned.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know the capacity in which Albert Rhys Williams came to this country from the Bolshevik government? What is his capacity to-day in this country?

Mr. SIMONS. I could not add any word from personal information, but from what I have found in the press and what I have heard from certain people who claim to know—I have been investigating this thing—he is a self-confessed representative of Lenine and Trotsky in this country.

Maj. HUMES. And came over to organize a representative information bureau in this country, did he not, in behalf of the Bolshevik government?

Mr. SIMONS. I understood that he had work of that nature to do.

Senator OVERMAN. Is that the man who spoke here?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Senator Nelson asked you a few moments ago with reference to the form of government, in regard to the representation. Is the representation in their soviets and their several bodies proportioned uniformly over the country, or do they discriminate in different districts?

Senator NELSON. He has not answered my question, yet.

Maj. HUMES. No; I realize that, Senator.

Mr. SIMONS. Why, it came out again and again that they were putting in dummy delegates and controlling certain places by sending down their own Bolshevik agitators, and what not, and thus suppressing an anti-Bolshevik movement, which seemed quite imminent in certain parts of the so-called Bolshevik country. We happen to know that there were villages in and around Petrograd and Moscow—I have talked with a lot of people who had instant information on this—where the people were anti-Bolshevik, but that the Bolshevik authorities had a way of manipulating things so that everything would look, at least on paper, as if the Bolsheviks were ruling everything in sight. But, as a matter of fact, there were scores of villages which would not even let a Bolshevik official come into the precincts of the village. They had machine guns on either end of the main road which would go through the village. Now, I have spoken with people who came from the villages. We had churches in some. They said that they had guards watching day and night, and the moment a Bolshevik hove in sight they would kill him. And they had a regular system by which they were keeping the Bolsheviks away.

Senator KING. As a matter of fact, up to the present moment the Bolshevik government is merely a military dictatorship under the rule of Lenin and Trotsky?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. And they are using their dictatorship to put the proletariat in harmony with the communist manifesto in order to please the hoi polloi.

Maj. HUMES. The point that I was raising is, is it not a fact that the representation in the old Russian soviet was based on 1 to each 125,000 people in the cities, while the representation is 1 to 25,000 people in the provincial districts and the less thickly populated districts?

Mr. SIMONS. I have not gone into that.

Senator NELSON. Well, the Russian farmers are settled in villages, mostly?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; as a rule.

Senator NELSON. And their village communities, or mirs, as I believe they call them.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they own the land, do they not; the mir owns the land?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; and it is parceled out.

Senator NELSON. Parceled out for use from time to time?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Now, each of those mirs is supposed to have its own soviet system of government, to elect a local soviet council, is it not?

Mr. SIMONS. That is the scheme.

Senator NELSON. That is part of the scheme. And the same thing takes place in cities or wards or sections of cities, in proportion to population? They have also local soviets?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And these local soviets send representatives to the general soviet assembly.

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that constitutes the soviet government?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. A good share of the farmers or the peasants, we might call them, are not in this soviet government; that is, I mean, the Bolshevik soviet government?

Mr. SIMONS. I can not tell you what percentage of the villages are not taking part in that Bolshevik government, in the Bolshevik territory. But it is generally stated by people who know something about the Russian situation, and nearly all of us Americans who came out about the same time are a unit in saying, that fully 90 per cent of the peasants are anti-Bolshevik. From that you would conclude that they would not take part in the Bolshevik government. And another statement made—I think I made it this morning—is that at least two-thirds of the workmen are anti-Bolshevik.

Senator NELSON. Now, have not the anti-Bolshevik forces—and in that I include the Czecho-Slovaks, the sound Russians, and the English, and French, and the Japanese—have they not practical control of the Siberian railroad as far west as Perm—west to Omsk?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, I am not qualified to tell you how things stand there to-day. I am not omniscient. But from what I have learned all these months, I judge that they do hold control there.

Senator NELSON. Have you visited the southern part of Russia, the Ukrainian country?

Mr. SIMONS. Not recently. It was almost impossible to get down there without having influence with the leaders of the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON. Did they have control of things in the Ukraine?

Mr. SIMONS. You had to get special permission to go down there. There were distinguished people who sat there for months and months waiting for permission.

Senator NELSON. Is not that the heart of the Russian population along the valleys of the Dneiper and the Don, and their tributaries; is not the heart of the Russian population confined to those regions—and the Volga—take the western rivers, the Dneiper, and then Kiev, the capital of Ukrainia, which is situated on the Dneiper?

Mr. SIMONS. I think it might be roughly stated so, yes. Some of them claim that the heart of the Russian nation is found in the Russian church; that is where the soul is.

Senator NELSON. The spiritual heart. But I mean the rural heart. Is not that in the Black Belt?

Mr. SIMONS. I should hate to make a sweeping assertion, because in normal times we have in Moscow 1,000,000 people, and in Petrograd 2,000,000, and there, of course, you find hundreds of thousands of real Russians who represent, if you please, in a very real way the heart of Russia, and most of them at some time or another came from a village.

Senator NELSON. You have never carried on your operations in southern Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. No.

Senator NELSON. In Kiev or Odessa?

Mr. SIMONS. No. I have been down among the Molokanes, or milk drinkers; I have been familiar with that section of the country. You could hardly call that the heart of Russia, although they are patriotic Russians. There are hundreds of thousands of Stundists, or Molokanes, and tens of thousands of so-called German colonists, but I would not like to speak of the heart of Russia as being confined to any particular territory.

Senator NELSON. But Little Russia was the center of the Slav race at one time, was it not?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They started from there, and that is the center of it. The capital was Kiev, was it not?

Mr. SIMONS. That is the old historic capital.

Senator NELSON. Have you ever been at Nijni Novgorod?

Mr. SIMONS. I have never been there.

Senator NELSON. That is not a great ways from Moscow, on the upper Volga.

Mr. SIMONS. I had to put off many of these things because of extra duties connected with our church during the great war. For almost six years I even have not been in America, and our bishop has not been over since the summer of 1913, so, of course, all those duties devolved upon me and I could not very well travel around.

Senator NELSON. Then you are not able to say how all of that big southern part of Russia stands on this Bolshevik government?

Mr. SIMONS. Except from certain reports. I happened to have some of my men down there and they wrote up and told me, and I might tell what came up from that section; but there have been such kaleidoscopic changes taking place that what would hold true of September and October would not hold true of November and December, and might not hold true now.

Senator NELSON. That is true.

Mr. SIMONS. But I think it is safe to say that the Bolshevik area does not take in more than one-fourth of the real Russia. I think it is safe to say that.

Senator NELSON. Does it take in anything of Russian Poland?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; I think it does; I think it takes all of that section there. I have not a map here, so of course, I can not go into details.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether or not they are going on with their propaganda in England and Germany and France?

Mr. SIMONS. I have heard from men who are investigating that, with whom I have had long conferences in Stockholm and Christiania, that very active propaganda is being carried on in England.

Senator NELSON. Did you meet Mr. Leonard over there? He was connected with the consular service?

Mr. SIMONS. He was in Russia as one of the several secretaries of the Y. M. C. A., under Dr. Mott's supervision, and when the Bolshevik revolution came on, he and another Y. M. C. A. man by the name of Berry, I think, both went into the consular service. They were later arrested, and the reports we got were to the effect that they were imprisoned for almost three months, and recently they have been released and have returned to America.

Maj. HUMES. Senator, for your information—you were asking about the propaganda—here is a translation of one of the orders of the Bolshevik government on the question of propaganda. This is the official order published December 13, 1917 [reading]:

Order for the appropriation of 2,000,000 rubles for the requirements of the revolutionary internationalist movement.

Whereas the soviet authority stands on the ground of the principles of the international solidarity of the proletariat and the brotherhood of the workers of all countries, and whereas the struggle against the war and imperialism can lead to complete victory only if conducted on an international scale,

The Council of Peoples Commissaries consider it absolutely necessary to take every possible means including expenditure of money, for the assistance of the left internationalist wing of the workingman movement of all countries whether these countries are at war or in alliance with Russia or are maintaining a neutral position.

To this end the Council of the Peoples Commissaries orders the appropriation for the requirements of the revolutionary internationalist movement to be put at the disposal of the foreign representatives of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, ten million rubles.

(Signed)

LENINE.
TROTSKY.

Senator OVERMAN. It would seem from that order that they were using propaganda for the entire world.

Senator NELSON. Did you say you have any other lists besides the one that you have there?

Mr. SIMONS. No; not with me.

Senator NELSON. Could you supply that other list?

Mr. SIMONS. I will look over my papers and see if I can find it.

Senator NELSON. And you can send it in to the chairman, if you can find it.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know if any official of the Government of this country is Bolshevik? Or would you rather not answer as to that except in executive session?

Mr. SIMONS. I have no proof. I think in executive session I might give you some information which would be helpful, at least in a way. If you could find out whether any men are out and out against the red flag, and if they are not, why you can form your own conclusions.

Senator NELSON. You mean out and out for the red flag?

Mr. SIMONS. I put it in the negative way. You can find out if they are really against the red flag, and if they are not, I have nothing more to say.

Senator OVERMAN. Are there any I. W. W.'s in Russia?

Mr. SIMONS. I understand that quite a number of those men who came over to Petrograd soon after Trotsky arrived had been identified with the I. W. W. here in America, and it is remarkable that a good deal of the literature which I have seen among the Bolsheviks in Russia is like the I. W. W. literature that I find here in English, and their tactics are pretty much the same. Take, for instance, the I. W. W. song, To Fan the Flames of Discontent, and so on. Take this red-flag hymn—possibly you are familiar with it—also The Internationale, as they call it; have practically all of that in Russian, too. And I find that there is quite a similarity between the Bolshevik movement and the I. W. W.

Senator OVERMAN. How many verses are there in that red-flag song?

Mr. SIMONS. The Red Flag? Shall I read it?

Senator OVERMAN. I wish you would.

Mr. SIMONS. It is sung to the tune of Maryland, My Maryland, arranged by Finstenberg. The words are by James Connell. [Reading:]

THE RED FLAG.

By JAMES CONNELL.

The workers' flag is deepest red.
 It shrouded oft our martyred dead;
 And ere their limbs grew stiff and cold
 Their life-blood dyed its every fold.

CHORUS.

Then raise the scarlet standard high;
 Beneath its folds we'll live and die,
 Though cowards flinch and traitors sneer,
 We'll keep the red flag flying here.

Look 'round, the Frenchman loves its blaze,
 The sturdy German chants its praise;
 In Moscow's vaults its hymns are sung,
 Chicago swells its surging song.

It waved above our infant might
 When all ahead seemed dark as night;
 It witnessed many a deed and vow,
 We will not change its color now.

It suits to-day the meek and base,
 Whose minds are fixed on pelf and place;
 To cringe beneath the rich man's frown,
 And haul that sacred emblem down.

With heads uncovered, swear we all,
 To bear it onward till we fall;
 Come dungeons dark, or gallows grim,
 This song shall be our parting hymn!

Maj. HUMES. Doctor, have you any information as to any attempt or attempts being made in this country to form so-called soviets?

Senator NELSON. You mean in this country?

Maj. HUMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMONS. Only as I have found articles in the newspapers, and have gotten hold of some of their literature. You will find quite a lot of literature published under the auspices of the Rand School of Social Science in New York and kindred organizations, in English and Russian both. The Communist Manifesto, which is the official program of the Bolsheviks, is being sold in Russian and English both. They have a little article here on the Old Red Flag, which goes to prove that the flag of the early Christians was a red flag, and what not, and then they have a Russian scene back here, pretty much the same kind of a scene that they have been sending over in Russia among the Bolsheviks, and this, I understand, is being used for propagandist purposes among the tens of thousands of Russian workmen in America. Then they have some pamphlets by Lenine and Trotzky in Russian.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are published, you say, by this Rand School of Social Science, put out by them?

Mr. SIMONS. They are sold there and some are published there. Others are published by the Socialist Literature Co., 15 Spruce Street, New York, and by a Russian newspaper in New York.

Maj. HUMES. That is the paper that Trotsky was formerly connected with in this country?

Mr. SIMONS. I think so.

Senator KING. And he is a Bolshevist now?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; and a good deal of this literature is gotten out by Charles H. Kerr & Co., of Chicago.

Senator KING. Have you made any investigation to find out who is paying for them?

Senator NELSON. We have just had that. They have appropriated 2,000,000 rubles for this international propaganda. He just read here, while you were out of the room, that they had appropriated 2,000,000 rubles for international propaganda.

Senator OVERMAN. They must have some agent who is getting out those pamphlets here, who represents that Government.

Mr. SIMONS. They were printing, at the time of the early period of the Bolshevik régime, pamphlets on Bolshevism and the Soviet Government by Lenine and Trotsky, in English, in Petrograd. That was in the winter of 1918. I have seen copies of that.

Senator NELSON. I had a copy of it myself, sent to me almost a year ago, I think.

Mr. SIMONS. And I understand from what they told me—I do not know how true it is—that John Reed and Albert Williams helped to put these things into proper English.

Senator KING. Is Albert Williams this man you have already spoken of?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes. I can not vouch for that. I only have heard that.

Maj. HUMES. This morning you testified with reference to the terrorism as against the so-called bourgeois. Does not that terrorism apply to the peasant and working classes as well as to the bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. In some instance; yes. Instances have been brought to our attention where there were groups of workmen who were anti-Bolshevik, and who were hoping to create a movement to overthrow the Bolshevik régime. They were promptly arrested, and what their punishment was we do not know, but there were at least two factions which figured in this thing again and again in Petrograd, even last summer, and it was hoped by certain people in Petrograd that they would succeed, and that other groups of workmen would join them; and then came, as the result of that, very drastic measures on the part of the Bolshevik leaders, and cases were brought to our attention where often in homes of peasants that could be reached, and homes of workmen, they had to pay dearly.

Senator KING. You mean in suffering?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes.

Senator KING. You do not mean in money?

Mr. SIMONS. They had to pay dearly in suffering, in being arrested, and so on.

Senator KING. Were some of them killed?

Mr. SIMONS. There have been instances on record where certain workmen and members of their families have been killed, but when these things were investigated, often we heard this kind of excuse given, "That man was guilty of disloyalty to his party, and that is why he was treated the way he was."

Maj. HUMES. In other words, they believed in the execution of so-called political offenders?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; they decidedly did.

Senator OVERMAN. Are there any courts left, there, to administer any laws?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; they had courts. I appeared before the court a number of times, when we could not get the workmen to shovel our snow away. We had the heaviest fall of snow, some of the old residents of Petrograd said, that had ever been on record, so the officials in the local commissariat came around and said that if we did not have the snow shoveled away—we had a very big property there, and being on the corner, of course, we had twice as much as any other property would have on the block to shovel away—that if we did not have that snow shoveled away by a certain time on the following day, we would be fined, let us say, 500 rubles, and before they had their proclamation out and what not, I was cited to court.

The court was made up of a very silly looking workman and an insipid looking Red Guard, and the other man was as shy as a maiden of 16 who had just been kissed. I was brought before them, and they hardly knew how to ask any questions, but they at once said to me, "We do not want to hear your testimony. You are a bourgeois. We want to hear what your dvornik says. So our dvornik had to tell the story, and the sum and substance of the testimony was that we had not been doing anything wrong, but the authorities had not been taking care of a certain gas light which, according to the Russian system, had to be pumped out every day or water accumulated, and they had not taken the proper care of it, so there got to be quite a lot of ice around there, and they were going to hold me guilty for that, but the testimony we brought in showed they had not been doing their work properly, and then they felt shamefaced; but they ordered him into another room to see whether he would not give some testimony against that capitalist, but he stood his ground firmly, and came out and afterwards told me how they had subjected him to all kinds of questions, trying to get him to say something which would be unfair to me. He had received only kindness at my hands, and so, being a pretty fair sort of individual, he spoke the truth and nothing but the truth. Then, when he came out they again sat in session and told me that they would give me another chance to clean that snow away.

Senator NELSON. That was a soviet court.

Mr. SIMONS. A soviet court. I have been in other courts under the old régime, and they were very fine, scholarly men.

Senator KING. You stick to the facts, Doctor.

Maj. HUMES. Is it not the practice of these courts not to receive the testimony of the so-called bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. They are very much discriminated against. I have heard that from a good many sources.

Maj. HUMES. Even in court their testimony is not received as the testimony of others?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; that is quite true. I have talked with a number of men of our own American colony who have been brought to court, and one happened to have a diamond ring, and that led to his being fined, as I remember, 10,000 rubles. If he had not had that ring, he says the chances are they would not have fined him. Pardon me, Senator, I do not like to go into all these details, but you are putting questions to me that bring up all kinds of things, and perhaps the things I cite may add a little light.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very glad to have you tell it in your own way, and you have thrown a great deal of light on the subject, Doctor, and we are very much obliged to you.

Mr. SIMONS. I have not been able to get away from one thing, that there is being fanned constantly an antibourgeois feeling. You feel it as you go along the street. The saddest thing I have to relate is this. My sister was a rheumatic for almost four years. Soon after the Bolsheviki came into power she was trying to get from our place down to the next line, where there was a car line that would bring her to a certain part of the city, and the snow was about that deep [indicating] and she slipped and fell, and there were Russian girls from the factory who came by and looked at her and used abusive language, and called her a bourgeois, and what not, and said, "Let her lie there," and what not, and my sister burst out into tears. She struggled again and again to get onto her feet. She said, as she came home, that she had always felt that the Russian women were very sympathetic, but they were now so cruel, simply because she was dressed like a lady, and she struggled there for at least 10 minutes before she got out of that position. She came back and said it just distressed her so that they let her suffer. That is their temper, and in their press and in their proclamation it is the same old diabolical thing, class war, not only for Russia, but for the whole world, and be just as mean as you can to your fellow man, especially if he is dressed like a gentleman or lady. Now, if anybody has different testimony on those people, I submit they have not seen them in actual operation.

Senator KING. Would you say that that feeling permeated the peasants generally to any extent?

Mr. SIMONS. The average peasant is one of the most lovable men you can meet anywhere in the world. I want to tell you that I have not found a better type of man or woman than in the Russian villages, and even among the workmen, of whom I knew thousands, and I always felt pretty safe with them until these Bolsheviki came in power.

Senator KING. Have they been able to eradicate that feeling of, I might call it unsophistication, and in a religious way mysticism, that predominates so much in the peasant's mind or life?

Mr. SIMONS. Well, they appealed, if you please, to the lower passions and instincts, and they made promises to those people such as these. They would say, "Now, all the land is to be yours." For instance, there was timber on the estates of some of the titled people that we knew in the villages or near the villages outside of Petrograd, and they would say, "You can help yourself. You do not have to pay for it. You can have anything and everything you want. It is all yours now; it belongs to the people." That appealed to many of these people; but then afterwards they came out with this kind of testimony, as did hundreds of workmen who were left in charge of the factories without raw material or any money, and with the machinery broken, "We own everything, but we can not use it. We are worse off now than we were under the old system."

Senator KING. To what extent did the peasants commit atrocities upon the landowners in their immediate vicinities, and deprive owners of their homes and property?

Mr. SIMONS. There have been ever so many cases reported, and some of them by people of my own acquaintance, who have had large estates, and after they had told me all these things, of the depredations committed by these infuriated peasants who had been indoctrinated by Bolshevism, they said, "We know those peasants are going to become sober minded against Socialism, because two or three have come back and said, 'We repent of all we have done. What can we do to show you that we still love you?'"

Senator KING. To what extent have the prelates and ecclesiastics influenced or lost influence over the peasants?

Mr. SIMONS. I am sorry to say that the average Russian priest never had the respect or even the affection of the people at large. There was a sort of feeling against them. I hope I am not saying anything that will be used by people who are against the Russian church. I am very friendly toward that institution. Her dignitaries have sent greetings to us and our bishops, and we have sustained ideal fraternal relations with that church. As you know, there is a movement on foot to bring about some kind of a union between the Russian orthodox church and the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, and while I preface my remarks with all that, yet the fact is this, that the priests of the Russian Orthodox church on the whole have not been respected, and in many cases have been maligned and abused, and especially since the Bolsheviki have come into power. They have found that they could take this prejudice on the part of the Russian people and use it as a weapon against the Russian orthodox church, which was suspected of being monarchistic, and that has come out again and again in the Bolshevik attacks on the church. They look upon the church as a reactionary institution.

Senator KING. That is, the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SIMONS. The Bolsheviks; yes.

Senator KING. Has there been a confiscation of church property and buildings?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes, sir; and in quite a number of instances monasteries, with their wealth, have been taken, and all kinds of indecent things have been done by certain Bolshevik officials.

I have some data showing that they have turned certain churches and monasteries into dancing halls, and one instance has been reported to me where a certain Bolshevik official went into a church while the people were there waiting for the sacrament, and threw the priest out, so I am told, and himself put on the clerical garb, and then went on the altar and made a comedy of the ritual, which stirred up the religious sense of the people to that extent that they threatened—of course, among themselves—that they would yet kill that man. He happened to be an apostate Jew. Other horrible things have been done. I do not charge all those things to the Bolshevik government, but they were happening under their auspices, as it seems. I have seen priests march down the street in front of our house with a little bag hanging over their shoulders, for no other reason than that they were suspected of being anti-Bolshevik and reactionary. There are records over there showing that certain innocent priests were killed without a trial, and some of them killed in Kronstadt. All those facts can be gotten through the Norwegian Legation.

Senator KING. What became of those that you saw march by your place? Were they imprisoned?

Mr. SIMONS. What is that?

Senator KING. I understood you to say you had seen priests march by your place?

Mr. SIMONS. Yes; I have seen them again and again marched down the prospect, and put on a barge of some kind and taken down to Kronstadt and kept there. One gentleman of the Norwegian Legation, told me several times that he had proof showing that some of these men had been killed, as well as quite a number of officers. He himself one Sunday afternoon was a witness. This was after an awful storm, one of the worst storms we ever had over there. It was Sunday afternoon. On the shore of the gulf, just opposite Kronstadt, bodies had been washed ashore. There were, as I recall his statement, either two or three Russian officers tied together. He was of the opinion that it was at that time when they threw many of them—that is, as the report came out, hundreds of them—overboard. I do not know whether it was true or not, but I thought it was. These men had been washed ashore. They were Russian officers, two or three of them tied together.

Senator KING. In the press that was recognized by them—the Bolshevik official press—were there accounts of homicides based upon the ground that the killing was justified because those who were killed were anti-Bolsheviki?

Mr. SIMONS. Senator, their press was largely made up of deceits, and threats of what they were going to do not only to the Bourgeois class, but also to the capitalists all over the world, and we did not get hardly any news at all. Now and then there would be telegrams which were supposed to have come from America, stating that all England was on strike, and all America, and that there was not a single railroad in the United States that was running, and things of that kind, and everything was looking very bright for Bolshevism abroad. That was the tenor of their press. Things that were actually taking place would rarely be reported, as you and I would expect.

Senator KING. In your contact with the Bolshevik leaders there did they conceal their purpose to use force to destroy the classes there that were above the proletariat; that is, the bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. Did they conceal it?

Senator KING. Did they conceal their purpose to destroy, by force and by starvation or otherwise, the bourgeois?

Mr. SIMONS. They never concealed it; no. They came right out with it boldly; and if you will take the Communist Manifesto you will find that in about the last paragraph is where they have their inspiration. I do not know whether you recall that. The last word is their motto, which appears on all their papers in the left-hand corner of the first page, "Proletarians of all countries and nations unite." And "finally they labor everywhere"—that is, the proletarians or communists: the Bolsheviks call themselves communists also—"finally they labor everywhere for union and agreement of the democratic parties of all countries. The communists disdain to conceal their aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions." By the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions! "Let the ruling classes tremble at a communistic revolution. The proletarians have nothing to lose, but they have a world to win. Proletarians of all nations unite!" Here they use the words "working men," but it is "proletarians" in the original.

Senator KING. Have you discovered a number of Russians over here in this country who were engaged in Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. SIMONS. I know of them.

Senator KING. On the East Side, are most of the Russians there Jews?

Mr. SIMONS. I understand that most of the so-called Russians on the East Side are divided into two camps, the Russian Jew camp and the so-called real Russian camp, which takes in people who are Slovak, who still adhere to the Russian orthodox religion.

Senator OVERMAN. Doctor, you spoke of meeting these apostate Jews in Petrograd. In talking to them, did they tell you what they were doing in Russia and what their purpose was in going there? You say they came and spoke to you because they knew you.

Mr. SIMONS. The burden of their conversation with me was simply this, that I should use whatever influence I had with the American Red Cross to have it stand by the soviet. That was the burden of their talk, but I never felt that I had any mission to perform in that capacity.

Senator KING. Did any of them announce the object they had in Russia, what part they were playing in the revolution?

Mr. SIMONS. No, sir; not to me.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there any considerable number of them?

Mr. SIMONS. Who came to see me?

Senator OVERMAN. That you saw there?

Mr. SIMONS. Or whom I met? I imagine that we encountered at least a couple of dozen of them. Some of them were speaking English. I will tell you this, that one of them afterwards came to me and had supper in our home, and he told me among other things, "You know we have had the best training in the world, and that enables us to out-Jesuit the Jesuits." I am not speaking against the Jews, but I am only telling you how some of these fellows felt, that they had the most superior training; and this man went so far as to say, "There is no more superior training that anybody can get in the world than we have been getting."

(At 4.20 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee went into executive session. At 5.45 o'clock p. m., at the close of the executive session, the subcommittee adjourned. to meet to-morrow, February 13, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, and Nelson.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. I have received the following telegram, which I think I will put in the record. [Reading:]

NEW YORK, February 12, 1919.

Senator OVERMAN,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I emphatically protest against the suggestion in the testimony before the propaganda investigating committee that Jews form the life of Bolshevism in Russia. The list of names submitted to your committee contains at least a half dozen people who are violently opposed to Bolshevism and are fighting it tooth and nail. The "Bund," the biggest Jewish socialist party in Russia, is leading the fight on Lenine and Trotsky. It is unjust to indict a whole people by insidious suggestion. By doing so the testimony submitted before your committee is playing into the hands of the Black Hundreds who are only waiting for the downfall of Bolshevism to massacre Jews in Russia. I know whereof I speak for I have recently returned from Russia, where I represented the United Press Associations. Bolshevism is tyranny and despotism and the greatest insanity the modern world has known, but in the name of justice do not blame the Jewish people for it. Blame the centuries of Czarism which kept the Russian people in ignorance and made Bolshevism inevitable.

JOSEPH SHAPLEN,

415 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I want to say, in justice to Dr. Simons's testimony here, that he made no insidious charges against the Jews, but only against the apostate Jews. He tried to emphasize that several times. So that his remarks were favorable to the real Jews rather than against them. Now, Maj. Humes, proceed.

TESTIMONY OF MR. R. B. DENNIS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Where do you reside, Doctor?

Mr. DENNIS. Evanston, Ill.

Maj. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. DENNIS. Teacher in Northwestern University.

Maj. HUMES. Have you recently been in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. I left Russia September 2, last year.

Maj. HUMES. How long had you been there?

Mr. DENNIS. Since November 1.

Maj. HUMES. 1917?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. In what capacity did you go to Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. I went to Russia for the American Y. M. C. A.

Maj. HUMES. How long did you continue in the service of the Y. M. C. A., and what did you then take up?

Mr. DENNIS. I changed from the Y. M. C. A. to the Consular Service on April 1, as I remember the date.

Maj. HUMES. Where did you first go in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. I entered at Vladivostok and went across to Moscow—went south to the Caucasus—to Rostov-on-the-Don and Novo Tcherkask. Then we came back to the Ukraine, to Kharkov, and from there to Moscow and Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Kiev?

Mr. DENNIS. The Germans were there.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you speak the Russian language?

Mr. DENNIS. I can splash about in it now. I can understand it reasonably well, or could when I left there.

I lived for about two and a half months at Rostov, a month in the city of Petrograd, three months in Nijni Novgorod.

Maj. HUMES. If you arrived there in November, 1917, was that before the November revolution?

Mr. DENNIS. That took place while we were on the trans-Siberian. We arrived in Moscow immediately following that.

Maj. HUMES. Will you go on in your own way and tell us the conditions as you found them, and about the conditions as they developed from time to time, the character of the government, the way the government was maintaining itself and perpetuating itself at the different points where you were residing?

Mr. DENNIS. You give me a wide-open question like that and I am liable to talk you to death, because I can make a long answer to that.

Maj. HUMES. That is what we want. We want a detailed answer of just the situation as you found it.

Mr. DENNIS. I had a good chance to see how it worked in the city of Rostov, because in that district Kaladines and Korniloff made their attempt.

Senator NELSON. That is in the Ukraine, is it?

Mr. DENNIS. That is in the Don Cossack basin, a little farther east.

Senator NELSON. Is it on the Don?

Mr. DENNIS. On the Don; 30 miles from the mouth of the Don River where it flows into the Sea of Azov. I was there when Kaladines committed suicide, and I was there when Korniloff made his final defense of that city and it was taken by the Red Guard.

Senator NELSON. You call the Bolshevist government troops the Red Guard?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes: the reds are Bolshevik and the whites are to the contrary. I think the experience there was not much different from elsewhere. They took the town, after a while. Korniloff knew that he was going to be defeated, and made a rear guard defense of the city, and the Red army, officered by Germans, took the city.

Senator NELSON. How big a place is Rostov?

Mr. DENNIS. Three hundred thousand.

Senator NELSON. Go on.

Mr. DENNIS. For four days they cleaned the thing up scientifically.

Senator NELSON. How?

Mr. DENNIS. With armored cars and machine guns and soldiers. At 4 o'clock every afternoon the thing was tuned up and it was best to be inside, because armored cars with "Death to the rich"—that is, death to the "boorzhoovie"—would go around town and stop at a street corner and send a spurt of machine-gun fire up and down the side street and then go on to the next corner and do the same thing. They had a few mortars and cannon, and with them a few buildings were destroyed. In the home of one wealthy man whom I had known very casually they dropped a shell right in the middle of his dining-room table.

Senator NELSON. When they were firing in the streets in that way, at the crossroads, were there people on the streets?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; I saw a number of them killed.

Senator NELSON. So that they did not take any pains to avoid killing people?

Mr. DENNIS. I saw a number of men killed by the machine guns. On the fourth day they started something which I think was rather typical. They said that there were people in the buildings firing at these red soldiers out of the windows, and then it turned loose, and everywhere it was "pop, pop, pop." I was on the fourth floor of a building, where the angle was rather high, and they could only shoot through the upper sash, but you could see those soldiers down in the street taking a pot shot at anyone in the windows of the buildings. I saw two soldiers cash in because while they were in the street, shooting, along came one of these machine guns and stopped at the corner of the street and turned loose.

Senator NELSON. And killed them, too?

Mr. DENNIS. Two of the soldiers of the Red Guard got it, themselves. Every day and every moment, you never knew; it would be "bang, bang" on the door, and in would come four or five soldiers who would search the place, looking primarily for guns, revolvers, etc. We had five Englishmen and Americans and four Englishwomen there, and we had a sign on the outside of the door, "Under the protection of the British Government"; but much good it did! They searched us four times that night up to 12 o'clock. They accused us of shooting out of the windows. Two boys came in, about 16 years old, and they placed revolvers under our noses and asked for immediate results.

Senator NELSON. Have you any idea how many people they killed there at that time?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir; I have not. I do not think anybody knew. There had been a number of young boys—what we would call high-school boys—there, who had joined this volunteer army, and some of them foolishly, instead of getting out of town, went home, thinking they could hide out, and a number of them were caught and killed.

Senator NELSON. Which volunteer army?

Mr. DENNIS. Korniloff's.

Senator NELSON. He was one of the old Russian generals?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir. You heard his name first in connection with Kerensky, in that affair at Petrograd.

Maj. HUMES. When you say this Red Guard was commanded by German officers, do you mean by that only the higher ranking officers, or were the officers generally German?

Mr. DENNIS. German officers did not appear before the public. All the men who appeared before the public in Rostov were Russians of one kind or another. One or two were Letts. The head man was a Lett. The Letts have been in the Russian armies in numbers. But in the hotel in which I lived there were 13 German officers. The son of the proprietor, whom I had gotten to know very well because he had lived in America for a number of years, told me that there were six of those men who could not talk Russian. I used to hear their stein songs, and there was around there a very pleasant German atmosphere. The soldiers knew they were German officers. The beggars in the street spoke German. They spoke to me in German. I had on a semimilitary uniform, and they took me for a German, and spoke to me in German—the first and only time it happened to me.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say they would instigate stories that the civilians had fired from the windows on them?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. That was a purely fictitious story?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know, but I had the feeling that that was told to turn loose this terrorism, because the Red soldiers believed it. Many of them went mad.

Senator NELSON. What were these soldiers composed of, Letts and Russians?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; all kinds.

Senator NELSON. All kinds?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. It was a conglomeration of every discontented sort of man in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. It was very interesting in Rostov. I have a feeling that in Russia this propaganda to take the industries and the land met with the approval of the poor people who were in bad shape due to the economic conditions of Russia. That was at the beginning. But within two weeks public sentiment in Rostov had quite changed. With the coming of the Red Guard the wealthy people left their homes in large numbers, put on their oldest clothes and sought refuge with people of less importance and with less pretentious homes. I knew a number who did that, and very wisely, I think. Within two weeks the feelings of the proletariat had changed, because they had been promised cheap bread, but the price of bread went up, and discontent and talk began to grow. That discontent has grown constantly all over Russia since that.

Senator NELSON. You were in Rostov in November, 1917?

Mr. DENNIS. I stayed there until February.

Senator NELSON. Did conditions change while you were there?

Mr. DENNIS. No. After I left there. I have only the letters which I received from people living in the city, describing the situation, and that is my only evidence as to what has happened in Rostov since I left there. These letters state that some 600 sailors took the town and looted it for a week, held it for a week, and finally the Bolsheviks overthrew them, and then the Germans took control of the town. I left there a month or two before the Germans took control of the town.

Senator NELSON. Are they in control now?

Mr. DENNIS. When I left Russia they were in control. What they have done since the armistice I do not know.

While this could not happen every day, it was rather typical of conditions in Russia. I left Rostov with two other Americans on the private car of a man who was an adjutant of some kind for Antonoff, who was one of the big men in the Government.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean one of the big men in the Bolshevik government?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes. This young fellow—it was like being with Capt. Kidd, except that you worked on land instead of sea—this fellow had an engine and a private car at his disposal, which took him wherever he wanted to go. He was going back from Rostov to Kharkov. We were glad to go with him. Trains were not running, and the conditions were terrible. For three days we went down every day and sat on the platform of his car waiting for him to come down, because he said that he was going, and then we went back home every evening. On the last day we went to the station and were waiting for him. The station at Rostov, like all stations in Russia, was jammed with hundreds and thousands of people. That station platform must be at least 1,500 feet long. When this fellow came down to his car he made his driver drive down the entire length of that platform, right through the crowd, a thing that would not have happened even in the days of the old régime except with some drunken individual. Then he got out and went and got on his car. He was showing off his authority. He wore two guns, a sword, and a dirk, and was dressed in an aviator's leather uniform. That seemed to be very popular with those fellows. It made them more smart than anything else they could wear.

This chap had with him a woman and two children, and they had in that car all kinds of loot. They had gone through the stores of Rostov and taken what they wanted—requisitioned it. He showed it to us with considerable pride, and the 270,000 rubles that he had.

Instead of getting to Kharkov in 15 hours, we were five days with this gentleman on his car. Finally we went through a little town in the Ukraine where he lived, and he took the loot off this car and took it home and cached it in his cellar. He stayed a day there, and they had a great celebration. We did not celebrate much.

At the end of five days we arrived in Kharkov. On the second day after we arrived there I saw this same chap with his woman and three cabs loaded to the guards with stuff that he had taken out of the stores of Kharkov. He waved his hand to us gaily, and went down to his car. We bade him farewell, and we were through.

Senator OVERMAN. What was he in the government?

Mr. DENNIS. He was some sort of an adjutant for Antonoff, according to his story.

Senator NELSON. What was Antonoff's position?

Mr. DENNIS. He is one of the big men. I can not remember his portfolio. Perhaps one of these other gentlemen here can tell you.

A BYSTANDER. He was military commander. Antonoff commanded the army which fought in Rostov. He is a civilian, but he was in command of the army.

Senator NELSON. Did they destroy much property in Rostov?

Mr. DENNIS. Not while I was there. Not a great many shells fell in the town. There was no such destruction as there was in Moscow, for the reason that the Red Guard made its defense outside of the city, and the shooting in the city was mostly done by machine guns and rifles, which do nothing more than break windows.

Senator NELSON. In what direction did Korniloff retreat?

Mr. DENNIS. South, into the Caucasus; and later, up with the Kuban Cossacks, according to report.

Senator NELSON. Down on the lower Volga?

Mr. DENNIS. No; it is considerably west of the Volga.

Senator OVERMAN. Who were in command of these people; were they German officers?

Mr. DENNIS. They commanded the military end of it. They did not appear before the public.

Senator OVERMAN. Were these Red Guards drilled? Had they been soldiers?

Mr. DENNIS. They all had been soldiers; wore soldiers' uniforms. I remember I was going home one day, and I saw a boy not older than 14 or 15, a little shrimp of a lad, hammering on the front door of a wealthy man's house there, and threatening to shoot everybody in the house unless they opened on the instant. That was rather typical of the attitude to the bourgeois. But this was done for intimidation. They levied a tax of 12,000,000 rubles upon Rostov. The first thing they did was to levy a tax of 12,000,000 rubles on the city. That was later added to by 10,000,000 rubles more.

Senator NELSON. Was that paid?

Mr. DENNIS. I think it was. I knew the managers of a large cigarette factory there, and they paid something over 900,000 rubles in cash. They doubled the price of cigarettes every time they were taxed.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know where that tax money went?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir; I doubt if anybody does. There were two wealthy men in the town who were taxed for 1,000,000 rubles apiece.

Senator NELSON. Did you go to other storm centers there?

Mr. DENNIS. That was the only real fighting on any scale that I saw in Russia. I went back to Kharkov, and then to Moscow and Petrograd. Next to Petrograd and Moscow, I presume that Kharkov is one of the largest manufacturing cities of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Moscow when they had the revolution?

Mr. DENNIS. I just missed that. The buildings were still burning when I got there, in a few cases.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you any knowledge of atrocities committed by the officials of the Bolshevik régime, who were acting in what I might call a civil capacity rather than in any military engagement, for the purpose of terrorizing and intimidating the population?

Mr. DENNIS. At Novo Tcherkask, in that city, a small Russian town, Kaledines had his headquarters. That is a really important part of the Don Cossack region. When they knew that they were going to give up the city of Rostov, the volunteer army got together a hospital train and took some 300 officers, went into the hospitals and rushed these wounded men into this hospital train, and ran them to Novo Tcherkask. They got them out of Rostov just about two days before the town fell. They thought at that time that Novo Tcherkask would not be taken. It was then, and the officers who were so badly wounded that they could not be removed from Novo Tcherkask—they could not get out by the railroad because the railroads were cut off, and any men who were so badly wounded that they could not be gotten out any other way and who remained there in the hospitals and private homes—those officers were all killed, and their bodies were left in the streets of Novo Tcherkask for four days before anyone dared to touch them.

Senator OVERMAN. That is horrible. How many were there?

Mr. DENNIS. Between 140 and 150. That was a matter engendered by the hatred between soldiers and officers.

Senator OVERMAN. Were they Cossack officers?

Mr. DENNIS. No; only a few of the men who joined Korniloff's army were Cossacks; a very few.

Senator NELSON. Did the Cossacks, as a rule, join the Red Army?

Mr. DENNIS. I heard of Cossacks who had been at the front who went Bolshevik. At Christmas time they sent them all home for Christmas vacation, hoping that the old people could straighten them out, because they were against the movement.

Senator NELSON. The old Cossacks were opposed to the Bolsheviks?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes. They owned land and had no desire to give it up. The peasants who owned land in Russia were I do not know what percentage, but a small percentage, of the peasants of Russia; and, of course, the Cossacks who owned their land were against this movement, naturally.

Senator NELSON. All settled Cossacks owned their land?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; by the Government grant.

Senator NELSON. The hetman of the Cossacks did not join the Red Guard?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir. I do not know this as I do about Kaledines, but the man who took his place as hetman was later killed. The story runs that he attempted to escape and was shot. We question it very much; but I do not know the facts.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they attempt to divide the land up amongst the people while you were there?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; that was done in many cases.

Senator OVERMAN. And they took the land away from the landowners?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. How did they divide it; do you know?

Mr. DENNIS. Well, there was no special way of doing this thing. It varied, I think, with every community or every village. Ninety per cent of these peasants, I should say—although the figures vary—do not own their own land, but they own it as a community, and in many cases it got to be a quarrel between one village and the next adjacent as to which one was to get this estate which lay in between.

Senator NELSON. They are all settled in villages, are they not?

Mr. DENNIS. They live under an old "Bible-time" communist system.

Senator NELSON. They are settled in villages and communes, and the land is owned by the village or commune?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. They call them mirs, do they not?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The mirs own the lands and they simply apportion them out to the peasants; each man has his particular parcel to cultivate?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; the lands are allotted.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they allotted to the individuals or allotted to the county or town?

Mr. DENNIS. You are talking about the old allotments?

Senator OVERMAN. I am talking about the old allotments.

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; that is right; to the individual. Now, the question arose in many cases as to which village was to get this intervening land. While these people generally get along in peace, oftentimes there is a good deal of jealousy between two villages. Here is one of 15,000 people and here is one of 5,000, and the question arises as to who shall get this land in between, and in that event the village of 15,000 is likely to get it.

Senator NELSON. Did the Bolsheviks attempt to disturb the old system of mir allotments? Did they attempt to break up the system of allotments that prevailed there where the mirs owned the land?

Mr. DENNIS. I believe not, though it may be; but in any investigation of that kind, because the condition of things was so kaleidoscopic, almost anything you want to state about it is true, whether it is typical or not.

Senator NELSON. I suppose the operations under the Bolsheviks were confined to the confiscation of land from the big landowners?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; but they also started that same class hatred between the peasants who lived upon their own land and those who lived under the commune system. A number of years ago they endeavored to get the peasants to live upon their own lands, because this system they have is like the case of a one-year tenancy in this country, where nothing is put back on the land; and in the Volga Valley, which is the richest in the world, the land had been farmed for thousands of years, with nothing being put back on the land. Lenine started a class war between those who owned their lands that way and those living in the communes.

Senator NELSON. Is this town where you saw this big riot that you have described in what they call the black belt of Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. A rich agricultural prairie country?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. The term "steppe" there is about the same as "prairie" here?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir; prairie.

Senator OVERMAN. What did they do with the big merchants and stores?

Mr. DENNIS. They had on paper a plan for the taking over of this land and the taking over of industry, and how it should be organized and run, but that is not so simple when you turn loose 100,000,000 people with hate in their hearts. It did not go according to the plan. They took over a lot of factories, and in most cases a lot of different things happened. Every group, every community, was a law unto itself.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they loot the stores?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; but it is not called looting. It is called requisitioning.

Senator OVERMAN. The soldiers had the right to requisition what they wanted?

Mr. DENNIS. They did, seemingly. In Nijni Novgorod the Government officials took over all the shoe stores and clothing stores and hardware stores.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Nijni Novgorod?

Mr. DENNIS. I lived there three months. These officials took over all those shops without compensation.

Senator NELSON. That is a big city of 600,000 people?

Mr. DENNIS. I doubt if it is that large. It is a city of some size; between 250,000 and 350,000. No one ever knows in Russia.

Senator NELSON. That is where they hold that great fair?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do they hold it yet?

Mr. DENNIS. According to the soviet newspapers of Russia, they had a magnificent fair there last summer. There was no more fair there than there is on this table.

Senator NELSON. Which side of the Volga is it on?

Mr. DENNIS. On the low side. The town is divided into the high town and the low town, on the east side which lies right along the river. The soviet newspapers, however, had out reports that this fair was running very successfully.

Senator NELSON. Had the Bolsheviki or Reds gotten control of the town when you were there?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. They were in possession?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did the government undertake to run them, when they took over these stores?

Mr. DENNIS. They took over these supplies and then peddled them out. You had to go to a certain commissar and get a permit to buy a certain pair of shoes, and then go and stand in line. I was told there were not more than 2,000 pairs of shoes in the city.

Senator NELSON. These men who finally got the shoes, did they have to pay for them?

Mr. DENNIS. They bought them from the government.

Senator NELSON. The government confiscated them and then sold them?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. That is a way, in addition to taxation, in which the government gets money?

Mr. DENNIS. It helps. There was no thought of compensation. Of course, it was specifically understood, when they took over all of the land, that there was to be no compensation.

Senator NELSON. How did they operate when the soviets took over the manufacturing industries?

Mr. DENNIS. They just took them, with or without the consent of the owners. The owners did various things. I question if you could find any specific case that was typical of all the owners here and there.

Senator NELSON. They took possession, but when they took possession did they undertake to operate?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. In what manner?

Mr. DENNIS. Under a committee of workmen, and under the economic committee, which, besides workmen, may be made up of college professors, or whoever happens to be in it. But I fail to understand, and it is quite beyond my comprehension, how the other men who have returned from Russia state that the industry of Russia is running, because it is not. My basis for the statement lies in the fact that I saw factories in three cities closed. In Nijni Novgorod, a large manufacturing town, when I left there there was only one small factory running.

Senator NELSON. At what place?

Mr. DENNIS. Nijni Novgorod—one small factory.

Senator NELSON. That is a town of half a million people?

Mr. DENNIS. Three hundred thousand, I think, would be nearer the facts. They had a factory there that had run at its height with 25,000 men. When I first came there they were running with from 12,000 to 14,000. Statistics are hard to get in Russia. Nobody knows anything accurately. The factory was closed. That factory, to my mind, is a good example of the Bolshevik methods in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What was that factory manufacturing?

Mr. DENNIS. They had manufactured locomotives, and they changed it to munitions and back to locomotives. The week I got there they demanded of their soviet a new election, as you are supposed to do under the constitution. As I understand it, any time that you are dissatisfied with your representative of the soviet, you can call a meeting and elect a new representative. They demanded that election. They could not get it, so they went on a strike for a week, and finally got it, and they elected 67 per cent of the new representatives from anti-Bolshevik parties. But that is not according to the way they play the game in Russia, so that election was declared null and void, and the old representatives of the Bolsheviks held over.

Across Volga River there is a pontoon bridge which they use in summer time and take up in winter, as they use the ice in winter. That bridge was not laid for a month and a half later than usual because they were afraid the workmen in this factory would come across the river and take the town. I have tried to go to that town and have run into a line of Red Guards hiding around in the grass with machine guns, who had this town surrounded, watching it, because they were afraid these workmen were coming over.

Senator WOLCOTT. I gather that the workmen in this town you speak of had become disgusted with the Bolshevik crowd?

Mr. DENNIS. I should say that is exactly the state of mind of a large majority of the workmen and the peasants at the present time in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Did there seem to be any head or system to their city government there?

Mr. DENNIS. So far as I could get information on such things, in talking with other men from other cities, I think they had about as efficient a local soviet in Nijni Novgorod as any place. They had three men who did some things with executive ability. Two of these men were men of some education. One of them had been to a Russian university. But in the last month I was there they fired the two top men in the soviet. One of them, who was what they call the state commissar, said that they fired those two men and put in men who were of more radical beliefs, who were of a more radical state of mind, because those men were too conservative; and that tendency, I think, can be found all over Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You say that three-fourths are against the Bolsheviki. Why do they not rise up and overthrow the Bolshevik government?

Mr. DENNIS. One answer is to shrug your shoulders and say "That is Russia; that is the Russian character." The Russians, while they know how to cooperate in business and in cooperative societies (and they did organize long before the war and during the war in a business way), when it comes to politics are absolutely hopeless. They do not know the meaning of the word "compromise." If you were to gather around this table representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of the Presbyterian Church, of the Catholic Church, and of the Jewish Church, and of all the other sects that we have in this country, and ask them to form one church, you would have the same situation you would have in Russia if you were to ask these political parties to get together.

Senator NELSON. The peasants—that is, the real Russian peasants—belong to the Greek Church, do they not?

Mr. DENNIS. They do not call it the Greek Church, but the Russian Church.

Senator NELSON. I mean the Russian Church.

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you suppose that some great patriotic leader like Nicholas, or a great general in the army, could organize these people into an army?

Mr. DENNIS. I very much have my doubts. I like the Russian people very much—the ones that I have come in contact with I like personally very much—but if you try to do anything with them, to organize them, you can not do it, because they will not get together. There is a saying in Russia which very plainly describes the Russian characteristics, and which is true, that any time you get three Russians together you have five opinions, and I think that any man who has tried to do things with them will agree to that statement.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then the fact that the Bolsheviki vigorously pursued their terrorism served to restrain at least 75 per cent of the people from asserting their wish in overthrowing the Bolsheviki?

Mr. DENNIS. They very thoroughly intimidated them by standing them up against a wall and shooting them, and by imprisonment, and by a general lack of safety, and the requisitioning and taking over of houses and all that sort of thing. They had them very thoroughly intimidated. The Russian peasant has fought again and again and is fighting against the Red Guard. Why? On account of fixed prices for food and fixed prices on grain, at which he must sell, and because on the things that he needs to buy, which, as a general rule, he can not get because there is very little of them, there are no fixed prices. The sky is the limit. I have seen at the bazaar in the city of Nijni Novgorod the Red Guard go down there and just take the food away from the peasants at the fixed price, which is far below the market price. They feel about this the same as the American farmer would if you put a price of 22 cents on his wheat to-morrow, instead of $2— or whatever it is. When the soldiers came out to take the food there were many fights, because the peasant had been told to take his gun home, and he did, and in some cases he took a machine gun, and he had been told to use it, and had been told he was a free man; and the peasants fought, and the Red Guards many times got the worst of it. Of course, while it is not written in Russia, and I do not know that they would agree with this at all, it would seem that there is only one rule under which the Bolsheviki work in Russia, and that is that the end justifies the means.

Senator OVERMAN. The whole population is a mob? It is just anarchy?

Mr. DENNIS. Of course, if you are not a Bolshevik, "Get out. We will not feed you. And if you work against us, we will kill you." I can not imagine that it was any more dangerous under Ivan the Terrible for a man to speak openly against the government than it is at the present time.

Senator NELSON. Can you give us, in brief, an outline of their scheme of government, of the national Bolshevik government; what their plan is?

Mr. DENNIS. The leaders of this government were advanced socialists of the radical type and believed in going the full length of socialism, and going it by the most radical methods, by force. Other precepts they have; that there is no such thing as private capital, or private property, and that everything must belong to the state, all land and all sources of production; and they have had it specifically nominated in the bond that there shall be no discussion as to how it shall be done. They take these things by force, without compensation for them.

Senator NELSON. Then do they follow it up and say how the state is to utilize this property?

Mr. DENNIS. I think that on paper they had a pretty good scheme, from their viewpoint; but it is not the easiest thing in the world to organize, with a vast country and a terribly disorganized people who are amazingly unintelligent, so far as reading and writing are concerned. They cut themselves out a big piece of work, and they started something they could not control. When they got ready to give a man orders, they found they could not give him orders.

Senator NELSON. Take, for instance, the matter of land. Their scheme was that all of the land belonged to the state, was it not, and the use of it should be distributed among the peasants?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And when you come to the manufacturing industries, their scheme was to take possession of them and have them operated by the government?

Mr. DENNIS. They belonged to the people, through the government. They say everything belongs to the people, because that is a more popular way of putting it.

Senator NELSON. What about the banks?

Mr. DENNIS. Ditto.

Senator NELSON. They were to be taken over by the—

Mr. DENNIS. They were taken over.

Senator NELSON. Were they to be run by the Bolshevik men?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir; for the people. Private property goes out of the thing.

Senator NELSON. There is no longer any private property?

Mr. DENNIS. From which you receive an income—no. I had a very interesting conversation with the bank commissar in Nijni Novgorod. I think I could bust any good bank there is in this city in about a week, if they would let me run it. I do not know anything about a bank. This chap had very interesting ideas about it. Inasmuch as we know that money is the root of all evil, this chap's idea, as he expressed it to me, was to get rid of money. He said, "I hope to see the day when a chicken will cost 5,000 rubles, and that will mean that money will have no value, and we will get rid of it. We will not need any money."

Senator NELSON. He would go back to the system of barter and exchange that prevailed before we got any money?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not think he thought much beyond the point of getting rid of money; it is the root of all evil, tear it up, and that kind of idea. That was from a man who had charge of all the banks in his district.

Senator NELSON. The money they have in circulation now is all paper money, is it not?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Irredeemable paper money, which they are printing and issuing almost without limit?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. What have they done with the gold that was in the banks?

Mr. DENNIS. There were several gold centers. At Nijni Novgorod they had a lot of gold. I at one time knew the amount of gold in Nijni Novgorod.

Senator NELSON. Did they not, as a consequence of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, take over about $200,000,000 of gold of the towns?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know. There was some talk about it, but I do not know the facts. I know they brought to Nijni Novgorod from Riga a large amount of gold, stocks, bonds, and collateral of all kinds, brought with the German bankers who had run those banks. Those Germans I knew personally in Nijni Novgorod, and they were sitting around hoping and praying they could get their hands on this gold.

Senator OVERMAN. When you got your check from the United States for your salary, how did you get the money on it?

Mr. DENNIS. I always got the money directly. But it was possible to go out and sell it, because many wealthy people who had money hidden, who saw this thing coming and got their money out of the banks in cash, were getting nervous because all the time they were having searches and it was possible that this money would be discovered and be confiscated, and they were very glad to exchange money for a draft on America, because it was easier to hide it.

Senator WOLCOTT. This gentleman who had these interesting financial views you speak of, the commissar of the banks, I am curious to know whether he was in a position of large responsibility. How much territory did he have under his jurisdiction where he was going to put into effect these ideas?

Mr. DENNIS. He was running the banks of Nijni Novgorod.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is how large a place?

Mr. DENNIS. Three hundred thousand, with a lot of big banks there, with big supplies of money.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did he stay in that office as long as you were in the country?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Were you in southern Russia, on the border of the Black Sea, at Odessa, and in the Crimea?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were you on the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; we went across by the trans-Siberian, going in by Vladivostok to Moscow.

Senator NELSON. What time did you go in?

Mr. DENNIS. The 1st of November, 1917.

Senator NELSON. I understand, now, and I want to know if it is not your information, that what I call the anti-Red Guard, the anti-Bolsheviki, control the railroads as far west as Omsk, and perhaps as far west as Perm; is not that correct?

Mr. DENNIS. I have only newspaper reports on that.

Senator NELSON. Is not that your understanding, too?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; from what I read.

Senator NELSON. Do they not control that whole line from Vladivostok out as far as Perm, which is the largest town west of the Ural Mountains?

Mr. DENNIS. That might be true to-day, and to-morrow be not true, because my experience with the railroads in Russia was that you never knew. You got on a train, and perhaps you got there and perhaps you did not.

Senator OVERMAN. You did not know Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. DENNIS. Personally, no, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Were they men of ability, brains, and education, by reputation?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir: I should say they were very able men and thoroughly believed that this was the way to bring about heaven on earth, and to end the ills of society.

Senator WOLCOTT. Their route to heaven, though, seems to have been first through hell?

Mr. DENNIS. The route was circuitous. However, as you know from reading the Liberator, the American magazine, Mr. Lenine answers any criticism which I might make, or any other man testifying here, and says: "Of course this happened and that happened; of course it did. We have made mistakes, but what can you expect? Look where we are going and what we are aiming at—what we want to do!" He meets almost all those criticisms in that article in the Liberator.

Senator NELSON. Their aim, theoretically at least, is a pure socialistic government, is it not?

Mr. DENNIS. With one class only.

Senator NELSON. With one class only, and that is what they call the proletariat?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That includes the peasants and the working men, I suppose?

Mr. DENNIS. In Russia they would say it was rather simpler than in any other country because they have more of the proletariat. The proletariat are the larger per cent of the people, and the so-called upper classes are a smaller per cent, and the scheme was to have only one class when they got through.

Senator NELSON. They did not make any provision for what we call in this country the large body of consumers, did they? They did not have any idea on that, did they?

Mr. DENNIS. They look upon everybody as a producer and consumer and, according to the plan, everybody has plenty. There is no difference in class, no difference in caste.

Senator OVERMAN. Is any attempt made toward education?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; they have very fine plans on paper.

Senator NELSON. Was not the country invaded a good deal by German business men?

Mr. DENNIS. German business men and commissions were in Nijni Novgorod. I hardly ever went out of the house except somebody, paid by a German, followed me around.

Senator NELSON. And the Germans seemed to have the upper hand among the Reds?

Mr. DENNIS. Very much so.

Senator NELSON. In other words, there is an affiliation and combination between the Bolsheviks, the Red people, and the German people who were there in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. An affiliation to this extent. This is purely my personal opinion, as is all of it, from my observation. There was an affiliation to this extent, that each group was trying to use the other group. It was not that they had any great sympathy with Germany at all, but if they could use Germany, well and good; and Germany was trying to use them.

Senator NELSON. But, I mean there were a good many German missions there, business men and spies and others that were constantly operating there?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir. I was very well aware of it in Nijni Novgorod. They had large commissions there, and ostensibly these men were looking after the welfare of the Central Empire prisoners. That is why they were there, on the surface. They were there when I left.

Senator NELSON. Carrying on the business of propaganda in Russia?

MR. DENNIS. They were. I knew of two cases where they had bought stock, and they carried the gamble through to the last minute, buying stock in industries, and buying estates.

Senator NELSON. You seem to be well posted. If there is anything else you have not told us about this matter that you think we ought to know, or the American people ought to know, I wish you would tell us.

MR. DENNIS. I do not know whether this belongs in this hearing or not, but a thing that interested me very much was to discover a number of men in positions of power, commissars in the cities here and there in Russia, who had lived in America.

Senator NELSON. Who had been graduated here?

MR. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Where had they lived mostly, in New York?

MR. DENNIS. In the industrial centers. I met a number of them, and I sat around and listened to attacks upon America that I would not take from any man in this country; but I took it over there because I was asking favors, and I was not in a position to get into an altercation, as I did not want to get in jail.

Senator NELSON. Were the men who had lived for years in this country, and had gone back there, occupying prominent positions in this Bolshevik government?

MR. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. In the main, of what nationality were they?

MR. DENNIS. Hebrew.

Senator WOLCOTT. German Hebrews?

MR. DENNIS. Russian Hebrews. The men that I met there had lived in America, according to their stories, anywhere from 3 to 12 years.

Senator NELSON. You know, years ago they colonized a lot of Germans over there in southern Russia. We call them Mennonites.

MR. DENNIS. Yes; we call them that in this country.

Senator NELSON. Do you know what their attitude was?

MR. DENNIS. I do not know what their prejudice was, but I judge that they had a prejudice, from the information I got that they at the end were pretty badly treated by the Russian Government. They were deported and sent into Siberia.

Senator NELSON. They were settled there originally because they did not believe in war. They were permitted to emigrate to Russia, and were given land, and given immunity from military service; but that military immunity was afterwards revoked. Now, were they with the Bolsheviks, or were they with the other side?

MR. DENNIS. I could not answer that question. I could only say that these men in the last year of the war, and some of them before, in large numbers, were dispossessed and sent into Siberia and put in the internment camps, because of supposedly pro-German sentiment.

Senator NELSON. They occupied that territory around the lower Don, did they not?

MR. DENNIS. Yes; there were numbers of them there, and then they were pretty well scattered.

Senator NELSON. In the black belt, on the verge of the arid country.

Senator OVERMAN. Are these people over there, who have lived in the United States, taking part in this Bolshevnik movement?

Mr. DENNIS. This is a thing that, in my opinion, backed up by the opinions of other Americans, Englishmen, and Frenchmen with whom I talked when we got into Moscow, and were waiting there three weeks before we got out, and comparing notes, seems more interesting than the fact that they are there in positions of power, that these men were the most bitter and implacable men in Russia on the program of the extermination, if necessary, of the bourgeois class.

Senator NELSON. They constitute the Red element, do they not?

Mr. DENNIS. In many cases.

Senator NELSON. In most cases?

Mr. DENNIS. In many cases. I would not say in most, but in many.

Senator NELSON. Trotsky himself came from this country, did he not?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; he had lived in this country.

Senator OVERMAN. You say they are in favor of the extermination of the bourgeois?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir. I never met a more implacable individual than a man that they called the war commissar in Nijni Novgorod. He had been in this country for a number of years.

Senator NELSON. They were Hebrews that had been in this country?

Mr. DENNIS. These men are; yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of any effort they are making to carry that propaganda to this country?

Mr. DENNIS. I can not go into court and prove it, but I have some very definite suspicions, and some facts which would indicate considerable; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Give us what you have.

Mr. DENNIS. I believe the information on that score that I have is already in the hands of the Government, through other sources; but, going to their meetings as I have done in the city of Chicago, there is no question at all about their approval of the Russian system and of their desire to bring it to pass in this country.

Senator NELSON. Are there many of that class of people in Chicago?

Mr. DENNIS. The first meeting I went to was in the Chicago Coliseum, which was packed. Indeed, they had overflow meetings, and all the speakers had to go out and double up.

Senator NELSON. And that was a socialist meeting?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Publishing Russian propaganda?

Mr. DENNIS. A red-flag meeting.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there any affiliation between them and the I. W. W. of this country?

Mr. DENNIS. As to any affiliation in fact or in organization I do not know; but they are absolutely affiliated, I should say, inasmuch as they are both going to the same place.

Senator OVERMAN. As they both tend to the same thing?

Mr. DENNIS. They both want the same thing.

Senator NELSON. All aiming for the same end?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. By the same methods?

Mr. DENNIS. I see no difference between them at all; but as to whether they have any affiliation in organization I do not know. That is bound to come, I think. If the movement goes on they will get together, of course.

Senator NELSON. Are they circulating much Bolshevik literature out in Chicago?

Mr. DENNIS. Have you seen copies of the American Bolshevik, published in Minneapolis?

Senator NELSON. Yes; and I had something from that printed in the Congressional Record.

Mr. DENNIS. That is a fair example of it. I have here some of the handbills they were distributing, which call for immediate action.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see that great handbill that they were sending all over the country and posting up, "The War is over, now for revolution"?

Mr. DENNIS. I have not seen that; no, sir. But nothing of that kind would surprise me, after what I have learned in Chicago.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the seating capacity of the Coliseum?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know. Several times I asked what it was, but I could not get definite figures on it. I think it runs from six to ten thousand.

Senator WOLCOTT. At this large meeting which you attended, at which they had to have overflow meetings, did the meeting seem to be in sympathy with the ideas expressed, or was it made up largely of people who were there just to look on?

Mr. DENNIS. There were there a number of observers like myself, and a good many Government observers were there, but with the first mention of the names of Lenine and Trotsky the crowd arose to its feet and applauded for five minutes. They had on the wall, I remember, a long strip of paper containing a list of the soviet republics of the world. This list was a little premature, I think. Nevertheless it was there. It began with Russia, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and went on down through the list, and at the bottom was a large question mark, "Which is next?" And every speaker, not by actual words, but by inference, said that America would be the next one; and every time that was done there was sure to be applause.

Senator NELSON. Did you observe the character of the people there, or their nationality?

Mr. DENNIS. It was a very well-dressed, intelligent-looking crowd; not starving people by any means. Indeed, I have always maintained that Bolshevism is not a cry or demand for bread; it is a state of mind, and it must be met as such. They were a pretty well-dressed, intelligent crowd.

Senator NELSON. I mean as to their nationality. Were they native-born Americans, or were they foreigners?

Mr. DENNIS. One could only tell by the applause when the speeches were made in the different languages, as to the predominant number of people there. We had speeches in Polish, Yiddish, and German, but when the Russian delegate got up and said, "Comrades," which is a great word in Russia, I should say at least 70 per cent of that audience got to their feet.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which tongue seemed to rank next to the Russian at that meeting?

Mr. DENNIS. I would say Yiddish. There was an American workman, about 50 years old, who sat immediately to my right, with whom I talked a good deal; a well-dressed, first-class looking workman. It was really my first contact with that type of man, and I will tell you that I would just as willingly try to drive a tenpenny nail into a cement block as to try to get an idea into that man's head. I never found any greater hatred than that man had for the capitalistic class, as he called them.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then he was of American nationality?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. From what you have seen since you came back, there at Chicago, you would think there is propaganda going on here in this country?

Mr. DENNIS. Very definitely.

Senator NELSON. Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. As I understood you awhile ago, you found some of the very prominent men in the Bolshevik government over there that were men who had lived in this country and gone back to Russia.

Mr. DENNIS. The interesting thing about it was not their prominence but their bitterness.

Senator NELSON. They were most bitter?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you recognize any speakers of prominence at that meeting?

Mr. DENNIS. I beg pardon?

Senator OVERMAN. Were any of these speakers men of prominence in Chicago or in this country?

Mr. DENNIS. Oh, yes; all the men who have been on trial before Judge Landis spoke there.

Senator NELSON. Can you give the names of these speakers at Chicago?

Mr. DENNIS. Steadman, Victor Berger, and what is the man's name that begins with Er? He is a Norwegian. All the men who have been on trial before Judge Landis spoke at that meeting, and a number of others.

Senator OVERMAN. There has been more than one meeting?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; I have gone to some smaller meetings.

Senator NELSON. They have small ward meetings, do they not, in the localities where they live?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And have local speakers there?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they are at it continually, are they not?

Mr. DENNIS. I think this can be proved. There are now some paid traveling speakers. The organization has a paid staff.

Senator NELSON. Have you come across any of these men who have been in Russia and have come back here and are carrying on propaganda here?

Mr. DENNIS. No.

Senator NELSON. Are you acquainted with this Mr. Williams?

MR. DENNIS. I do not know Mr. Williams or Mr. Reed. I have read their stuff, and John Williams's wife's book.

Senator NELSON. You did not come across them in Russia?

MR. DENNIS. Both of these men had left Soviet Russia before I got in there.

Senator NELSON. Do you find many native-born Americans working in this propaganda here?

MR. DENNIS. I am not prepared to say. I do not know the men and their history well enough to say, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the meaning of the word "soviet"?

MR. DENNIS. The nearest translation would be "committee," or "conference." "Conference," I think, would perhaps be the nearest English equivalent.

Senator OVERMAN. What percentage of the people of Russia are educated?

MR. DENNIS. The figures vary. The figures as to illiteracy run anywhere from 70 to 85 per cent. It depends upon what man you happen to be reading. I do not think they know anything about accurate statistics in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Under the old régime, did they have any public schools?

MR. DENNIS. Yes; about 5 per cent of the people, under the old régime, were permitted a real education, according to the best authority that I can get. There are some figures on that, which, so far as I know, are accurate enough, as to education, schools, and so forth, and how many children actually had a chance to go to school in Russia.

Senator NELSON. But the Russian peasants, as a rule, are illiterate?

MR. DENNIS. Yes. I do not know of anybody who knows the situation thoroughly, who talks about the situation in Russia as a democracy. I have heard many people talk about it as a great democracy. To my mind that is an absolute misnomer, and is not in accordance with the printed and spoken statements of Lenine and others, who ought to know what kind of a show they are running over there. They do not call it that. They specifically state that it is not a democracy.

Senator OVERMAN. Not a democracy?

MR. DENNIS. No; and it is not supposed to be. It is an autocracy of the proletariat.

Senator OVERMAN. They do not want liberty?

MR. DENNIS. Well, they would say they did. They would not agree with that. But they want it in a way that is peculiar, according to our ideas in this country.

Senator NELSON. They have in these different mirs or villages, and in the wards or portions of cities themselves, their local soviets, or local councils?

MR. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they send representatives to the national soviet?

MR. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The head soviet.

MR. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that constitutes their government, really?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Of course, the general soviet has to have administrative officers?

Mr. DENNIS. It would be democratic if the people away back in the villages and in the factories could elect and send up anybody they wanted to, but the fact remains that up to date they have not been permitted to. They have to send Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Or they will not be received?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. If they elect one of their own men who is an anti-Bolshevik, what is the result? They just do not receive him?

Mr. DENNIS. Well, that case I spoke of in the factory at Novgorod would be typical. They declared the election null and void and held over the old representatives to the soviet. In some cases they told the people, "You must elect Bolsheviks and Bolsheviks only." Indeed, there is going to be just one class, and one party in this class.

Senator NELSON. Of course it is only in the territory that the Bolshevik control, either permanently or temporarily, that they have succeeded in forming these local soviets?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. In the other part of Russia that is in the control of the white guard, or the anti-Bolshevik, they have not adopted that system?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know, because all the time I was there after I got in I was in soviet Russia, and I have no information about the outside other than this information.

Senator OVERMAN. That general congress or assembly representing the government is not called the Duma now, under the new system?

Mr. DENNIS. No.

Senator OVERMAN. What do they call it?

Mr. DENNIS. It is called the central soviet.

Senator NELSON. They have abolished the legislative duma, have they?

Mr. DENNIS. It is very interesting to note that these soviets all the way around will not take orders from anybody unless they want to. If it fits in with their plan, well and good. If it does not, they do not obey. It is the same way with the committee. If they do not do the right thing, they fire them and get another that will, and they get quick action.

Senator OVERMAN. Will they have a general law for the general soviet itself?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; if it happens to tally with what they want to do. Of course, there has been a flood of "decrets." Every man in a town that has any power issues a decret, and sometimes they are wise decrets and looking to the best interests of the people, but at other times they are the most idealistic things you ever saw, and at other times they are perfectly wild and harebrained; but nevertheless they are issued and plastered up on the walls of the town.

Senator NELSON. Is it not a fact that the only cohesive principle there is in their government at present is the reign of terror they carry on?

Mr. DENNIS. I should say that in the beginning its power was derived from machine guns.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they manufacturing munitions?

Mr. DENNIS. I know of only one plant that ran for a short time, but they had enough out of the supplies of old Russia to keep them going for their military operations. Of course, with this new army which they are getting I do not know what they will do. They had called five years to the colors when I left, and they were very much afraid of that army. They did not know what to do with it, whether to arm it or not to arm it. Of course, they keep the army up now, because if a factory closes down and the workmen are thrown out of a job and have nothing to do, they put them in the army and pay them a certain amount each month. It was 400 rubles when I was in Nijni Novgorod. I think it is higher now. They supported the men and their families. That is the kind of coercion that keeps the red army together.

Senator OVERMAN. Have the Bolsheviki got woman suffrage? Do the women take part in these meetings?

Mr. DENNIS. I never saw very many of them in these meetings, but they have it on paper; yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. The money they pay to the soldiers simply comes from the printing press. They make money on the printing press as they need it to pay these soldiers, do they not?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir. I had at one time the figures, put out by the head man of the government, of the deficit on the railroad—the estimated deficit—amounting to I forget how many hundred millions of rubles, and the amount of the factory and industry deficit, and so on.

On the Volga River all the traffic had stopped and there were at least 200 boats, some of them passenger boats, the finest I ever saw on any river, standing idle, and the workmen with their families were living on them and being paid by the government from time to time as they could get the money down to them.

Senator OVERMAN. The commerce on the river then, had practically ceased?

Mr. DENNIS. Virtually so. It was down at the lowest ebb, on account of the absence of coal or oil. The thing was petering out because of no fuel.

Senator NELSON. In normal times there was an immense water commerce on the Volga?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; it is a great center, with vessels of all kinds there. The flour mills there were closed, and all the factories were closed except one when I left.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there any schedule on the railroads?

Mr. DENNIS. It is an amazing thing that the railroad organization has kept going. The railroad guild, perhaps you might call it, has kept going against tremendous odds, and they have maintained a passenger service. The freight service is badly disorganized.

In all Russia, in about 10 months while I was there, I never but once in any state anywhere in Russia saw carpenters or masons working. Never but once did I see men with hammers and nails and saws in their hands.

Senator NELSON. There was not any building going on?

Mr. DENNIS. Absolutely nothing. The whole thing was going to destruction. I saw a band stand being built. That was the only thing I ever saw in process of construction in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What are the houses of the peasants constructed of?

Mr. DENNIS. Logs, where they can get them. They are fine log houses.

Senator NELSON. With thatched roofs?

Mr. DENNIS. Sometimes; but log houses, well built.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were the schools in operation?

Mr. DENNIS. Not during the summer, and there was much discussion in Nijni Novgorod as to whether they would open this fall or not, on account of financial difficulties.

Senator OVERMAN. Were the farms in operation, or had many of them left the farms?

Mr. DENNIS. I read an article not long ago in some American magazine, by an American whom I knew over there, in which he said that the acreage this year was about 10 per cent. That, to my mind, is not anywhere near the fact in the case. In the districts which I knew from my personal knowledge and from information which I got in Nijni Novgorod and from information which we got from people from the other sections who came into the consulate in Moscow, 75 would be very much nearer the truth.

Senator NELSON. Seventy-five per cent?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes. Others even put it higher than that. But in my opinion, the crops were very good. I am not a prophet, but if they had the brains for organization and could get their traffic organized so that they could distribute it, I believe there is enough stuff in soviet Russia to feed the Russians; not well, but to keep them from starvation.

Senator NELSON. What is their wheat? Is it spring wheat or winter wheat?

Mr. DENNIS. Both, I believe. We could go from Nidjni Novgorod down the Volga River and up the Kama River to Perm, and buy white flour pretty reasonably. A friend of mine went, and got flour for 12 rubles a pood, or 36 English pounds.

Senator OVERMAN. Are these peasants most hospitable in their nature?

Mr. DENNIS. As individuals; yes, sir, they are. You could buy flour for 10 rubles a pood, but they would not allow you to take it out of the city, or into a different State. You could not take it across the line. My man got back because he was working for an American, and my English friend got back because he had a British passport, but a man who lived within two blocks of me in Nijni Novgorod had the flour taken away from him.

Maj. HUMES. He was a Russian?

Mr. DENNIS. He was a Russian. It was possible for a German to go there and buy flour by the thousand poods and take it out without any difficulty. He got it out of that State, but it did not go into Germany. There was great opposition on the part of the people to Germany getting stuff out of Russia, and trains of cars had a way of being sidetracked and turning up somewhere else.

Senator OVERMAN. I should think that after this war and so many people being killed, they would have a great antipathy to the Germans.

MR. DENNIS. I think the sentiment of the bourgeois class could be summed up by what a man whom I knew pretty well said to me. He said: "I know it is a mistake for us to want the Germans to come in here. I know in the end we will regret it, and we would much rather have somebody else come, but nobody else will come, and it is 'any port in a storm.' If the Germans come, my life and my property will be safe." I do not blame them at all for feeling that way about it.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Is there any breakdown of the moral standards in this Bolshevik régime?

MR. DENNIS. There has been a lot of talk about it, and about these proclamations which have appeared in American newspapers, and those proclamations in two cases I know of were actually put up; but whether they were put up by the government or not is a very large question in my mind.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Did they purport to be official proclamations?

MR. DENNIS. They were put up in the city of Samara, signed by the anarchists, and about two days later, as quick as they could get out an answer to it, the anarchists came out with another proclamation which they pasted up over the town, saying that the first one had not been sent out by them, but had been sent out by the enemies of the anarchists to discredit that group. I am inclined to believe that story. It was about the nationalization of women.

SENATOR NELSON. They are opposed to religion, are they not?

MR. DENNIS. The Bolsheviks?

SENATOR NELSON. Yes.

MR. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

SENATOR NELSON. And they advocate a sort of what in this country we call "free love," do they not?

MR. DENNIS. I have never seen any official statement of that kind. They are opposed to religion, and were very much opposed to the Y. M. C. A., here and there.

SENATOR NELSON. What was their grievance against the Y. M. C. A.?

MR. DENNIS. A tool of capitalism.

SENATOR OVERMAN. How did they feel toward the Red Cross?

MR. DENNIS. All right, so far as I know.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Was the Salvation Army in Russia?

MR. DENNIS. I never saw it—yes, I did. I saw two of them.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Did you ever notice any outcry against the Salvation Army people?

MR. DENNIS. I know nothing about that. The two that I saw were taking care of an orphan asylum where there were a lot of little children. I imagine they were very glad to have them do it. The organization, or lack of organization, was so very bad in Petrograd that during the last week in April, when they dumped into Petrograd the first 1,500 prisoners who came back from Germany—Russians released from the German prisons; they dumped these men into the great station in Petrograd, all of them sick, and very few of them able to walk, and there was no organization in that great city to look after those men—that was the most terrible thing that I saw in Russia.

SENATOR NELSON. They looked starved and emaciated?

MR. DENNIS. Terrible. You could not overpaint that picture.

Senator NELSON. And were terribly broken?

Mr. DENNIS. You could not overpaint the picture of those men. The few who were able to go out came down the Nevski Prospect. Petrograd is a pretty blasé city by this time, it has been through a good deal, and it takes something to stir them up, but these men in knots of two and three would stand on the street there and beg, and they poured money into their caps—the people on the streets—but there was no organization to take care of them at all. If there ever was anybody who needed a Red Cross outfit, and needed an efficient one, with nurses, it was that crowd of 1,500 men. After that the American Y. M. C. A. tried to do something. I think certain Russian representatives wanted the Americans to be allowed to endeavor to go on and accomplish something; but what they have done I do not know.

Senator OVERMAN. How is the ordinary peasant as a family man? Does he love his family and love his children?

Mr. DENNIS. So far as I know, yes, sir; and I wish to say that in general I liked them very much. I do not know of any foreigner who has lived in Russia for any length of time who does not love the Russian people and their qualities. They are what we call, out in the country that I come from, home folks, neighborly; but, of course, under these conditions, naturally, with a mob spirit turned loose in a crowd, they are a very different people. I presume that is true of any primitive people. Besides, up until August 3, when they arrested all foreigners with the exception of Americans, up to that time, outside of talking with men who had lived in America, I never received anything but reasonably courteous treatment, and mostly absolutely courteous treatment—warm, courteous treatment—from any Russian to whom I said merely, “I am an American.” I did not have to tell him what my business was or anything about it.

Senator OVERMAN. They did not seem to have any feeling, much, against the Americans?

Mr. DENNIS. Every Russian peasant, even though he does not know what America is or where it is, perhaps, has a warm association of feeling about America—that it is a free country.

Senator WOLCOTT. How many of these people who had come from America and were in office under the Bolshevik government would you estimate that you saw, speaking in proportion?

Mr. DENNIS. That I personally saw and talked with?

Senator WOLCOTT. Or that you know of, either by your own observation or from those in whom you have confidence?

Mr. DENNIS. Our general opinion in Moscow was that anywhere from 20 to 25 per cent of the commissars in Soviet Russia had lived in America.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you form any estimate as to the number in office in Petrograd?

Mr. DENNIS. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. They were not all from New York City, I take it, from what you said a while ago, but they were from different parts of the United States—congested centers?

Mr. DENNIS. Always from industrial centers.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know any of them that have been naturalized in this country?

MR. DENNIS. No. At least, not one of them would say he had been. I asked two, I recall, and they said they had not. One had lived here 13 years, according to his story, and talked English very well.

SENATOR NELSON. Did you find them to be from Chicago, usually?

MR. DENNIS. I found them to be from industrial centers near Chicago. One man when I bade him good-by said, "Good-by. I will see you in about 10 years. We are coming over to America to pull off this same show." I told him I would be there.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. These men who were from America who were in office there were of what nationality?

MR. DENNIS. I beg pardon?

SENATOR WOLCOTT. These men who had been in America, and were in office over there, were of what nationality?

MR. DENNIS. With only one exception, of my personal knowledge, Hebrew.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. What nationality was that one exception?

MR. DENNIS. Russian.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You said a while ago that you were convinced in your own mind that there is organized propaganda in this country to spread this Bolsheviki thing to America. In substantiation of that statement you cited this Chicago meeting where you heard the doctrine preached and well received. Have you any other substantial facts that point to the theory that there is an organized propaganda here, financed here, to spread this soviet government to America?

MR. DENNIS. Nothing that I think is not already in the hands of the Government; nothing new.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Have you made any report to the Department of Justice or the Secretary of State?

MR. DENNIS. When I returned to America I came here to Washington and reported to the consular staff.

SENATOR OVERMAN. To the State Department?

MR. DENNIS. To the State Department. I was then interviewed by a number of men in various departments, the Russian war board, and one or two others. Maj. Miles, I believe, was one.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Will you send us a copy of that report?

MR. DENNIS. I made no report at that time. I have just returned to America, and came directly here from New York, about November 1.

SENATOR OVERMAN. You made no report about this organization over here?

MR. DENNIS. No, sir; I knew nothing about it at that time. America had been a closed book to me for one year.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You say the information that this propaganda is afoot in this country is now in the hands of the Government?

MR. DENNIS. Yes, sir; such information as I have.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Is the information you refer to now as being in the possession of the Government information that you yourself gave or discovered?

MR. DENNIS. Only in part. Some of it I ran across, and some of it I got from those who were investigating the situation.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Maj. Humes, have you investigated that matter with the department?

MAJ. HUMES. I have been in touch with all of the departments.

Senator WOLCOTT. We will eventually get that information, will we?

Maj. HUMES. I think so; yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think we should have it, because that is the main thing we are after.

Senator OVERMAN. That is what we are investigating, principally—the basis of this investigation. Speaking from your own knowledge and from general information, what do you think is the extent of this propaganda in this country?

Mr. DENNIS. Well, there are undoubtedly people who are interested in spreading this propaganda, who have a pretty fair organization that extends from New York to San Francisco. They have divided this country up into sections and put it out under various leaders to handle.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know, from what you have heard, whether it is growing?

Mr. DENNIS. No; I do not. I should say the growth of it would depend in large part upon the industrial conditions during the coming months—employment or unemployment.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you come across Col. Thompson in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. He had left before I got there.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you come across Mr. Raymond Robins?

Mr. DENNIS. I met him a couple of times in Moscow.

Senator WOLCOTT. In what capacity was he acting at the time when you met him?

Mr. DENNIS. The only one that he had—as the head of the Red Cross. As far as I know, that was the only official position he had at any time.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you have any opportunity to observe his relations with the Bolsheviki?

Mr. DENNIS. Very little. I talked with him at length one day concerning the Bolsheviki there, because he had been in Moscow longer than I had. I got there after the revolution. I missed that, and I wanted to know more about it.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was his attitude one of sympathy with it or otherwise?

Mr. DENNIS. As I understood him at that time, his attitude was that of—well, sympathy is not exactly the word—recognition of them, because they were the people who were in control; not because of what they stood for or their methods, but because they were the people in control. I remember specifically that he used the phrase, "They are the people with the guts."

Senator NELSON. And they ought to be recognized, because they were in control. Was that his theory?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; they were the only people who seemed to have an organization and the ability to run the show.

Senator NELSON. And, therefore, he was for them?

Mr. DENNIS. Therefore, as I understood it, he was in favor of dealing with them as representing Russia. He knew them all and was on speaking terms with them and kept in touch with them—the leaders of the movement. He was in Moscow at that time.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Trotsky?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir; I never met him personally. I heard him talk once.

Senator OVERMAN. Where did you hear him talk, at Petrograd or Moscow?

Mr. DENNIS. Moscow. As I judge the situation, Trotzky was the firebrand of this group, taking the three of them. Lenine, Tchitcherin, and Trotsky.

Senator NELSON. Who was the firebrand?

Mr. DENNIS. Trotsky. He is a highly emotional chap.

Senator OVERMAN. Does he make a good speech?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; he makes a very fine, fiery speech, and he is a chap who believes, as we understood the situation, in carrying this thing through according to plan with absolute implacability toward the bourgeoisie group. From what I know of the situation, this story that appeared in the American newspaper a while ago, that there had been a break between Trotsky and Lenine, sounded quite reasonable, because it was Trotsky who, when they arrested all the English, French, and other allies, Americans excepted, wanted to hold them as hostages.

Senator NELSON. Did he want the Americans arrested, too?

Mr. DENNIS. I never knew. I never could find out why they were not arrested.

Senator NELSON. Were the Americans arrested?

Mr. DENNIS. Individuals were in outlying cities, like Mr. Roger Simmons, at Vologda, Mr. Leonard and Mr. Berry, at Tsaritzin, and there may have been others.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave?

Mr. DENNIS. On September 2.

Senator OVERMAN. Why did you leave?

Mr. DENNIS. It was getting a bit warm. All the allied powers had withdrawn from Russia, and there was no place to go.

Senator NELSON. Which way did you come out?

Mr. DENNIS. I was with Dr. Huntington, who testified here, I believe. We were all on the same train.

Senator WOLCOTT. You all came together?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Did you have to go around by Sweden?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir. We wanted to go to Archangel, but you could not get across the Volga. There were some tentative advances made to the German Government to issue us a safe conduct across the Baltic to Stockholm.

Senator NELSON. The Germans were in possession of Finland at that time?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes. We asked them to guarantee us a safe conduct, and we waited for some time, and finally the Diet of Finland guaranteed us a safe conduct through Finland.

Dr. Huntington must have told you of our experience in Petrograd; how they nearly refused to let us go, and refused to respect the orders of Tchitcherin, Lenine, and Trotsky.

Senator OVERMAN. That man Tchitcherin is a Russian, I suppose?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is he from?

Mr. DENNIS. He is a man of some rank; a nobleman by birth, I have forgotten what; a well-educated man, and a man of wealth at one time; a very able gentleman.

Senator NELSON. The last legation to get out of there was the Norwegian Legation, and I was reading an account last night in the newspaper of how long it took them to get out of Petrograd over to Finland. They were held up time and again on the journey. Evidently they wanted to bleed them and get money from them.

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know how successful they were with them. We were bled.

Senator NELSON. They were not bled, but they were delayed.

Mr. DENNIS. We paid and got out.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever come across Dr. Harold Williams over there?

Mr. DENNIS. Dr. Harold Williams? No, sir. The only Williams I knew was not a doctor, but was a banker from Waterloo, Iowa; the only man by the name of Williams I ever met in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Were there many Americans in business over in Russia?

Mr. DENNIS. I heard much of other nationalities. I should think there were a few. The Germans were in business very largely, but there were very few Americans in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Did you notice the agricultural implements that they had on the farms there? Were they American implements or were they German?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know, except that the International Harvester Company has been in Russia for a long time, and has a great plant and has a big business there. Mr. ——— over here can tell you more about that company's establishment than I can.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they shut up their shop?

Mr. DENNIS. It was running when Mr. ——— left. He can tell you more about what happened than I can, because it was his business to run that factory.

Senator OVERMAN. Maj. Humes, have you any more questions?

Maj. HUMES. You have spoken about the terrorism toward the bourgeoisie. Was that terrorism confined to the bourgeoisie, the so-called upper classes, or was it directed against some groups of the proletariat as well?

Mr. DENNIS. It was at times directed against the proletariat when they did not follow orders, when they went out to take food at fixed prices. There have been some very good sized fights between the peasants and the red guard over that food question, because the peasant was not to pay taxes; and personally I am quite convinced that when the peasant got land, the man who actually got the land was through with the revolution right then and there, and if they had let him alone he would have been all right. But what can he buy? What can he do with his money when he does get money? And they come out and take the food supplies away from him at fixed prices away below the market price. He is very bitter against it. I have had a number of them tell me themselves what they thought about it, and that the old days were better.

Senator OVERMAN. This red flag, is that on their public buildings, and on the streets, everywhere?

Mr. DENNIS. Oh, yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Just a pure red flag; nothing on it?

Mr. DENNIS. Sometimes it had mottoes on it, but they varied. I do not know this, I do not know that anybody does, but I felt quite sure that if the Russian people, supposing that the peasants are 80 to 85 per cent of the population, were let alone to organize their form of government, it would be an advanced socialistic government, because of the fact that 95 per cent of them have lived all their lives in this communistic form of government. But they would do it by peaceful means. It is the object of the Mensheviks, as of the Bolsheviks, to establish a socialistic form of government, but the one wants to do it by the most drastic revolutionary methods, and the other by evolution. Of course, in industry, the fact that all industry has gone to pot is due to a number of causes; lack of ability to get raw materials, first, and secondly, lack of trained brains.

Senator NELSON. And a disinclination of the men to work, too?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes. The Russian people very much love to talk, and this gives them a free opportunity.

Senator NELSON. Then the system will break down from three causes, lack of raw materials, lack of competent men to run it, and disinclination of workmen to take hold and work?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes; and lack of ability of the right man, when they find him, to give orders to anybody and be sure that they will be obeyed. I have known a case where the trained men have gone back, at the request of the government, and endeavored to do this and that on the railroads and in the factories, and they would put in a certain reform and want to change a certain thing. It did not please the workman. All right, that settled it. The government has not the authority to go down there and do it, unless it is with the machine gun. Every man is a law unto himself, in this dispensation.

Maj. HUMES. Under the constitution, all agricultural implements become the property of the state. What has been done in carrying that provision into effect?

Mr. DENNIS. I do not know, but I would say nothing had been done. There is an amazing number of things on paper that have never been carried into effect, because they have no authority or organization. Russia is more like a kaleidoscope than anything else. It switches all the time, and it is a wise man who can plot the thing, and make a blue print of it.

Maj. HUMES. You say that the Russian people like to talk?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Does the soviet government permit, either in the public press or in public meetings, free expression of sentiments other than in support of their own activities and government?

Mr. DENNIS. At the present time there is no public press except the soviet press. There are only Bolshevik newspapers at the present time.

Maj. HUMES. And they will not allow the publication of anything else but Bolshevik newspapers?

Mr. DENNIS. No, sir. There is nothing else.

Senator NELSON. They do not know anything about freedom of the press, then?

Mr. DENNIS. Oh, no; oh, no.

Senator NELSON. Or free speech?

Mr. DENNIS. I can not imagine that any discerning——

Senator NELSON. Or anything but Bolshevik speech?

Mr. DENNIS. I can not imagine that any Russian would attempt to speak in public attacking the Bolsheviks. His shrift would be very short.

Senator NELSON. It is strange that when they come over here they advocate free speech and freedom of the press, and complain against our Government, and they will not apply that paregoric over there.

Mr. DENNIS. They will undoubtedly have free speech when all their people are one class, and all are Bolshevik. [Laughter.]

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. I have heard this story, and I am going to tell it to you and see if you know of any similar occurrence, and see if you think it ties in with the general attitude of mind of the Bolshevik masses over there. At an election I understand they vote by holding up a hand, and on one occasion an election was held and the Red Guard was on hand and the people were asked, "All in favor of such and such a thing, hold up their hands." Of course, most of them put up their hands. Then the question was put, "All who are opposed, put up their hands," and three or four very unwise creatures put up their hands in opposition to the Bolshevik side of this election, whereupon they were hauled out by the Red Guard and shot. It was, therefore, a unanimous vote.

Mr. DENNIS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever hear of any such occurrence as that?

Mr. DENNIS. I have no evidence of that. Oh, that is quite possible. Why not?

Senator WOLCOTT. You think it would not be a surprising thing if that is done under this régime over there?

Mr. DENNIS. Why, no. I know of things which are quite equal to that—actually know of them; but not exactly like that.

Maj. HUMES. What instances do you know of, similar to that?

Mr. DENNIS. For example, they have in Russia an extraordinary commission for the suppression of the counter-revolution, sabotage, and—what else is it?—speculation, which can do anything it pleases; which has absolute authority. They arrest people, try them, convict them, execute them, and do not have to say a word to anybody about that. You take a country overturned like that, and turn loose a lot of men, some of them honest, some of them dishonest, some of them able to see things clearly, and others fanatics of the wildest type, and put them in there with that power, and what will happen? It is bound to happen.

Mr. Leonard, who is here, will tell you interesting things about that extraordinary commission and their doings.

Senator NELSON. You are acquainted with Mr. Leonard?

Mr. DENNIS. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Leonard is here to-day.

Mr. DENNIS. I just happened to hear his voice over here, so that I knew that he was here.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there anything else, Major, with this witness?

Maj. HUMES. I believe not. We are very much obliged to you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROBERT F. LEONARD.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. Where are you from?

Mr. LEONARD. St. Paul, Minn.

Senator OVERMAN. How long is it since you returned from Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. I left Petrograd on the 16th of November, and returned here on the 3d of December.

Senator OVERMAN. You came out with this colony?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. What were you doing in Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. I went over there with the Y. M. C. A. to work with the soldiers in the field, and then was with the Russian soldiers at the front, and then acted as vice consul.

Senator OVERMAN. You worked on the front with the soldiers, did you?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir; for quite a time after the revolution, from August until November, 1917.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you observe in their army this Bolshevik propaganda going around among the soldiers?

Mr. LEONARD. One could not help noticing it. The soldiers were selling all their things to the Germans. They were selling machine guns for 5 rubles. They would sell a 6-inch gun for a bottle of brandy, and then start for home.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were they selling any American-made ammunition to the Germans?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And American-made guns?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; and you would see a lot of Winchester ammunition over there—U. M. C.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is, munitions and guns that we, in America, had made and sent to Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. It was practically all, though, munitions that had been bought before we entered the war. That is, it was bought on contracts between American manufacturers and the Russian Government, and was not furnished by our Government.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was their property?

Mr. LEONARD. It was their property.

Senator WOLCOTT. And not the property of the American Government?

Mr. LEONARD. No.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you have any speakers or preachers there?

Mr. LEONARD. We had them at the Kiev front. They sent 400 men through the lines who could speak the Russian language, and who were to conduct propaganda. Most of the propaganda came from behind the lines, though. There were, of course, many who were fraternizing on the front, but the most deadly propaganda was that carried on behind the lines.

Senator NELSON. Among the soldiers?

Mr. LEONARD. Among the soldiers; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Who were the men who were carrying that on?

Mr. LEONARD. Members of the Bolshevik party.

Senator NELSON. Were there any men who had been in this country?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you know many of them?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I did not.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know who they are, so that you can hand the committee the names of any of them?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I would not know that; and when I say that, it is not of my personal knowledge. I talked with some soldiers who told me that some of these agents had been in New York for a year or two.

Senator NELSON. Where were you when the Kerensky government came into being?

Mr. LEONARD. I was out in Siberia at that time.

Senator NELSON. You were in Siberia?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. When did you go into Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. I went into Russia in August of 1917.

Senator NELSON. That was shortly before the Bolshevik government of Trotzky and Lenine came in?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They came in in November?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Where were you stationed then?

Mr. LEONARD. I was down with some of the troops not far from Kiev.

Senator NELSON. Near Kiev?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Were Russian troops engaged in fighting the Germans at that time?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir. They had practically laid down. A very, very small detachment had remained on the front, but there was no fighting.

Senator NELSON. The soldiers had quit fighting?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. They had organized themselves to control the appointment of officers and run the whole thing? Is not that so?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And refused to fight?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And was not that one of the main causes that led to the fall of the Kerensky government and the advance of the Lenine-Trotzky government?

Mr. LEONARD. The Russians now state that one of the causes of the fall of the Kerensky government was that advance that they attempted in June.

Senator NELSON. They made a successful advance at first?

Mr. LEONARD. For about a day.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LEONARD. But that advance was made by a very few. The only forces that charged were made up of volunteer officers who took rifles, and then the Czecho-Slovak troops. The others refused to advance with them. In many cases they retreated, so that the officers who advanced, and the Czecho-Slovaks, were very badly cut up.

Senator NELSON. Where were you when the acute portion of the revolution broke out, in November?

Mr. LEONARD. I was down near Kiev, 18 hours from Kiev, with some troops.

Senator NELSON. What general violence or anarchy took place there that you observed?

Mr. LEONARD. None took place right there. These troops were half-way loyal, and so they remained quiet; but in Kiev there were two distinct fights, one occurring some time in November, and the other, I think, was in February.

Senator NELSON. Yes. Kiev is in the Ukraine country—the capital?

Mr. LEONARD. The capital of the Ukraine, on the Dneiper River.

Senator NELSON. Who were in possession of Kiev at that time, the Russian forces?

Mr. LEONARD. The Russian forces were in possession; and then the first fight was when the Bolsheviki took the power, and the later fights were between—there were all sorts of fights, the Ukrainian parties wanting the independence of the Ukraine and the Bolsheviki opposing, and it was a very complicated situation.

Senator NELSON. Did not the Bolsheviki stir up and help to organize the so-called Ukrainian Republic?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I think the first Ukrainian party was a party desiring the independence of the Ukraine, and was more of the bourgeois class.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. LEONARD. The Ukrainian movement had been fostered for the last 10 or 15 years in the Austrian part of the Ukraine, in Galicia, and after the government was crushed, the Bolsheviki sent their agents in there, and there is a very strong Bolsheviki party in the Ukraine.

Senator NELSON. And you recollect that at the time the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was formed that the Ukraine had representatives there, and by the permission of Trotsky they were permitted to sign that treaty?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. As I understand it, the Bolsheviki did not desire their presence there, and wanted to carry out the whole thing themselves. However, the Ukrainians sent their delegation and forced—I do not know in what way, but they forced—their recognition there.

Senator NELSON. Where were you when the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was entered into?

Mr. LEONARD. Also down near Kiev.

Senator NELSON. You were still there?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. How long did you remain at Kiev?

Mr. LEONARD. I beg your pardon. I left Kiev the 1st of December, and then—

Senator NELSON. Were the Russians then in possession of Kiev?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. The Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. The Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. The Bolsheviki had gained possession?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Was there any bloodshed or riot when they took possession?

Mr. LEONARD. There were two fights in Kiev, both of which I missed; very heavy fighting. I think the heaviest street fighting occurred in Kiev; as heavy as that which occurred in Moscow.

Senator NELSON. Between what parties, between the Reds and the Whites?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; between the Reds and the Whites.

Senator NELSON. That is, the Bolsheviki and the anti-Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And the Bolsheviki were finally successful, were they?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And got possession of the town?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Was there very much destruction of life and property? Will you tell us what went on there at that time?

Mr. LEONARD. The city was bombarded, and of course there was great destruction of the buildings and many people were killed. I do not think that many were killed after the second day. They did not have anything organized there, and after they got organized there was no more indiscriminate shooting. They would not shoot a man unless they knew who he was.

Senator NELSON. What did the Bolsheviki do after they got control of the city? Did they loot property—confiscate property—commandeer it?

Mr. LEONARD. I think the first thing they did was to levy a contribution of 10,000,000 rubles on the city.

Senator NELSON. Oh, that was the first thing?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. What else did they do?

Mr. LEONARD. They put in their agents and took control of the industries; put their commissars in there.

Senator NELSON. Are you acquainted with any of those commissars?

Mr. LEONARD. No; all I have is what I got in just passing through Kiev several times. It was never my headquarters.

Senator NELSON. Were there any men who had graduated in America, over there?

Mr. LEONARD. I would not know them in Kiev. I had no official communication with them.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I interrupt there, for a question?

Senator NELSON. Certainly.

Senator WOLCOTT. I would like to know what is the purely English word that is the equivalent of "commissar"?

Mr. LEONARD. There is none. It is a term that at first was very loosely applied to any man bearing a commission from the Soviet government. If you are given any job to-day you are called a commissar. Now, they have tried to limit that word to a few people, corresponding with these highest councils. That is, in the government they would have their council and commissars—a few commissars. But that has been without any success. Everybody who has Senator NELSON. It practically means the same as the English word "commissioner," in a general way? We speak of such and such a man as a commissioner, and they call him a commissar. That is it?

Mr. LEONARD. I guess so. They have adopted the terminology of the French revolution, and in some cases they have followed it correctly, but in other cases they have not. For instance, any officer in control of a station we would call a station master; but they would have two men there, a station master who is a railroad man, a technical man, and then they would have a commissar, a member of the committee, a member of the Bolsheviki Party, who would be there to control him and see that he did not do anything against the party—to control his actions. And so in any little place they would have commissars.

Senator NELSON. How big a town is Kiev? How many people has it, about?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know exactly. Its population is over a million, but it has such a large refugee population, varying from time to time.

Senator NELSON. Is it a manufacturing town?

Mr. LEONARD. A manufacturing town to some extent; yes, sir. It is a great commercial town. It is the center of the sugar trade.

Senator NELSON. What did the Bolsheviki do, when they got control of the town, about carrying on the industries or operating; or what did they do in the way of commandeering and taking property over?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know. As I said, I just passed through Kiev several times. I was always going through.

Senator NELSON. Where did you go to from Kiev after that?

Mr. LEONARD. I went to Moscow, and then in January and February I took a trip through the southern and eastern part of Russia, trying to find out if there was an army.

Senator NELSON. Did you go down the Valley of the Don?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir. I went down through Kazan.

Senator NELSON. Down the Volga River?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes. I crossed the Volga and then went to Ufa and down to Orenberg, and then back.

Senator NELSON. Did you go up the Kama River?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Did you go down near the mouth of the Volga?

Mr. LEONARD. At a later time, but not at this time.

Senator NELSON. Down at Astrakhan?

Mr. LEONARD. I was stationed at Astrakhan several months later.

Senator NELSON. How are conditions there?

Mr. LEONARD. In Astrakhan?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LEONARD. The town has suffered a good deal. There was fighting there in February, and so the center part of the town is pretty well burned down. The Bolsheviki are in control, and there is some industry there. Of course, the city is the center of the fish trade, and the trouble is that they can not ship the fish away. The transportation and delivery has practically stopped, so that the town is in bad straits.

Senator NELSON. The country you mention, is not that the country of the Don Cossacks?

Mr. LEONARD. That is the country to the west of the lower Volga.

Senator NELSON. To the west?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; and immediately on either side of the river there is the desert. Some nomad tribes are there with their stock.

Senator NELSON. How big a town is that, again? How many people has it, about?

Mr. LEONARD. I should say about 70,000—100,000.

Senator NELSON. And the Bolsheviki are in possession of that?

Mr. LEONARD. They were at that time.

Senator NELSON. At what other places up north and west of that were you at?

Mr. LEONARD. I was in Samara, Saratov, Tsaritzin.

Senator NELSON. Were those towns in control of the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. Also I was at Ekaterinodar.

Senator NELSON. Did you go as far north as the railroad junction at Viatka?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. That is between Perm and Vologda?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; except when I came through from Siberia and passed through there.

Senator NELSON. Tell us what you saw of the operations of the Bolshevik influence, and how they carried on things there.

Mr. LEONARD. I think the first thing is that the Bolshevik government is a government principally on paper. In Petrograd and Moscow, where they have the most able men in the Bolshevik party, they are able to some extent to make things go, but in the provinces or in any other state aside from those two it is pure chance. They pay no attention to the orders from the center.

I was down at Ekaterinodar.

AFTER RECESS.

(The subcommittee met at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of recess.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROBERT F. LEONARD—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. Are you the gentleman that one witness stated had been imprisoned?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Who imprisoned you? And where were you imprisoned?

Mr. LEONARD. At Tsaritzin.

Senator OVERMAN. What size town is that?

Mr. LEONARD. About 70,000.

Senator NELSON. Which way is it from Moscow?

Mr. LEONARD. Southeast on the Volga River.

Senator OVERMAN. Go on and tell why they put you in jail, how

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know why we were arrested.

Senator OVERMAN. Were there others besides you?

Mr. LEONARD. There was another American vice consul, an interpreter. We had received orders to leave the country. The consuls were leaving from Moscow, and they sent us word to leave. It was impossible to get to Moscow because the river communication had been cut, and the Cossacks had control of the river up above, and so we started south. About 12 hours after we left they sent a boat for us and brought us back. There was a plot to overthrow the Bolshevik government in the town, which was to have taken effect that night, six hours after we left. They discovered this plot and also found about 10,000,000 rubles buried in the ground, and I guess they thought that money had belonged to us. So they took us back. We denied any connection with the government or with the neutral government, or with the local soviet. We were arrested by this extraordinary commission whose purpose was the combating of counter revolution, speculation, and sabotage. We were kept in that place about six weeks.

Senator OVERMAN. You were arrested by soldiers?

Mr. LEONARD. By a commissar with an armed guard.

Senator NELSON. Who was that commissar? Do you know his name?

Mr. LEONARD. No; I do not.

Senator NELSON. Was he a Russian?

Mr. LEONARD. A Russian; yes, sir. There were two. One was a Russian and the other was a Jew. About three weeks later this Jew commissar was himself arrested. He had tried to steal 2,000 rubles from the government.

We were kept there for six weeks, and it was only because a Belgian who was living in that town saw us through the window that they got any word in Moscow. He took word up to Moscow that we were there, and as soon as our consul, Mr. Poole, knew it, he took the matter up with Tchitcherin, their foreign minister, who, to our knowledge, sent down at least two telegrams to this extraordinary commission.

Senator NELSON. The Belgian sent them?

Mr. LEONARD. The Belgian took the word up to Moscow that we were in prison, and then Consul General Poole went to see the foreign minister about our case, and Tchitcherin sent two telegrams, to our knowledge—he may have sent more—ordering them to release us unless they had incriminating evidence against us, in which case ordering that we be sent up to Moscow. They kept those telegrams in Tsaritzin, and it was only when a Danish vice consul came down to take out the French colony—there was a French colony of 50 people there, and the French vice consul had been notified, and he came down to get them out—that he threw a bluff and said that we were under his protection, and took us up to Moscow. We were in Moscow about another three weeks.

Senator NELSON. Were you under arrest in Moscow?

Mr. LEONARD. We were in solitary confinement.

Senator NELSON. At Moscow?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. In what kind of a prison?

Mr. LEONARD. The best one I have ever been in.

Senator WOLCOTT. Also the worst?

Mr. LEONARD. No; we were in four different ones over there.

Senator NELSON. You have not told us about the prison where you were first kept six weeks.

Mr. LEONARD. We were in a big building that had been commandeered for the use of this extraordinary commission. I think the only way you can understand this extraordinary commission is to compare it with the inquisition. It has full powers, and in order to pass the farce along quickly, it combines the functions of the prosecuting attorney and judge, and this building was used as their guard room and barracks for their guards, and the prison.

Senator NELSON. That is where you were kept?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; 14 of us in three little rooms were there for three weeks. Then they took us over to the city jail.

Senator NELSON. What sort of a place was that?

Mr. LEONARD. They put us in a cell that the old régime meant for one person, 6 by 13 feet.

Senator NELSON. How many were in that?

Mr. LEONARD. Five. We were there three weeks, until they took us to Moscow.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you have any bed to sleep on?

Mr. LEONARD. The floor.

Senator OVERMAN. Was it cold?

Mr. LEONARD. No; it was in the early autumn they arrested us, the middle of August.

Senator NELSON. How were you supplied with food? Did you get enough food to eat?

Mr. LEONARD. In the first prison, we had quite a bit of black bread and soup, meat, and potatoes once a day. In the other place they gave us a half a pound of black bread in the morning and a dish of soup at noon and some hot water.

Senator NELSON. And what in the evening?

Mr. LEONARD. Hot water. Then they took us up to Moscow and kept us there three weeks.

Senator NELSON. What kind of a prison did they keep you in there?

Mr. LEONARD. Very good. The rooms were clean and dry, and they had a straw mattress for us.

Senator NELSON. You had plenty to eat?

Mr. LEONARD. The Red Cross—the International Red Cross—sent us in food that had been given out by the American Red Cross. Other than that, we got very little.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you under guard all the time?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. While we were in the first prison, they had guards stationed in the halls. Then when we went down into the city jail the doors were locked, of course, and we were supposed to be taken out for a walk every day—a half-hour walk—but the place was so crowded that we got a walk the first day we were there and the last day. The rest of the time we were locked in the cell.

Senator OVERMAN. You said you were in solitary confinement?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

MR. LEONARD. They gave you a cell in solitary confinement, kept you alone, and you were not supposed to talk with anybody.

SENATOR OVERMAN. You said that you were with three or four other prisoners.

MR. LEONARD. When we were first in Tsaritzin we were all together, but when we were brought to Moscow we were placed in solitary confinement.

SENATOR NELSON. Each man by himself?

MR. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

SENATOR OVERMAN. How did you finally get out?

MR. LEONARD. The Norwegian legation was exerting pressure all the time. But, for one thing, the Bolshevik government wanted us to get out. There was a fight all these months between the Bolshevik government and the extraordinary commission. The extraordinary commission had been created by the central Bolshevik government, and it had tried to assume all the power to itself, and declared that it was under no control; that it was not responsible to anybody. They fought for about six weeks or two months as to that question, as to whether it was to be independent or not. The ministry of the interior maintained that the extraordinary commission was responsible to it, and that if the commission refused to do what it was directed to do it would be made a separate commissariat and have its own people's commissar. This extraordinary commission refused that.

The local soviets were opposed to this extraordinary commission because it had its headquarters in Moscow, and then its branches in every city, and commissioners would come to a city where they did not know the situation, did not know the people, did not know the Bolsheviki, and would start to make investigations, arresting whomsoever they pleased. The soviets claimed that this extraordinary commission should be placed under the control of the soviets; and they also put forth this demand, that before executing a man, the extraordinary commission should report to the soviet, and the soviet could then look into the matter, and, upon application, could demand a stay of execution for 24 hours for further consideration, and if at the end of 24 hours the extraordinary commission wanted to shoot him, they could do so. But the commission refused to entertain that idea, and as I said, when we were in prison at Tsaritzin the Bolshevik minister for foreign affairs, Tchitcherin, telegraphed down demanding our release, and they ignored it.

At the same time in this jail there was a Bolshevik commission that had been sent down to see about bringing out oil from the Caucasus, as there was an oil famine in Russia. At the head of it there was a man who had charge of the distribution of oil in Russia. The oil industry had been nationalized, and he was in charge, and his associate was a man detailed from the commissariat of ways and communications as an expert adviser. In Tsaritzin these members of this oil commission were all arrested. There was some bad feeling between the big Bolsheviki in town and the head of this oil commission, Makrovsky, I guess, and they arrested them. About two days after they arrested them they shot Alexieff, who was the railroad adviser, and his two sons, and about three days after that they received a telegram from Lenine—signed "Trotsky by Lenine"—demanding that Makrovsky and Alexieff be sent to Moscow immediately; that he knew them and would answer for them, and demanded that they be released. They had already shot Alexieff, and they kept Makrovsky there for at least another three or four weeks, just ignoring this order from Lenine. So there was this fight between the government and this extraordinary commission. Finally the government won out, and when the government won out we were released.

Senator NELSON. At Moscow.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Then where did you go from there?

Mr. LEONARD. Then we went up to Petrograd and remained there for approximately two weeks, as the border was closed at that time, and we left Petrograd on the 16th of November.

Senator NELSON. What occurred while you were at Petrograd? What did you see of the Bolshevik government and their operations?

Mr. LEONARD. They had their big celebration, their anniversary of their coming into power. A very interesting thing happened. In the first days of November the Bolsheviki became very nervous and panic-stricken. The situation on the west front before the armistice was signed was such that they knew that the allies were winning, and they were afraid that Germany would be used by the allies, that the allies would join with Germany and march into Russia and overthrow the entire Bolshevik movement, and there were rumors in Petrograd that the Germans were marching on Petrograd, and were already coming. They were just panic-stricken, and the head of the extraordinary commission in Petrograd asked protection of the head of the International Red Cross. That was a very small organization, a new organization which had been established when the American, British, and French Red Cross left. They had formed this International Red Cross composed of the Scandinavian, Dutch, and Swiss, and gave the supplies over to them for the relief of foreign citizens in Russia, and they came and asked permission to carry on their work; and this man was panic-stricken and excited and he said that he would give this permission if they would in return give him safe conduct. So he was under the protection of this International Red Cross, which indicates how panic-stricken they were. Yet the same people a few days before had refused to obey the orders of Lenine.

Then when the revolution broke out in Germany, they were confident that the Bolshevik revolution had come in Germany, and they were going out to lick the world. So they came from this one day when they were absolutely panic-stricken, to two days afterwards when they were very cocky, and then they learned that it was not a Bolshevik revolution and they set about to make it a Bolshevik revolution and telegraphed to Liebknecht that they were sending a trainload of flour to the Bolsheviki in Berlin, and the Bolshevik leaders had daily long-distance communication with the Bolsheviki in Berlin; and then they sent a commission of the ablest agents, the best speakers and best propagandists, into Germany with Bolshevik money.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Leonard, will you tell the committee what you saw during the time that you were confined in these jails with reference to the operations of the extraordinary commission, as to the way they were handling prisoners—that is, disposing of them.

Mr. LEONARD. They went on the theory that any man against whom there was any accusation was guilty until he was proved innocent and they would receive anonymous letters charging, or some one would send warning, that a certain man was engaged in counter-revolutionary activity, and upon that they would arrest him and hold him for months, maybe, before his case would be brought up; and if they had nothing against him they would dismiss him without any explanation. He was guilty until proved innocent. They were very primitive in their methods. I know the first room we were in when arrested we shared with an Italian, who was guilty, all right, but they tried to press the inquiry, and they would take him out about midnight or at three o'clock in the morning and take him and beat him up with their revolvers. He would tell us about it afterwards and show the scars. They were shooting men against whom they had some proof, some of whom undoubtedly were guilty and others were not. They would come in there and say that they were going to call the roll, and that these men were going to be sent off to prison—that they had been tried and were to be sentenced to two, three, or four years in prison—and the next morning the head of the guard, who was quite a friend of ours, would tell us where the bullet went in. Instead of taking them to prison they would line them up against the ditch.

They brought in one workman who was supposed to belong to the social revolutionary party, one of the original socialist parties of Russia, and told him to sit down and write all he knew, for he was to be shot that night. They waited until the next day.

Senator NELSON. Did they shoot him?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Did he have a trial?

Mr. LEONARD. None that we knew of.

Senator NELSON. Was there any trial at which he was present?

Mr. LEONARD. None that I know of. He may have had something in the last hour or so.

Senator NELSON. They tried men without their being present?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

This Makrovsky, this big, very prominent Bolshevik, told me this, and he and I shared a cell for a time. He was fighting with the head of this extraordinary commission.

Senator NELSON. What is his name?

Mr. LEONARD. Makrovsky.

Senator NELSON. What was his other name?

Mr. LEONARD. That was his original name.

Senator NELSON. Did he not have any other name?

Mr. LEONARD. None that I knew about.

Senator NELSON. Go ahead.

Mr. LEONARD. Some people were asked if they knew this man Makrovsky. A whole line of people were asked, "Do you know this man?" They all said, "No." He turned around in a curious way and said, "I know none of these people." And then he asked me, "Suppose one of them had said that he knew me, and the others had all denied it?" I said, "What would have happened if one had said he knew you?" "I would have been shot."

Senator STERLING. What was the charge against this man with whom you shared this cell?

Mr. LEONARD. He was accused of participating in this counter-revolutionary plot. He made this statement. He said that the heads of this commission were degenerates; that they were not typical Russians. I remember that he said the head of this commission was nothing but a degenerate, and that if he ever got to Moscow and he saw him there he would shoot him on the spot, and nobody would say anything to him about it. This man also said that the people in the center did not know what was going on in the provinces; that they had no idea what this commission and people were doing in the various cities and provinces. He said, "Why, if Lenine knew this he would shoot them all."

Senator STERLING. What did he mean by that; namely, that in the various provinces and cities they were not revolutionists?

Mr. LEONARD. He meant this, that these people who belonged to the Bolshevik party, who held the Bolshevik offices, and who were doing exactly as they pleased, were not obeying the orders or the instructions or the spirit of the central government.

Senator STERLING. The central government as represented by Lenine and Trotzky?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; by Lenine and Trotzky. This man Makrovsky had a revolver when he came down there and had a permit signed by the head of the all-Russian extraordinary commission for combat, etc. The local committee took this revolver away from him. He said, "I have a permit here signed by Peters, the head of this commission," and they said, "Do you mean to say that we have no power here?"

Maj. HUMES. Did you ever know Peters? Did you ever come into contact with him?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know whether it is a fact that he formerly was in London?

Mr. LEONARD. I never heard that he was in London. I know his wife still is in London. He speaks English very well.

Maj. HUMES. Is he a Russian?

Mr. LEONARD. A Lett. Most of the extraordinary commission in Petrograd are Letts. I could speak better Russian than most of the extraordinary commission in Petrograd, and that is poor enough. They could not write. They got a list of prisoners there, and when they came in to take them out, they could not read the names, and one of the prisoners would have to stand beside them and read the names.

Senator OVERMAN. They did not give you any trial?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Maj. HUMES. How many constitute that extraordinary commission?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know. The all-Russian commission in Moscow is a very elastic structure, and this man Al Peters is the actual head. There was another man who was supposed to be the head, but Al Peters does all the chair work. It is an extraordinary commission for the government of the state. There are no requirements—no specifications.

Maj. HUMES. Now, Mr. Leonard, during your travels through Russia did you come in contact with actual examples of terrorism and brutality?

Mr. LEONARD. I had been in Astrakhan. I had been sick. Just before I was arrested I came up to Tsaritzin, hoping to get better. During the first days after we were arrested occurred the attempt on the life of Lenine, and just before that two or three of the prominent Bolsheviki had been shot and attempts had been made to kill others, so the Bolsheviki were getting nervous. There was also a plot in Astrakhan to overthrow the government. They had some fighting there, and it was while we were in jail that they received a message from Astrakhan and published it in the official bulletin, that the military commissar there, a man whom I had known and had dealings with, telephoned up and said they had shot 300 officers as retaliation for the counter-revolution plot, and as a retaliation for the attempt on the life of Lenine.

Maj. HUMES. Those were officers of the former Russian Army?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes. That is almost a caste, now. The Bolsheviki just say "an officer" and that classifies him as belonging to that caste.

Then in July, down in Tsaritzin, they were taking out men who were distinctly of the proletariat but who belonged to this other party, the social revolutionary party, as we could see from our cell. We did not know how many they were shooting, but the ditch there in which they were buried grew every night. They were shooting all the time.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know anything about looting; did you come in contact with any of that?

Mr. LEONARD. You can not stop it. When they come in to take a town they just take things.

Maj. HUMES. What did they do with reference to looting houses and going through houses after they had taken a town?

Mr. LEONARD. They do not loot. They say they own all the property of the nation, that it is all public property, and they just take what they want.

Maj. HUMES. All the personal property is the common property of each individual in the nation?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; and then they go in and help themselves. I got acquainted with a Jew who had been in New York who was a commissar down there: I do not know just what kind. His first act on taking office was to distribute all the silk stockings they found there to all the peasant women and working women—to all those who belonged to labor unions or whose husbands did. The Jew was very scared at this time because the Cossacks were coming, and he was going to use his American library card as an American passport to get out.

Senator NELSON. What was his name?

Mr. LEONARD. I can not remember.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see many of these New York and Chicago Bolshevik sympathizers?

Mr. LEONARD. I was in the provinces all the time. People who came over had an opportunity to get the good jobs, and they were in the center.

Senator OVERMAN. They were in with the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you talk to any of them?

Mr. LEONARD. I talked with just this man. That is the only case I knew.

Senator NELSON. Where had he lived in this country?

Mr. LEONARD. In New York.

Senator NELSON. On the East Side?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. His idea in going over there, Mr. Leonard, was that he thought it was going to be a good time, I guess.

Mr. LEONARD. Thought it was going to be a good time. He boasted that he had never done a day's work in his life.

Senator NELSON. A Hebrew?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And had never done a day's work in his life?

Mr. LEONARD. And did not intend to.

Senator OVERMAN. And he wanted to come over to this country and do the same thing.

Mr. LEONARD. No; he was worried about his life, and he was going to come over here where he would be safe.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Lenine? Did you ever see him?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Or Trotzky?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir. It might be interesting to quote this man Makrovsky, a man who ought to know, as he was in the people's council in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Who?

Mr. LEONARD. This man with whom I was in jail, this oil commission man. He said that everybody trusted Lenine—that is, of the Bolshevik party—that everybody trusted and respected and admired Lenine. They admired Trotzky. He is their best orator, the most brilliant orator in Russia to-day, but they have not the same faith in him that they have in Lenine. Lenine, they think, is absolutely honest—he is an idealist, a fanatic, but he is honest—whereas Trotzky is capable and brilliant, but they think he has personal ambitions, and very many of them think that he is getting an army—you see he is the minister of the army and minister of the navy—and that he is trying to make this army loyal to him as an individual rather than to the government, and that he is seeking an opportunity to rise. I just hand that out as the opinion of a very intelligent, educated, and an ideal Bolshevik.

Senator OVERMAN. He is a man of property and yet a Bolshevik?

Mr. LEONARD. He has no property. He is a man of education. He had been a revolutionist all his life, and had been wounded in the revolution of 1905; was a student, I think, in Italy and a student elsewhere, but a man of no property.

Senator NELSON. Trotzky lived in this country for a while, did he not?

Mr. LEONARD. Trotzky has been here.

Senator NELSON. You refer to Lenine?

Mr. LEONARD. I was referring to this man who gave me these data.

Senator OVERMAN. Did Makrovsky tell you what they propose to do—what the plans are of these Bolsheviks?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; he told about their ideals, and all of that. As near as I could compare them. it was to bring into operation the Golden Rule; they had fine ideals. But it was very interesting to see that he changed absolutely there in prison. It was not for fear of personal danger, though there was that—he was not afraid of his life—but he had sacrificed everything for the revolution, that had been his religion, and now the revolution had come and as long as he was in Moscow he was fairly well satisfied, because something was happening there, but the minute he got off in the provinces and saw what was taking place, it was a pathetic sight to see him. His faith was broken, and although he came to prison a Bolshevik, when he left he was a Menshevik, absolutely. He said, "The time is not ripe. We can not put the thing through. It must come by evolution and not by revolution."

Maj. HUMES. Can you think of any occurrences that you have not related along the line of the activities of the Bolshevik government? If so, just proceed and relate them.

Mr. LEONARD. I will try to emphasize this, that Bolshevism is a rule of a minority. The Bolsheviks gained their power in November. They promised peace and bread, and to the peasants land; peace, bread, and land—peace, bread, and freedom. By freedom they meant giving the workman a chance to nationalize industry, to socialize industry, to take complete control, and with those three slogans they captured the Russian Army, and everybody was a good Bolshevik as long as it meant getting his land or getting his factory.

Then when the government tried to take his wheat from the peasant at a fixed price—a much lower price than he could get in the open market—and when the price of manufactured articles was rising every day, the peasant said it was unjust and that this was the government of the factory men. They said, "The first thing they do is to form their committees and lessen their hours of labor, and then they raise their wages and make them retroactive, so that they get this increase of wages for a year or more back, and the result of it is that the prices of goods must rise, and at the same time they are lowering the price of wheat; so we are getting it both ways." That caused the great split between the peasants—the farmers—and the workmen.

Then there was a plan in Petrograd and in Moscow to arm these men and send them down into the provinces to take the wheat by force, which, of course, did not appeal to the peasants.

The peasant is conservative, more conservative than the industrial worker in Russia, and in a local soviet of peasants sometimes they would not elect a Bolshevik soviet, but would elect a social revolutionary soviet, belonging to the social revolutionary party. Then the Bolsheviks would send down and by force of arms would expel that soviet and either restore the Bolshevik soviet or create a new Bolshevik soviet.

But still the conditions did not satisfy them, and so this last fall Lenin put in the program of these committees of the poor. These are committees made up of the riffraff of the peasants, those people who have not any land or have not any property, people that drank up all the money they ever made, people without any ambition. He put them in control of the soviets, or to control the action of the soviets; and so they have a combined function, they are executive and administrative; and, of course, that does not appeal to the peasant.

The peasant wants to elect his committee and have his soviet have the power. Then here come these people, the riffraff, and try to take what they want. I know in some villages they could not elect any committees of the poor because they did not have any poor peasants. Then they would import them from some place.

Senator OVERMAN. Did the officers take any part in this Bolshevik movement?

Mr. LEONARD. Not what you would call regular officers. Some of the students who had always been revolutionary, and who since the war had come through quick training camps, came back in the low grades as commissioned officers, and also some who had risen from the ranks, and some men who saw a chance to make a career for themselves, took part in it.

Senator OVERMAN. Where was the German army while all this was going on?

Mr. LEONARD. The Germans were transferring their army from the eastern front to the western front. During all this time there was hardly any fighting. After that advance of June, 1918, came a retreat, and then fighting practically stopped. There was desultory fighting.

Senator NELSON. And the German troops were sent to the western front.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they fraternize with the Germans at all, while you were there?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. The Germans were encouraging the Bolshevik movement?

Mr. LEONARD. Very much so.

Senator NELSON. Did you see any of these Bolshevik troops?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. I mean the troops of the army.

Mr. LEONARD. Of the Bolshevik army?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Did they have German officers among them?

Mr. LEONARD. None that I ever saw, except in this, that they had what they called international battalions of the red army, made up for the most part of prisoners of war. But there were very few officers among them. There were noncommissioned officers, but very few commissioned officers.

Maj. HUMES. You mean German noncommissioned officers?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. They had this international battalion composed of Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, and Chinese.

Senator NELSON. Did they have any sailors there—Russian sailors?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were they in the Bolshevik army?

Mr. LEONARD. They were at first. But they are not idealists, by any means. They are not fighting for any ideals. The sailors are the roughnecks of Russia. They terrorize. For instance, 30 sailors came to Suma and held up the town, held it for two days, and arrested all the government officials. They went into the port towns of Novorossiisk and other towns, and they told me that when they came to Odessa none of the sailors had less than 40,000 rubles. They had looted the banks. A crowd of 20 to 40 would come into a town and take the hotel and insist they were going to live there. In one town one of the government officials tried to get me a room in the hotel and he could not do it. They did not dare throw the sailors out.

Senator NELSON. These were Black Sea sailors?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. They were all the same, Baltic or Black Sea.

Senator NELSON. Are the Baltic sailors bad?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir: they are more of the regular sailor type. Most of the regular army of Russia was killed, but the navy, of course, did not suffer, so they have the old men, still, men who are not afraid, and who have been harshly treated and are out for revenge and a wild time.

Senator NELSON. What was your experience in getting out from Petrograd?

Mr. LEONARD. Why, there was no experience, except that when the way was open they gave us permission and we went to a Finnish port.

Senator NELSON. Did you have to buy your way across?

Mr. LEONARD. We had to buy our baggage through the customs and have it carted down, and we went out with a Norwegian courier. Between us we had a good deal of baggage, enough to fill a little handcart, and they carried our baggage through the customs, about four minutes' walk, and charged us a thousand rubles, which went to the government employees there.

Senator STERLING. Mr. Leonard, I would like to ask a little more particularly about soviet government in Russia. Can you say about how many of the soviet governments there are in Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. I left there in the middle of November, and there have been so many changes, I can not say.

Senator STERLING. The soviet government is an old institution in Russia, is it not? Even before the revolution, and for a long time, they had soviet governments, had they not?

Mr. LEONARD. Not to my knowledge. They attempted in the revolution of 1905 to establish the soviets of soldiers, sailors, and workmen. When the revolution was overthrown in 1905 of course those soviets were abolished—destroyed—but since then it has been an idea of their own that if they ever had the power they would establish this government of the councils.

Senator STERLING. Coincident with the revolution itself and the overthrow of the Czar, a number of these soviet governments were established there?

Mr. LEONARD. These soviets, these councils, were established, but took no part in the government aside from criticizing. At that time there was a dual government under Kerensky—or rather, the first provisional government—and that was really the Petrograd soviet. The Petrograd soviet wanted to have things done its own way but refused to take the power itself.

Senator STERLING. What is the territorial jurisdiction of these soviet councils or governments? Do they have one for the city?

Mr. LEONARD. On the top they have this all-Russian soviet which meets in Moscow. Then there will be a district of several states which has a district soviet, and then each state will have a state soviet, and each city will have a soviet.

Senator STERLING. What do you call a state now, in Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. One of the old provinces we would call a state. It is a geographical division. They will have a soviet for a state, and then a city will have its soviet, and then a ward will have its soviet; but they are all tied up together.

Senator STERLING. They have the federal supreme soviet, then the district soviets, then the state soviets, and then the city and village soviets?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, and then the agriculturalists will have the county soviets.

Senator STERLING. On the establishment of those soviets were they in the hands of the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Did the Bolsheviki succeed in capturing them later?

Mr. LEONARD. The Bolsheviki captured them by propaganda, and the soviets as first established were more radical than the first provisional government; but at that time they were not Bolshevik, and it was only about in July that the Bolshevik movement got to be serious in Petrograd. Then they were electing their members into these soviets, so gradually by absorption most of the soviets became Bolshevik, and it was only when they found that they had the soviets in this manner that they attempted to overthrow the government. The soviets were not captured by force; it was by absorption.

Senator STERLING. Are there any considerable number of soviet governments or councils not in the hands of the Bolsheviki at the present time?

Mr. LEONARD. At the present time I would say none whatsoever in bolshevik Russia, because such do not exist.

Senator STERLING. What do you understand by bolshevik Russia? I want to know what part of Russia, if any, is not under the domination of the Bolshevik movement?

Mr. LEONARD. The Ukraine, part of it, is not under Bolshevik government. But I see by the papers that the Bolsheviks are advancing into the Ukraine.

Senator STERLING. How about that territory captured by the Czecho-Slovaks and the Little Russian armies in Vologda for 200 miles along the Volga River? Is that under Bolshevik rule?

Mr. LEONARD. I think it is, now. It has been recaptured. They drove the Czecho-Slovaks out of Samara in September, I should say, but for a time the Czecho-Slovaks had control of the Volga River.

Senator WOLCOTT. Would it be a fair statement to say that the Bolsheviki rule over the greater part of European Russia now?

Mr. LEONARD. Without a map it would be hard to say, but I should say it would be a little more than a half. Finland is out, part of Poland, and part of Ukraine. The Caucasus is in, and then the Don Cossacks; so that it leaves Big Russia, what they call Big Russia, in their hands. So I should say it would be pretty evenly distributed; perhaps a little more than half.

Senator STERLING. How about the government in northern Russia, around Archangel?

Mr. LEONARD. Of course, that is not Bolshevik.

Senator STERLING. But they have there the soviet councils, do they not?

Mr. LEONARD. I really do not know—I have never been there—but I do not think so. I think they have some other form of government.

Senator NELSON. That northern part of Russia, north of the Siberian Railroad, around the White Sea and Archangel, and up in that country, is very thinly settled?

Mr. LEONARD. Very sparsely settled.

Senator NELSON. It is a country of vast swamps and heavy timber?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And there are few people there, comparatively?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. The settlement in Russia is south of what you call the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. North of that it is practically what we would call largely a nonsettled country, is not that the fact?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Were you in the northern part at all?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I was not. I gained this information from a British major who was in jail in Moscow with us.

Senator NELSON. Have not some European capitalists built a road up to the Kola Peninsula, on the Murman coast?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. It is 600 or 700 miles long?

Mr. LEONARD. About that distance.

Senator NELSON. Then there is an older road from Vologda up to Archangel?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And a road connected with Viatka, east of that, a station west of Perm?

Mr. LEONARD. I passed through there in July.

Senator NELSON. How did you go out?

Mr. LEONARD. I went by the railroad through Irkutsk.

Senator STERLING. How far east from the European Russian boundary is Irkutsk?

Mr. LEONARD. It is just about half way across Siberia.

Senator STERLING. Where, from Lake Baikal?

Mr. LEONARD. About 40 miles west of Lake Baikal.

Senator STERLING. How about that region in there, is that under Bolshevik rule, along the trans-Siberian road?

Mr. LEONARD. I can not say now, because it is changing so often. Mr. Storey came from there after I did.

Senator NELSON. I think the country from Vladivostok up as far west as Omsk in western Siberia, and perhaps across as far as Perm, is practically under the control of the anti-Bolsheviks, under the control of the Czecho-Slavs, the Japanese, the French, and the English.

Mr. LEONARD. I think that for a time the eastern part, near Vladivostok, and then the Urals, were in the possession of the anti-Bolsheviks, whereas around Irkutsk they were Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. But they have been cleaned out of there. Irkutsk is near Lake Baikal and is the capital of eastern Siberia?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. What has become of the Czecho-Slovak Army that was fighting there and holding for a time the Trans-Siberian Railroad?

Mr. LEONARD. They have had to retreat because they had no support at all. It was meant to serve as a nucleus for a 'Siberian' government, but instead of having one government they had over a hundred there. The army of the Czecho-Slovaks were underfed and underclothed and had tremendous losses, out of 440,000 troops their casualties were 40 per cent, and when no support came they had to withdraw to save themselves.

Senator STERLING. Did you meet Col. Lebedeff?

Mr. LEONARD. No; I did not meet him.

Senator STERLING. You have heard of him? He was very much interested in the Czecho-Slovak Army and helped in the raising of a loyal Russian Army.

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know whether—he was across the line, evidently. We got very little news there. We got news from across the line only once in a while.

Senator NELSON. Part of the Ukraine is now held by the Bolsheviki, is it?

Mr. LEONARD. If you can believe the newspapers, they have taken almost as far as Kiev.

Senator NELSON. That is in the western part of the Ukraine?

Mr. LEONARD. It is in the northeastern part. The Ukraine runs like that [indicating], and it is in the northeastern part.

Senator NELSON. They claim clear from the boundary?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir; but the line runs like that [indicating].

Senator NELSON. How is it with the Cossacks on the steppes back of the lower Volga? Do not the Don Cossacks hold that?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Then that is not under control of the Bolsheviki, is it?

Mr. LEONARD. When I left it was not.

Senator NELSON. That country up around the Dvina River, is that in control of the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. No; that was in control of the anti-Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. So that the center of the Bolshevik power there is in what they call Greater Russia, and a part of Little Russia, and a part of Ukraine. That is about it?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. Its big center is in Moscow. It is an industrial movement. It is a movement of the armed minority of the industrial classes—the factory workmen.

Senator NELSON. So that, roughly speaking, they have got about half of Russia proper under their control?

Mr. LEONARD. It would show approximately a half, I would guess. I would make no definite statement without a map.

Senator NELSON. And they have practically lost control of Siberia?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir. A question has been raised here about food. I would say that there is sufficient food in Russia, provided there could be distribution. In the northern Caucasus there are tremendous supplies of wheat. They have not touched the crops for two or three years back. They have the crops stored there.

Senator NELSON. They have poor transportation facilities?

Mr. LEONARD. Very poor. During the summer they can transport by the river. One railroad was absolutely cut off and the other railroad was cut off a good part of the time; and it is only a single-track road, anyway.

Senator NELSON. Is that railroad from Baku cut off?

Mr. LEONARD. When I was there it was cut off by the hill tribes.

Senator NELSON. That is in the oil fields on the southwest side of the Caspian Sea?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. I believe you said that the Bolsheviki had control of Astrakhan?

Mr. LEONARD. They had when I was there. I see by the papers that the British are supposed to have entered Astrakhan.

Senator NELSON. And a British fleet is outside of Odessa, in the Black Sea?

Mr. LEONARD. So the papers say.

Senator NELSON. That is the principal town in southern Russia, is it not?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. It is their greatest wheat market?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Right face to face with what they call the Black Belt in Russia?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And the country immediately around Odessa is not under the control of the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. How is it down in the Crimea?

Mr. LEONARD. When I was in Russia nobody knew what was happening down there. They had different governments down there.

Senator NELSON. The Bolsheviki did not have control of them?

Mr. LEONARD. That was a part of Ukraine, so the Bolsheviki were not in control there at that time.

Senator NELSON. The country around the north side of the Sea of Azov, that is, where the Don enters into it—

Mr. LEONARD. That is in the hands of the Don Cossacks.

Senator NELSON. And the Bolsheviki have no control there?

Mr. LEONARD. No; they were driven back by the Don Cossacks and by the Germans.

Senator NELSON. The Don Cossacks—that is, the older element—are not with the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. Their loyalty is wavering because they have not any money or supplies.

Senator NELSON. But if they had money or supplies, they would be all right?

Mr. LEONARD. Unless they are all tired. There is that feeling, and there was that split between the Don Cossacks and the younger Cossacks, who had been to the front and came back strongly tainted with Bolshevism. For a time they were widely split, and then they came together. The younger Cossacks wanted their own land.

Senator NELSON. Do you not have an idea, Mr. Leonard, that the outcome will be this, that the Russian peasants and the Cossacks and the remnants of the old Russian Army will by-and-by unite and be able to stamp out the Bolsheviki?

Mr. LEONARD. Provided they can unite. That has yet to be proved. That has been the trouble over there. That has been the reason the Bolshevik party has been able to hold its position, because not of strength of its own but because of the weakness of its opponents.

Senator NELSON. Do you remember the name of that Russian admiral who has assumed control of the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. LEONARD. Admiral Kolchak.

Senator NELSON. He is anti-Bolshevik?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir; very much so.

Senator NELSON. And he seems to have done pretty well lately in the neighborhood of Omsk?

Mr. LEONARD. You get more information about that than I do, because when I was in Russia we got absolutely nothing over there, as to anybody.

Senator NELSON. But you have kept track of the papers since you have come here?

Mr. LEONARD. I gather from the newspapers that he has been a reactionary.

Senator NELSON. Naturally, the tendency of the Cossacks would be toward the conservative side, as toward the Russian side—anti-Bolshevik—would it not?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes. The feeling of the Cossacks was that they would defend their own territory, but they were opposed to invading Bolshevik Russia in order to overthrow the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON. But they would never submit to the Bolshevik government?

Mr. LEONARD. Some of them have done so.

Senator NELSON. They would not allow their lands to be taken away from them?

Mr. LEONARD. Some of them have done so. The trouble in the whole situation was that they would not unite. They would fight among themselves until the Bolshevik party came in, and then when they were powerless and their arms had been taken away they would begin to think about getting together; and eventually they did, but at tremendous cost.

Senator NELSON. Do you not apprehend that ultimately there will be dissension among the Bolshevik leaders, and they will break up into sections?

Mr. LEONARD. They probably will.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LEONARD. That is very probable, except for this, that they are pretty keen men, and they know that their only safety lies in sticking by each other; that the minute they start fighting among themselves, the whole thing falls.

Senator NELSON. Are there many of those Bolshevik leaders that have lived here in this country?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know. In the provinces where I was most of the time there were very few. My friends who have been in Petrograd and Moscow say that there are a great number of them there.

The foreign minister of the Petrograd government is a man who has been in America.

Senator NELSON. What is his name?

Mr. LEONARD. Zorin.

Senator NELSON. What is his real name?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know.

Senator NELSON. Is he a German or a Hebrew?

Mr. LEONARD. No; he is a Russian, so far as I could say.

Senator NELSON. He is a real Russian?

Mr. LEONARD. He is neither a German nor a Hebrew.

Senator STERLING. What is the thought, among those opposed to the federal movement, in regard to allied intervention, and the use of a sufficient military force?

Mr. LEONARD. At first they said "All we need is a nucleus." They said, "Why, with a regiment of American, or British, or French soldiers we could take Moscow. Why not send us just a nucleus?" They could take the town, but they could not hold it, of course. They now no longer asked for such help, but the people I knew wanted the allies to come in and save them. For instance, the Finns were asking for help. But the people I met throughout Russia, as recently stated, had been through the four years of war and suffering, and were apathetic, and they were expecting the allies to come in and save them.

Senator STERLING. With a small allied force they could at one time have taken Moscow and prevented the establishment of the Bolshevik government there?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know about that. With all these counter-revolutionary plots that I saw it was easy at any time to take a city. But what is the use of it? You can not hold it. There is one community there, and all around you are the enemy. You have no way of getting ammunition, and that is the whole trouble. But as to putting a nucleus of a military force there, it has been tried in three places and has not been a success anywhere. They gave them 40,000 to 60,000 Czecho-Slovaks, troops than whom there are no better fighters in the world, and the army did not materialize. The Czecho-Slovaks for several months fought against overwhelming numbers and finally, because of lack of support, had to withdraw.

They tried the same thing down in Baku. They asked the aid of the British to come over from Ensil, which is about 18 hours by boat, and they asked them to send up a small group of British, with British officers and some armored cars, and some guns and ammunition. The British responded. They sent up about 50 officers, if I remember correctly, and several hundred men, and I think were to have about 2,000 men and some armored cars in Baku. They could not hold the town. The people did not rally around them. At the same time that the people were asking aid of the British they were making Turkish flags as well as British flags in their homes, so that they would be ready to hang up the right flag, whichever side won. There came up a small force, and they fought for about two weeks and then had to go back.

The conditions were not very favorable for trying out anything at Archangel, because there were not many troops there, and it seems that the allies had to do most of the fighting there.

Senator NELSON. Where is that?

Mr. LEONARD. Archangel. So that at three different places where it has been tried—two places where it has been tried under good conditions and one place where conditions were not so good—the attempts have failed.

Senator NELSON. So that more than a mere nucleus of an army would be required to maintain order and keep the Bolsheviki in check?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. With the port of Archangel and that post on the Murman coast, on the Kola Peninsula, and with all the ports on the Black Sea under the control of the allies, and also the ports along the Baltic under the control of the British and French fleets, those Bolsheviki are cut off from the sea in Petrograd, are they not?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And will not that ultimately lead to their coming down from the high tree?

Mr. LEONARD. It may lead to it ultimately. But on the other hand, with a population 85 per cent of whom are peasants who have not any very great demands, they can exist on what they have and what they can raise.

Senator NELSON. No; but those industrial workers have got to get raw materials.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. To carry on their manufacturing; and if they do not get to work and earn something, where will they be?

Mr. LEONARD. They will print more money.

Senator NELSON. The last that they got printed was at Leipzig, I believe?

Mr. LEONARD. They may have gotten some there, but now they print it in every town. They have commandeered practically all of the lithographing establishments, and are printing the money.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know a man by the name of Harold Kellock?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I do not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you in position to say what acreage was planted in spring grain and in spring wheat in 1918, as compared with ordinary years?

Mr. LEONARD. The men of whom I asked that question down in the northern Caucasus, which is a very rich country, said that it was about 75 per cent they thought. The big estates have been taken and divided up. On that stretch southwest of Tsaritzin there has been very little planted because of the civil war—fighting all the time. Some was planted, but there was no harvest, as there was fighting all the time. In Tsaritzin, they sent out the women into the fields. They gathered all the women and sent them out to do what harvesting they could behind the armies. I should say that there is no question of shortage—of dire shortage—of grain in Russia, provided they can get it to Moscow and Petrograd; provided they have the transportation necessary, or can stop the fighting to let the trains go by.

I was talking with a man who had been detailed from a Petrograd factory to get some wheat to Petrograd last spring. At that time the railroad was not cut; but his preparations for getting that wheat consisted of a special train, carrying armed men with machine guns.

They had all the cars and orders to get the grain, but they had to have that protection in order to get the grain through to protect it from the other Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. Here is a statement which I will read from a magazine.

Senator STERLING. From what are you going to read?

Senator WOLCOTT. This is from an article written by Harold Kellock in the Good Housekeeping Magazine of February of this year, entitled "Aunt Emmy wants to know who is a Bolshevik, and why." I read as follows:

But in spite of these terrible things the spring planting was done, and a bigger acreage was sown than at any time since the war. The peasants were working for themselves.

Now, he must have referred to the spring of 1918. What have you to say as to the accuracy of that statement?

Mr. LEONARD. I would say, from my knowledge, that it is inaccurate. There are three things opposed to it. In the first place, there has been a lot of civil war—civil fighting. The men were under arms and could not work. In other places where it had been planted the harvest could not be reaped because of the fighting.

Around Samara, which is a fertile place, they could not plant because of lack of seed. The seed was gathered up from old estates and distributed, but because of the famine the peasants took the seed grain and ate it. The fact is that the peasant is a hard-headed fellow. He is not sure who is going to reap the grain that he plants. Under those conditions he does not see any good in putting his money into the grain and the seed and his time into the cultivation of it.

Still another thing is that the peasants have more paper money than they want. They have literally thousands of rubles. Ever since the war started, since the prohibition of vodka, the peasant has been putting money into the savings banks and buying things for his house and buying phonographs. Even in 1916 this was true out in Siberia, that a peasant who had 20 acres, and before that had planted and cultivated the whole 20 acres, was able to make a living and had been making a lot more money than he did before would say, "What is the use of planting 20 acres? I can live just as well if I plant only 10 acres." So that he has been planting 10 acres and letting the other 10 acres lie. Now, the same thing holds much more when his crop is taken from him at a price which he considers unfair, and when at the same time with the money which he is given in return he can not buy anything that he wants. He is paid for his crop in paper money. He does not know who is going to harvest that crop, anyway; so he is going to plant just enough to keep himself.

Senator WOLCOTT. You spoke of one district, I think you said it was down in the Caucasus—

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT (continuing). Where there are abundant quantities of grain now, if they could just transport it?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. In the spring of 1918 was that district under Bolshevik control?

Mr. LEONARD. The district was. The river was in the control, about May, of the Czechs. The central part of the Volga River was in their control. Both the mouth and the source of the Volga are held in the control of the Bolsheviki, but the center was under the control of the Czechs, and they could not get anything past. There was a railroad running from there straight up to Moscow, which ran through the Ukraine, but that was impossible to be used. There is one other road that zigzags up——

Senator WOLCOTT. I am not concerned so much about the transportation problem. I am trying to test the accuracy of the statement of this article that the author puts in this Good Housekeeping Magazine. That is what I am concerned about.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You said that the statement I read was inaccurate?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Confining the statement to that portion of Russia that the Bolsheviki control, would you say that it was just mildly inaccurate or that it was grossly inaccurate?

Mr. LEONARD. I would say that it was mildly inaccurate.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is not a gross misstatement?

Mr. LEONARD. No; my estimate would be 75 per cent. He says more than 100 per cent.

Senator WOLCOTT. No; he does not say that.

Mr. LEONARD. He says more than ever was planted before.

Senator WOLCOTT. At any time since the war.

Mr. LEONARD. My statement is that 75 per cent has been planted. He says over 100 per cent, whereas I have said 75 per cent.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you noticed since you have been home any propaganda of this Bolshevik business going on in this country?

Mr. LEONARD. A week ago Sunday I went up on the north side of Minneapolis, where they advertised a play in Russian by the Russian Slavic Educational Society—under the auspices of that society. It was a little one-act play put on by amateurs, which was a tirade against capitalism and the injustice of capitalism; and after that a man who had been a delegate to the soviet congress in New York came out and delivered a speech in favor of Bolshevism, and rather——

Senator NELSON. Was that in Russian?

Mr. LEONARD. In Russian—and he rather sneeringly spoke of the United States and its President; but it was an out-and-out Bolshevik speech, for he said that the Russians under the Bolsheviki were living far better than they ever had before, and he held up the Bolshevik government as the ideal government.

Senator NELSON. What is his name?

Mr. LEONARD. Gregorin.

Maj. HUMES. Is that his first name?

Mr. LEONARD. No, that is his last name. I think his first name was Alex. The thing that impressed me most was that this audience was fairly well dressed.

Senator HARDWICK. How was he received?

Mr. LEONARD. He received an ovation. The whole audience stood in honor of the fallen heroes. Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg.

Senator WOLCOTT. In this article that I read from a moment ago, I find two paragraphs which are calculated to leave the impression on the mind that the chief leaders in this Bolsheviki movement are animated entirely by a praiseworthy sentiment of love for the nation and desire to educate the people, and that they have no selfish purposes at all to serve. Now, I want to read you these two paragraphs and see if your observations over there were such as to lead you to agree with the impression that these two paragraphs make upon the mind. [Reading:]

Some remarkable personalities have been included among these commissars. They work for workmen's salaries, 600 rubles (about $90) a month, with an extra allowance of 100 rubles for each dependent. Thus Lenine, whose wife is employed in the department of education, gets 600 rubles, and Trotsky, who has a wife and three children, gets 900 rubles. Both Lenine and Tchicherin, the Commissar for Foreign Affairs, come of old well-to-do Russian families. Trotsky is the son of a prosperous Jewish merchant. In Petrograd Trotsky and his family lived in a little garret room in Smolny Institute, the soviet headquarters.

Tchicherin served as a diplomat under the Czar before he became a revolutionary Socialist. While commissar of foreign affairs in Petrograd, he lived in a shabby little lodging house in the working quarter, and members of the American Red Cross mission who had occasion to call upon him at his office would find him transacting affairs of state clad in a soiled sweater and baggy old trousers.

Now, that conveys to my mind the impression that these men were poor men, and, so to speak, hugged their poverty, notwithstanding they were in places of power.

Mr. LEONARD. It is both true and untrue. They are very democratic and do not care how they dress, and they do not care in what kind of places they work. But Lenine in Moscow has good quarters. The Bolsheviki have taken over the best hotel in town and get it rent free. Trotsky lives in the next best hotel. They all have Peerless automobiles, those who have not Packards.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are not living in garrets, then?

Mr. LEONARD. When working they can not keep a room in order; so that this room, after two weeks under Bolsheviki rule, would look like a room in a sweat shop; and in the next room, if there was a press of work, Lenine and Trotsky would live, night after night. So that is true. But they live pretty well, aside from that. As to what he says about their being idealists, and all of that, I think most people in Russia agree that Lenine is actuated entirely by ideal motives. You can not agree with them; but some of the leaders—most of the leaders—are, the people say. But most of their workers, most of their associates, are not idealists. This statement was made to me by a man who had been in Russia, and a man who was supposed to know. He says that 75 per cent of the leaders are honest. They are fanatics, and you can not agree with what they are doing; but 75 per cent of the leaders are honest. But 75 per cent of the men are dishonest.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you in a position to entertain and to express a reliable opinion, to make a reliable statement, as to whether this assertion that they are working and getting only 600 rubles or 900 rubles a month is true. Is that all they are given?

Mr. LEONARD. That is true, officially. It has since been raised because of the high cost of living. Lenine is now getting 1,200 rubles. That was raised by act of law. That is what they are making officially. What some of them get in other ways is hundreds of thousands. Others do not take a cent in that way.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is well known that they are getting a lot on the side?

Mr. LEONARD. Some of them are. Others are not. This man who was in jail with me, Makrofsky, was getting his 1,000 rubles a month, and that was all, and there was absolutely no graft; whereas an old Jewish fish merchant who was down in Navorossisk made himself minister of finance, and it was not many weeks before he sent his wife out of the country with millions.

Senator WOLCOTT. He was not an idealist?

Mr. LEONARD. He was not an idealist.

Senator WOLCOTT. He was not restricted to his 1,000 rubles a month?

Mr. LEONARD. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. Here is this statement [reading]:

For the first time a real school system has been formed, and every child in Soviet Russia goes to school.

Mr. LEONARD. That is the best department they have.

Senator WOLCOTT. The schools are running, are they?

Mr. LEONARD. They are, in a different fashion. Everything is State. They do not allow the private schools or private gymnasias to function any more. They are trying to put on great reforms in feeding the children in the schools, and in playgrounds, and so forth. On the other hand, they put into the faculties of their schools janitors and washwomen, and let them have a vote in determining the curricula of the institutions. They have done away with the requirements for admission to the universities, because they say that works only to the good of the capitalist class. Only those who come from the capitalist class can comply with the requirements; so they say, "We must admit anybody who comes to the university, equally."

They have a big program and are doing things.

Senator WOLCOTT. I was just going to ask, are they doing things?

Mr. LEONARD. In several places they are.

Senator WOLCOTT. In other words, they are teaching the three Rs, and their educational program seems to support their theory, very largely?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; but if I may be permitted to say this here, the thing that this man said in his speech in Minneapolis, this Russian, was that people accused the Russians of being uneducated. "But," he said, "I call that man educated who has class consciousness."

Senator NELSON. Was that at north Minneapolis?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Was it on the east or the west side?

Mr. LEONARD. It was on the west side.

Senator NELSON. Were there many there?

Mr. LEONARD. About 300.

Senator NELSON. What was the character of the people who were there? Were they Russians?

Mr. LEONARD. They are all Russians. The whole thing was in the language. And that is one thing they are trying to do in this school, namely, to inculcate class consciousness.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, carrying out the idea of this revolution, you have told us about one meeting; do you know of any other propaganda in this country?

Mr. LEONARD. No; I know of——

Senator OVERMAN. In magazines and papers?

Mr. LEONARD. None; except that the New Republic print. it seems to me, is as one-sided as the stuff of the so-called tools of capitalism print.

Senator OVERMAN. This article from which Senator Wolcott has read here, does not that sound a little bit like it might be——

Mr. LEONARD. It seems to me too optimistic. The trouble is that a good many of these writers go to Petrograd and Moscow and meet the most intelligent Bolshevik leaders, who make themselves very nice to them, and they can make a very good impression, because they are educated. They talk about this great ideal, and nobody can oppose them. Then those people come home and say that it is a fine program. I know one magazine writer that came over there and was personally conducted through some of the prisons, and came out in an article saying that the prisons were better than they had been, and were not bad. Well, I was never personally conducted around, but the only good things that I saw were what was left over from the old régime, in the prisons.

And this same writer met Al. Peters, "one of the nicest men she ever met." He was assigned as interpreter for the Bolsheviks. He was a man who was shooting people without trial all the time.

Senator NELSON. He was the lord high executioner?

Mr. LEONARD. He was the man who told the Norwegian attaché that he was going to shoot us. He said that we were all counter-revolutionists. He said that without looking at our papers. When we got back these papers had not been touched.

Senator NELSON. He was the kind of man that Byron speaks of in his poem "The Corsair," of whom he says:

He was the mildest-mannered man that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat.

[Laughter.]

Senator OVERMAN. Their government looks pretty good on paper, but their actions do not correspond with their theory. It was testified here this morning that these fellows feel that they have a right to do as they please and take what they please, and do as they please generally. Do you believe that?

Mr. LEONARD. Do I believe in that?

Senator OVERMAN. Do you believe that that is so?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; that is their program.

Senator NELSON. Did you come across Albert Rhys Williams over there?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. You never met him?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir; I knew that he was there; but, as I say, I was in the provinces most of the time.

Senator NELSON. Did you know anything of his activities?

Mr. LEONARD. Nothing; no, sir.

Senator NELSON. You lost a good deal.

Mr. LEONARD. I guess I did.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know anything about their program looking forward to socialization of women?

Mr. LEONARD. I was in Samara at the time that came out in the papers, and I have in my possession, some place, their placards denying that. They say that is not true. They say that was put up by the counter-revolutionary element in order to discredit them, and that it was done by a group of anarchists who have since been arrested by the Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether that placard was put up in their buildings; or have you knowledge of that?

Mr. LEONARD. I have no knowledge on that subject. It was not put up in other places where I had been.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was that the only thing you saw over there that indicated, or that gave any justification for the idea, that the so-called program for the socialization of women was in their minds? Was that the only piece of evidence you saw?

Mr. LEONARD. That was the only piece of evidence I saw. They are aiming toward free love. They are doing away with the marriage ceremony, and they have, of course, adopted a civil ceremony; and in some places they have it for a term of years.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want your opinion on that, because this writer winds up with an article and says that after all the test of it will be this, "How will it affect the babies of young married folks, and folks who do not get along very well?" You say this is a part of the doctrine of these leaders, that they want to reform the marriage relation and make terms of years for the married state, and inaugurate free love?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; that is in their program.

Senator OVERMAN. How did you find their morals there, among the men and women?

Mr. LEONARD. They have a different moral standard from what we have in America.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they bad?

Mr. LEONARD. They have more of the oriental attitude.

Senator NELSON. That man, Maxim Gorky, I believe his name is, whom they have taken into the fold, is about as immoral as they can make them.

Mr. LEONARD. There was great rejoicing when he came back to the fold.

Senator NELSON. He is bad enough to leaven the whole Bolshevik mass.

Mr. LEONARD. I do not think they need much leavening.

Senator OVERMAN. But they rejoiced when he returned?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. He was over here in New York for a while.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who is his assistant?

Mr. LEONARD. ————.

Senator WOLCOTT. Commissar of education?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes. For a time he withdrew from them and was bitterly opposed to them, and scattered editorials against them. and then he came back.

Senator NELSON. My recollection is that he was over here in New York a while. and that he left the country in disgrace, because they did not approve of his having a bereft wife with him.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know anything about their taking over a lot of young girls in a seminary and putting the Bolshevik soldiers in with them?

Mr. LEONARD. I never knew of that.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there anything else, Major?

Mr. LEONARD. I will say that the program and the spirit of the Bolshevik party is directly opposed to religion and to what we know as the home.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is their argument for declaiming against the home?

Mr. LEONARD. They say the home does not give the children a fair chance. They have not had a happy home experience, and those who have lived in the poorest quarters say it does not give everybody a fair chance; that everybody ought to start equal, and the children ought to be taken and put in government institutions and given the same education. They say this has grown up from capitalism: that true love does not enter into marriage; that now it is a system of barter for social position and for wealth, and all of that, so they are going to have love, and provide for the children in government institutions.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is to say, the children will not grow up in home surroundings?

Mr. LEONARD. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. If they carry out their program, then, the future men and women will have no recollection of home life or of the home fireside, with their parents there.

Mr. LEONARD. No; they are opposed to that.

Maj. HUMES. The theory is that the children are to be taken care of by the State.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. They are to be nationalized?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Yes; nationalized in that way.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And they do not believe in marriage, because it is a part of the creed of the capitalist class, is not that it?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Are they in favor of divorce?

Mr. LEONARD. It is very easy to divorce.

Senator OVERMAN. They do not have to go to Reno? They have no Reno?

Mr. LEONARD. No.

Senator NELSON. You do not have to go into court to get a divorce. The man just makes a declaration or writing to the woman and says, "I divorce you," and that is all there is to it.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Has the woman the same right to say that she divorces the man?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. So the women have got equal rights over there?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you think, Mr. Leonard, that these principles appeal to the ordinary Russian peasant very much, or is this the doctrine of the leaders who are preaching it?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not think that it appeals to the Russian peasant; but the unrest has come from the peasants who have been abroad in the industrial cities in Russia, where they have had poor surroundings and have been ill paid, and where the propaganda has been going on among them for years, and they have been taught that they are the degraded class, the exploited class, all of them. So there is where the trouble is coming from, and from the industrial workmen, rather than from the peasants. The peasant had one need. The peasant really needed land, and wanted it, and when he got land he was satisfied.

Senator NELSON. They have one advantage now, that they do not have to go to Nevada or any of these western cities to get a divorce. They can get it at home.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What about the churches? Do they attend their churches?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; the peasants still attend the churches. But the church, of course, has been disestablished, and the Bolsheviki are carrying on an endless propaganda against the priesthood, against the clergy, and they are playing up everything they can against the clergy, and they publish that in the papers.

Senator OVERMAN. Can you give any reason for that?

Mr. LEONARD. To discredit the church because the church has been a department of the state. It has been a very conservative influence and has not given the spiritual leadership to the people that the people needed. They call that party opposed to the church the Black Hundred.

Senator WOLCOTT. I suppose they recognize the psychological fact that if they can destroy the faith of any people they get the people into a condition where they can overthrow anything they want to overthrow?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; and that is just it. The peasant did not know what he was fighting for in this war. He was fighting for one reason, because the Czar told him his duty called him; and the Czar and the church were very closely united, and when the Czar was overthrown most of their faith fell away. If now the Bolsheviki can discredit the church, the poor peasant is absolutely helpless. He has nothing to cling to.

Senator WOLCOTT. He is driftwood, so to speak?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. He must move the way his leaders want to move him?

Mr. LEONARD. Absolutely.

Senator NELSON. The Russian Church was the backbone of the old Government, and was the one connecting link that kept the peasants attached to the Government, was it not, to a large extent?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir; to a very great extent.

Senator NELSON. Has the church lost the influence that it had in the past?

Mr. LEONARD. It has lost its influence among the industrial classes.

Senator NELSON. But among the peasants?

Mr. LEONARD. The peasants still go to church. Where their priest has been bad, they have gotten a new priest there, but they have not turned against the church, and even as late as August there was a decree gotten out prohibiting the hanging of icons in any public building or any building belonging to the state. Before the war with Germany, in every building there was a little icon hanging up in the corner. Down in the department of the Bolshevik Cossacks they still had all their icons hanging up, because they said they were called for. The soldier commissar tried to make them put them out, and they said they could not do it, for if the Cossacks believed that they were anti-Christian they would not have their support at all.

Senator NELSON. In the great chaos that prevailed after the death of the imbecile son of Ivan the Terrible there was an interregnum of 29 years in Russia, and it was through the church that they finally gathered themselves together and elected Michael Romanoff as the Czar, supplanting the old line of rulers, and it was through the church that they succeeded in rallying the new government together. Now, do you not believe that in the present emergency the church will be a great help—

Mr. LEONARD. I have faith to believe—

Senator NELSON (continuing). In the rallying and gathering together of the Russian people against this Bolshevik system?

Mr. LEONARD. If the church can help itself and produce a leader who can unite Russia.

Senator NELSON. You recollect that in the French Revolution they attempted to destroy all religion, and the church altogether, but they failed in it; and they will fail here in making war on the Russian Church. Do you not think they will?

Mr. LEONARD. That is my opinion.

Senator NELSON. The peasants and the church and the Cossacks and the conservative element will get together, and inside of six months they will eliminate that Bolsheviki crowd?

Mr. LEONARD. Once they can all get together. That is the question.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Leonard, how many of this middle class—the bourgeoisie, as you call them—have fled Russia on account of this terrorism?

Mr. LEONARD. I could not estimate it, but a great number. These Scandinavian countries are filled with them. They have not fled Russia, but fled Bolshevik Russia. Kiev was crowded with them, and Rostov, and the territory of the Don Cossacks; and then, to a somewhat smaller extent, the northern Caucasus, after the anti-Bolshevik forces cleared out of the place.

Senator OVERMAN. When you left there what was the difference in the population of Moscow from what it was when you first went there?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know about Moscow. I was brought up under guard.

Senator OVERMAN. How about Petrograd?

Mr. LEONARD. Petrograd has a population of about half a million now.

Senator OVERMAN. How much had it in normal times?

Mr. LEONARD. Away over a million.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been stated here that it was nearly 2,000,000.

Mr. LEONARD. Yes.

Senator NELSON. In normal times it had about 2,000,000?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes; the population was told me by several men.

Senator NELSON. At Moscow they had about 500,000 or 600,000 in normal times?

Mr. LEONARD. I do not know. I should say the population was larger than that.

Senator STERLING. What has become of some of the revolutionary leaders there—the leaders in the Duma at the time of the breaking out of the revolution—like Miliukoff?

Mr. LEONARD. Miliukoff was down in the Ukraine, down in Kiev. One was down with the Don Cossacks, with Gen. Krostoff. I understand they have scattered around. Another remained in the northern Caucasus.

Senator OVERMAN. What became of these great generals?

Mr. LEONARD. Brussiloff was wounded, while lying in bed, by street fighting. Alexieff died last August, and Demetrius—

Senator OVERMAN. What became of Brussiloff?

Mr. LEONARD. He was wounded, and I have heard the rumor that he has since been killed.

Senator OVERMAN. What became of Korniloff?

Mr. LEONARD. He was killed.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is Kerensky?

Mr. LEONARD. He is over in England some place, is he not?

Senator OVERMAN. How about Nicholas—what became of him?

Mr. LEONARD. He was down in the Crimea when the Ukraine was taken by a force of Germans and Austrians. I think he is still in the Crimea—still in Kiev. The Germans said they were going to take him a prisoner of war, but he was in the Crimea at that time. Since that I have heard nothing.

Senator NELSON. What became of Nicholas?

Mr. LEONARD. The grand duke? He is the man I was just speaking of.

Senator OVERMAN. He was one of the greatest generals the war has produced, in my opinion.

Senator NELSON. Yes; he was a great general.

Senator OVERMAN. What has become of these first revolutionary leaders?

Mr. LEONARD. They have gone down to these other regions which I have named, where the class is bourgeois. Some have gone out into the Scandinavian countries, but very few. There are none of them in power. Many of them are in Siberia.

Senator OVERMAN. The banks have all been taken over, have they not?

Mr. LEONARD. The banks have all been nationalized, and all the private banks have been reopened as branches of the national bank. When I left all bank deposits had been arrested; and then for a time you could get out 100 rubles a month on check, which was later raised to about a thousand rubles a month by check. and then the people objected to that. Of course there were no deposits under such conditions, and then they put in a condition that of any money you deposited after a certain date you could draw as much as you wanted. Then people deposited money, but when they tried to draw it out the banks said they did not have any money, which was the truth.

Senator OVERMAN. I suppose everybody that had money on deposit took it out?

Mr. LEONARD. Most of them could not get it. The turnover came too quick.

Senator NELSON. They commandeered all the money?

Mr. LEONARD. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you hear any talk there about doing away with all money and not having any money at all?

Mr. LEONARD. No; but they might as well do something like that, because the present money does not amount to anything. In each little district there are a dozen making counterfeit money. Some of it is made in Austria, some is made in Germany, and a great deal is made in Russia itself.

Senator NELSON. No specie circulates there?

Mr. LEONARD. No, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Gentlemen, I have here for the record—I do not know whether you want it all read or not—an excerpt from the official Bolshevik newspaper detailing their state budget for the second half of the year 1918, showing that the total amount of expenditures of the Republic for 1918 is estimated at 48,000,000,000 rubles, or about $23,000,000,000. Do you care to have it all read?

Senator OVERMAN. No; just put it in the record.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

THE STATE BUDGET FOR THE SECOND HALF-YEAR 1918.

The work in connection with the drawing up and examination of the budget of the Republic for the second half of 1918 and the general balancing of same has been completed.

The total amount of State expenditures for the current half-year is estimated at 29,000,000,000 (17,000,000,000, or 70 per cent above the previous half year). The total amount of expenditures of the Republic for 1918 is estimated at 46,000,000,000 rubles.

The first place, in proportion to the amount of expenditures, is occupied by the military commissariat, the total amount of the expenditures of which is set at 9,500,000,000 (7,700,000,000 ordinary expenditures and 1,700,000,000 extraordinary). Comparing this with the total for the first half-year (5,800,000,000), the expenditures of the commissariat increased by 3,700,000,000, that is 63 per cent.

The second place is held by the expenditures in connection with the organization of economic and trading conditions of the State and the exploitation of the State enterprises. The expenditures are distributed among the departments as follows: To the commissariat of ways of communication and the chief management of waterways is apportioned 4.2 billion rubles; to the committee of the State constructions—1 billion; to the Supreme Council of State Economics—1.6 billions; and 800,000,000 for operating expenses and for the cover of excess expenditures in connection with the nationalization of enterprises. The total amount of expenditures of this character entered in the budget is estimated at approximately 8,000,000,000 (27 per cent of the total amount of expenditures).

The following place in the budget is occupied by the expenditures for educational purposes. In comparison with the first half-year the apportionment for the commissariat of national education is 5 times greater and is estimated at 2.4 billions (against 0.5 billion for the first half-year.) In general the total amount of expenditures for educational purposes reaches 12.5 per cent of the total budget.

The fourth place in the budget (10 per cent of the budget) is occupied by expenditures which are created by the extraordinary economic conditions of the nation, i. e., expenditures for organization of food supply. For this purpose, according to the estimate of the commissariat of food supply, the latter is apportioned for the current half year 3.1 billions—that is, two and one-half times more than in the first half year.

Especially noteworthy, in comparison with the budgets of previous years, are the separate estimates for health conservation, social insurance, regulation of labor and insurance of same, fire insurance, and for work in connection with different nationalities. The total expenditures, according to these estimates, equal 1,000,000,000 (3.5 per cent), having increased five times in comparison with the amount of the first half year.

Other departments in proportion to their expenditures are as follows: The Commissariat of Finance, 1.2 billions; the Commissariat of Interior, 618,000,000; the Commissariat of Justice, 236,000,000; State Control, 64,000,000; the Central Statistical Department, 48,000,000; the Commissariat of the Property of the Republic, 40,000,000; the all-Russian central executive committee of soviets, 32,000,000; and, finally, the last place is occupied by the Commissariat of Foreign Relations, with an apportionment of 5,000,000 roubles.

With all its advantages the budget has vital defects, namely, its deficit; the total of State revenues for the second half year is estimated at about 12.7 billion rubles. Consequently the difference between the expenditures and the revenue is above 16,000,000,000. Taking into consideration the fact that out of the 12.7 billion rubles of the State revenue, 10,000,000,000 rubles are derived from special taxes, that the ordinary revenue of 2.7 billions is only approximately estimated, and that according to the first half year the income does not come up to expectations entertained when compiling the budget of revenues, the deficit of the budget appears to be still of a most serious character.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROBERT M. STOREY.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. Where are you from?

Mr. STOREY. Urbana, Ill.

Senator OVERMAN. How long have you been back from Russia?

Mr. STOREY. I got back in August.

Senator OVERMAN. How long were you in Russia?

Mr. STOREY. About a year and four months.

Senator OVERMAN. What position did you hold over there?

Mr. STOREY. I went over as the representative of the American Young Men's Christian Association. I was in European Russia for about eight months and in Siberia for the balance of the time, in charge of the work there.

Senator OVERMAN. Go on and state in your own way the conditions over there.

Mr. STOREY. The impression made upon me when I went into Russia was cumulative, to the effect that we were entering a country which had been very seriously worn out by the war. The conditions in Siberia were not so bad.

Senator NELSON. Did you enter from the Siberian end?

Mr. STOREY. I entered from Vladivostok.

Maj. HUMES. Where were you with reference to the revolution? Was it before the Bolshevik revolution?

Mr. STOREY. It was after the March revolution, yes; but as you got further into Russia it became more and more apparent that you were in a country that had been at war and the resources of which had been seriously drained.

Entering Moscow early in November, I was there during the struggle between the cadets and the supporters of the Kerensky régime generally against the Bolshevik movement. The fighting there lasted for about a week. It wavered back and forth. Troops which were brought in from the outside to help support the government were in almost every case turned to the support of the Bolshevik group, and finally, about a week after the fighting started, and after considerable damage was done and perhaps 2,000 lives had been lost, the Bolsheviks were able to take command of the city.

Senator STERLING. What influences were brought to bear on those troops to win them over to the support of the Bolshevik movement?

Mr. STOREY. My judgment there is that they probably had been won over before they were brought into reach of the city. Certainly the morale of the entire Russian Army had been thoroughly rotted out long before any American visitors reached Russia. My own judgment is that the damage had already been done before the first revolution took place, and that at no time, probably, after the fall of 1916 was there any expectation that the old army could be rehabilitated and made into an effective fighting force for any of the causes or appeals which could then be made to them. Certainly at no time after the Young Men's Christian Association became active in the field was there any such opportunity.

Senator STERLING. That disaffection among the troops at that early time was due to Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. STOREY. No; it was not, altogether. It was due to the circumstances of their life. They were poorly armed, poorly equipped, and they did not know why they were fighting or what they were fighting for, particularly after they had lost confidence in their leaders, as they did. The stories of corruption of the old régime during the war almost paralleled anything that I have met with since. The fall of Riga, I have heard it said many times, was the result of a dicker for millions of rubles' worth of supplies.

Senator STERLING. The old régime having fallen and the Czar having been deposed, did not the troops have faith in Kerensky?

Mr. STOREY. No; I think not. At one time it seemed as though he might rally them. No part of Russia wanted to fight after the revolution. A certain part of it felt under obligation to do so, but I have not encountered any enthusiasm in any part of Russia for continuing war.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear anything of the failure of Kerensky in the matter of discipline? Did he not relax the army discipline to such an extent that it aided this Bolshevik sentiment?

Mr. STOREY. I have heard two sides to that. One was that the provisional cabinet was responsible for that famous edict, No. 1, which did relax the discipline, and the other was that it was a spurious document that had been sent out and which they did not have the courage to combat quickly enough.

Senator STERLING. The soldiers got to understand that they did not have to salute their superior officers?

Mr. STOREY. Certainly; that was true.

Senator STERLING. And claimed that they stood on the same footing exactly as an officer?

Mr. STOREY. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. And were entitled to the same privileges and the same accommodations and everything?

Mr. STOREY. They did not go to that extent all at once, but that was a gradual development as they felt their power. The tendency, as they became familiar with their officers, was to become more so.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been said here that the Bolsheviki had great antipathy to the Young Men's Christian Association. Why was that?

Mr. STOREY. Their attitude toward the Young Men's Christian Association, I should say, was twofold. I ought to say that up to the time the Young Men's Christian Association definitely allied itself with the Czechs, it was tolerated in Russia and was permitted to do considerable work, and was given some facilities for its work; but there came a time when, owing to the fact that it was working also with the Czechs who were fighting the Bolsheviki, they demanded that it make a choice. As a matter of fact, I think that choice never actually had to be made, because the American Government ordered its subjects out of Russia; but certainly the association was on the eve of having to make such a choice. The two reasons are, in the main, these, that owing to their past knowledge and conception of Christianity as exhibited in the Russian Church, an instrument of the old régime, they were anti-Christian. To them that was what Christianity represented. The second reason was that they were suspicious that the American Young Men's Christian Association was in Russia for the purpose of assisting to keep Russia in the war, and was an instrument of the American Government and the capitalistic groups who supported the association in helping to restore the morale of the Russian Army, and the soldiers did not want that, nor did, of course, the Bolsheviki care for it; and I think it would be truth to say that the utterances of some of the association leaders as to the reasons for sending men to Russia and for sending men to make the effort there were that it was in order to hold the Russian Army on that front. Whether those utterances ever reached Russia or not I do not know. Certainly we had that to combat constantly.

Senator OVERMAN. When was it that you left Russia?

Mr. STOREY. I left there the last of November.

Senator OVERMAN. After the signing of the armistice?

Mr. STOREY. Yes; after the signing of the armistice. I was in Siberia the latter part of the time I was there.

Senator OVERMAN. Can you go on and give us your judgment of the condition of things over there, the terrorism, and so on?

Mr. STOREY. In the main, I think I could summarize the situation, as I looked at it, substantially as follows. May I preface that by saying that my interest was rather that of a student of the Government, because that has been my teaching field, and I was interested in it from the standpoint of politics and political science as much as any other. During the time that I was in Russia I spent some time in Moscow, some time with the troops, and some time in Petrograd. I was in Finland during the revolution in Finland and during the period of the German occupation there. I was back in Russia and in Petrograd some time after the allied embassies left it, and in Moscow at the time of the peace conference, and have been in Siberia with the Czechs during the greater portion of their stay there, and was there prior to their arrival a short time.

In my dealings with the Bolshevik leaders I have generally had a courteous and, I should say on the whole, a frank reception and treatment. There was that satisfaction in dealing with them, in the main. If you were at the source of authority, they did not mince words about what they would do or what they would not do. One of them told me frankly that they were tolerating our activities until they would be able to take over that kind of work. They did not propose to tolerate us any longer. One of them said frankly that they were anti-Christian, and said why, pointing to the past history of the Russian Church as an illustration.

I think this is a reaction, from talking with them and reading their pamphlets and their papers, and hearing them speak. They aspire, undoubtedly, to a world-wide rule of the proletariat. They do not stop at means which it is necessary to employ in order to achieve those ends, but on the other hand, there is this to be said, in part, for that. They have lived under a régime which knew no exceptions to the processes by which it attained its purposes, either, and I am disposed to think that a great many of the excesses and the outrages which undoubtedly took place were the result of nervousness on the part of untrained and ill-disciplined soldiers, or of armed groups, from an army many units of which were disbanded with their arms. Many of these soldiers wandered about over the country for weeks. They did not know where they were and did not know how to get to their homes. It was also true that a great many of the men who took up with the Bolshevik movement were poor adventurers, unscrupulous, and went in on it because that was the way the tide was running.

Senator STERLING. Did not that class of men have a good deal of influence among the poorer classes?

Mr. STOREY. Undoubtedly. There were some very clever men among that group. A great many of the old secret police, I have heard, were actually in this movement, men of training and men of influence, although I know that a great many of the men who are in the movement are idealists of the most sincere type.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Trotsky?

Mr. STOREY. No; I did not. I have heard him speak. I do not know him personally, however.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the character of his speech? What did he preach?

Mr. STOREY. Well, he was making an address to a company of about 400 Lettish soldiers who were quartered in a prince's palace or clubroom in Petrograd, and the speech was largely inspirational.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he a fine talker?

Mr. STOREY. Yes; he is a rather striking man to see, and certainly a very impressive speaker. I, of course, had the extreme disadvantage, which a great many of us had, of having to hear him through an interpreter, and that is not always an accurate and satisfactory method of getting the substance of what is said.

Senator STERLING. In talking with those leaders, Mr. Storey, and with the more intelligent of them, did they seem to have the idea that they could form a permanent society and government on the class principle, in which the proletariat should rule alone, without reference to what they termed the bourgeoisie, the tradesmen or middle-class people?

Mr. STOREY. Their conception, of course, of social organization was radically socialistic, and while I got the impression from them that for the present their attitude toward these groups was uncompromising, yet in theory they did recognize differences in ability between men. They would not under normal circumstances, I think, have objected to a teacher soviet, for example; in fact, they had one in Vladivostok when I reached there, and it sent its delegates to the assembly of the city just as did the ditch diggers and the factory workers, and other groups of workers. I do not have personal knowledge of the facts, but I understand that there has since been made a classification of workers which recognizes that there are some people who must do inside work, so to speak, chair work—that is, work of a sedentary character. They recognize, in other words, brain work, although it is not permitted to claim thereby a larger proportion of the total production of society. Does that answer your question? I think there is no question that they had that idea.

Senator STERLING. The three classes which the Soviet constitution recognizes, as I understand it, are the laborers, the peasants, and the soldiers.

Mr. STOREY. Those are all members——

Senator STERLING. And they further declare in that constitution that no one belonging to the bourgeois class, the traders, or anyone making a profit on any investment or receiving an income from investments, shall participate in an election, or be elected to any position or office.

Mr. STOREY. Substantially, I think that is their attitude to-day.

Senator STERLING. They do not say that their government is a democracy.

Mr. STOREY. Oh, no. I would say that it was quite a shock to me that I did not meet in Russia anyone, high or low, who had been in the United States, Bolshevik or non-Bolshevik, who cared to see American civilization duplicated in their own country. There was a very unfavorable impression as to our Government on the part of Russians that I met with.

Senator STERLING. They really do not believe in representative government; is not that true?

Mr. STOREY. Their objection was not so much to our representative system as to our industrial system.

Senator STERLING. Well, if carried out into government, politically, they did not believe in a government that would represent other than these three classes?

Mr. STOREY. Their expectation is that they will soon reduce all to those three. They are, for example, achieving that purpose. Undoubtedly certain sections of the middle classes are having to sell themselves to the soviets. Men with brains and wits are hiring out in order to live. I saw officers sweeping the streets. I have seen refined women selling newspapers. Their quarrel is not with the ability, but with the utilization of that, as they feel it does deprive others of something.

Senator OVERMAN. They have no respect for the educated lady of property?

Mr. STOREY. She is forced into this, not by physical violence, as I know, but by necessity. If the funds of a doctor's household or a lawyer's household run out, they have to get out and make their living.

Senator OVERMAN. They have to do manual work?

Mr. STOREY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Well, if they desire to or find it necessary to utilize those who are educated and who are intelligent, do they recognize any proportionate reward for services of that kind?

Mr. STOREY. They would claim, I think, that the reward should be substantially equal.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me understand that. May I ask a question? I can understand things in concrete terms better than in any other way. Let me see if I understand that proposition. Is it this, that some lazy fellow who is just driven to make a slight contribution in the way of work, who will not improve himself in anywise, who does not care whether he lives in a pig pen or a comfortable home, but yet does a little work, gets as much for it as a hard-working, conscientious, frugal individual?

Mr. STOREY. Well, in practice that is the way it would work out. In theory, they do not recognize the human element in it.

Senator WOLCOTT. They go on the theory that everybody does his best and everything should be equal, overlooking the fact that some who are forced will not do their best, but will do as little as they can.

Mr. STOREY. I have heard it said that it was not necessary for any man to work until his back ached; that enough could be produced without that. I have heard that remark in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to ask you a question that I have asked others. To what extent have you noticed anything of a Bolshevik movement in this country? Have you observed anything going on in this country as propaganda?

Mr. STOREY. I have not taken particular notice of it since I returned, because I have been here on a rather highly specialized mission, and have concentrated upon that. I have noticed in the circulars and other articles a keen and active desire to know about it. Invariably, wherever I go, I am questioned about it. As for evidences of organized activity, I simply have not encountered it, if it exists, probably because I have not been circulating.

Senator STERLING. Have you seen any of the publications made by the I. W. W., or under the auspices of the I. W. W., in this country, and do you know from them how they regard Bolshevism?

Mr. STOREY. No; I have not. I met a former I. W. W.—I believe in Siberia—who said he had been in the lumber camps of the West. He was apparently not as extreme as some of the gentlemen who are in authority over him. But my impression about the relation between the I. W. W.'s and the Bolsheviks from the other side was this: The Bolsheviks were appealing to all discontented elements in other countries, irrespective of who they were. Beyond that I would not be able to make any direct connection between them.

Senator OVERMAN. They have the same flag?

Mr. STOREY. They recognize in them a protesting element—something in common.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Storey, did you see any of the terrorism in Russia for the purpose of perpetuating control, at any of the places where you were?

Mr. STOREY. I saw two sides of it. It was equally evident, I think, in Finland, where the reds had control, and on the other side of the line where the whites had control. I can not say that I have a feeling that any one group of the Russian population is more ferocious in its attitude toward the other than another group is.

Maj. HUMES. In other words, a state of civil war existed?

Mr. STOREY. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Everyone is armed, and they are fighting ad libitum.

Mr. STOREY. Russia demobilized 7,000,000 men within a short period of time, and those men took their arms with them in a great many cases, thousands, tens of thousands of them, and how much of the terrorism that exists is due to the want of a strong central authority, and how much of it is due to deliberate planning, I can not say; I do not know.

Senator OVERMAN. We want to hold an executive session for an hour. We will excuse you.

(Thereupon, at 4.55 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee went into executive [secret] session.)

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The following testimony was taken by the subcommittee in executive session, and the name of the witness is not disclosed because of the fact that the lives of his relatives in Russia might be endangered thereby:

TESTIMONY OF MR. ———.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Mr. ———, suppose you go ahead and state the conditions in Russia as you found them, and especially conditions under the soviet government.

Mr. ———. I have been in Russia close on to 15 years. I was located there with a factory, where we had about 2,500 workmen. Our factory is running to-day, and even last year, by our last year's production we filled all our orders. But nobody can explain—I could not myself—just exactly how that was done or why it was. We seemed to have unusual control over the men there, and because of the fact that we were making machinery which was necessary for the country the workmen stood by us and we ran through.

I have heard and read the statement that the present government in Russia is a workmen's government and all that sort of thing. In my estimation that is absolutely false. I have been with the workmen. That is all I have done; I have been with the workmen and peasants. I never met Prof. Dennis there, or any other of these gentlemen here, because I never had time. I was always with the workmen. The workingmen in Russia, in the factories, are not Bolsheviki, although they do not dare to say they are something else.

Senator STERLING. Do you mean to put it so broad as that?

Mr. ———. I do not mean to say that there are no workmen who are Bolsheviki. I am taking the workmen as a whole. It is the worst element out of each factory, the worst element out of the country, that has come to the top, and they are supporting the government. They are supporting this government, being paid, of course, large sums, and being given the privilege to loot or anything that they wish. It would not do to question a Red Guard. If he said something—told you to do something—you would not dare to question it. If you did that it would be as much as your life was worth.

And now, as I say, the government over there is made up of the loafers of the industrial and the peasant world, and all the outsiders have come running in from other countries. If you go into Moscow to do any business with the Bolshevik government and you come upon any of the people higher up in the government, you never meet anybody that was born and brought up in Russia up to the date of the revolution. You meet a man that was born there, probably, and went out and came in from the outside after the revolution was on. Those people are supposed to be working at salaries that are often to-day, I believe, below what the workingman was getting, below what it would take a man to live on, a decent living wage that he was supposed to be getting. In fact, they are getting much more money on the side and lots of them are making fortunes.

In regard to the industries there, when the revolution started, the Bolshevik revolution around the 1st of November, 1917, the workmen all went with the Bolsheviks. They were all Bolsheviks then, or nearly all, because the Bolsheviks told them "Everything is yours. Just take it. You have been oppressed." They sang such songs to those men that it certainly did turn their heads.

Senator STERLING. But since that time?

Mr. ———. Since that time things have changed. Three or four or five months after the revolution took place the workmen began to open up their eyes, and saw that things were not as they thought they were. They are afraid to say so. You will very seldom get a workman to say that he is not a Bolshevik, but he will tell you in secret that he is not a Bolshevik. "But what can I do?" he will say. "I do not dare to say anything. I can not do anything." They are all terrorized, just as the peasants are.

Maj. HUMES. What are the means used to terrorize them?

Mr. ———. Shooting them.

Maj. HUMES. Are shootings frequent?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Tell us any incidents of that sort.

Mr. ———. I can tell lots of incidents of people disappearing by being shot. You know they are shot, because of the number of persons disappearing. In Russia they have no place to put them in jails. They are just shot, that is all.

Maj. HUMES. Was there an effort made to seize your factory?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. What was the manner in which they undertook to seize it? What was the method used?

Mr. ———. There was a decree put out that all factories were nationalized; that the factories must be under the control of the workmen's committees, etc. We had a workmen's committee in our factory, but our workmen's committee said to us, "We do not want to control this factory. We are perfectly satisfied as it is." Now, that is about the only factory in Russia where they have acted in that way. Why it is I can not tell you. It is possible that it was because of this. I would ask, "How is it that the workmen do not take our factory? What is the difference between the other factories and our own case?" They would say, "In the other factories the owners do not work. They just come around occasionally. But here it is different. You are on the job before I am." They would say to me, "We find the superintendents on the job before we are. You leave after us." In that way we had their confidence and we were able to carry the thing through. Now, it was not true in other factories in Russia that the managers were always on the job. They were sometimes never on the job. It is true that they were not as strict as we were about being around. Some of them would come around for an hour and look around and go away. So they took those factories, and ours they did not take.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is your factory?

Mr. ———. In European Russia.

Mr. DENNIS. What happened to the ——— factory?

Mr. ———. I was at the ——— factory in September. It shut down—absolutely shut down.

Senator STERLING. Those were not the factories, were they, where the committee visited the manager and told him that they had come to take over the factory, that they were the owners of it now, and the manager just said, "All right, gentlemen; I must pay out 30,000 rubles next Saturday. Here are the papers, etc.; take them"? And they replied to him, saying, "That is your job."

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And he told them in reply that if they were going to take the factory they must take the responsibility.

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And that changed the color of things.

Mr. ———. That is true in many, many cases.

Let me tell you what I saw at one factory. The factory was shut down. They had a lot of good men that had worked for years, and I tried to get some of them. I was sitting with the manager talking as one of the men came in and left a note on his table. He said, "Just a minute." In a few minutes the same man came back and said, "They will not wait. They want you right away." He said, "You see I am busy. What can I do?" "It is the committee." "I can not do anything; it is the workmen's committee and I can not do anything with them." I said, "What is up now?" He said, "I do not know. Let them come in." So I said good-by and went away. He told me afterwards, "They came in and ordered me out of my house, took my household furniture and everything, and I am out in the street." He was cleaning up papers and things. That is what happens to 90 per cent of the factories.

Maj. HUMES. How long did they operate that factory?

Mr. ———. They never operated it.

Maj. HUMES. Just closed it down?

Mr. ———. Just closed it down.

Senator OVERMAN. What became of the operatives, the workmen? Did they go into the army?

Mr. ———. The workmen just scattered, looking for food.

Senator OVERMAN. Looting, I suppose.

Mr. ———. Yes.

Well, I will say, in regard to why our factory was not nationalized, that the workmen would not allow the government to nationalize it, saying, "If you nationalize this factory you will close it up the same as the others, and we want 'our' factory to work."

Senator STERLING. Because of the goods produced?

Mr. ———. Possibly. And we had kept telling the workmen right along, "Do not jump at these things. Keep back, and let the other fellows try out their experiments, and if it is good perhaps we will do it." So when they saw what the other factories did, that they were all shut up in a week or two, our workmen thought that they had better not do this. The government sent down to a committee to say they would shoot our workmen's committee if they did not take over our factory, and our workmen's committee came to us and said, "What can we do? They are going to nationalize the factory and shut us down." "Well," we said, "hold on, and let us stand together and we can probably do something." We fought it out with the government and the workmen said that they would not work for the government, and that if they touched any of us they would go out on strike and would not work. They said that the government could never turn out a machine. So, in that way that affair blew over. We went into that matter pretty well with our workmen's committee and found out what the cause of this was, and what started it. It had gone along 8 or 10 months without talk of nationalizing our factory, they had kind of gone around us, but suddenly it came up. After we went into it we found it was about the same as in other cases, somebody looking for the job of managing the factory. When they find a factory they will go to the Bolsheviks and say, "Here is a job. Give me this factory and I will run it."

Senator OVERMAN. Does he run it or not?

Mr. ———. Whether it runs or not, he gets his pay; and if it does not run, if they do not manufacture anything, the government gives him money to pay the men with. I know an instance of a factory a few miles from ours where the government spent 60,000,000 rubles to run the factory for three months, and in that time they produced goods worth 400,000 rubles. Now, if it took 60,000,000 rubles to produce goods worth 400,000 rubles, that explains the way factories are run under Bolsheviks.

Senator OVERMAN. What sort of a factory was it?

Mr. ———. A locomotive works.

Senator STERLING. If that is a fair sample of the way in which the government runs them, nationalizing them is not an entire success.

Mr. ———. Yes; they have failed to keep the workmen satisfied and they have killed the hen that laid the golden egg. In order to keep the workmen quiet they pay them, and the workmen drink tea and read newspapers and smoke cigarettes in the shops instead of working.

Senator STERLING. What about the value of that money?

Mr. ———. It is the only means of purchasing they have got—that money.

Senator STERLING. It is paper money representing rubles?

Mr. ———. Yes, and with that they buy what they can. But they can not buy much.

Senator STERLING. Has not that money been depreciating all the time?

Mr. ———. Certainly; you can go and buy something to-day that would cost 30 rubles and to-morrow it would cost 80.

Senator STERLING. Do you know what the extent of the depreciation is in the Russian ruble?

Mr. ———. I do not know. Let us take it this way. I used to buy a suit of clothes for 60 or 70 rubles. Now, I doubt if you could get one for 2,000 rubles.

Mr. DENNIS. And you would have to hunt for it to buy it at that.

Senator STERLING. Two thousand rubles for that which theretofore cost 60 or 70 rubles?

Mr. ———. Yes; almost forty times.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. ———. I crossed the frontier on the 7th of October.

Maj. HUMES. What experience did you have with fines—as to being fined?

Mr. ———. The government tried to fine us in every way, shape, and manner—that is, to levy taxes. We refused to pay. The government used to get at the workmen's committee and ask, "What kind of a revolutionary shop are you running?" We told the committee, "Do not be hard on us or we will get out." In most cases they did just the opposite; but they tried to put taxes on us in every way.

They were afraid to use force on us, and our committee backed us up by refusing to do what they wanted it to do; and then we had 300 armed men at the factory. We had 300 men fully armed and trained, so that if anything happened they would start a little row. It is pretty close to the city, and they would not want anything started there.

It went along for a long time, and I left Russia, and it was not paid. None of the taxes were paid. One tax was 900,000 rubles. In one of the reports that has been made since I came back one of the men writes that they are being pushed pretty hard to pay.

Senator STERLING. The taxes were imposed by the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Nine hundred thousand rubles?

Mr. ———. Altogether, about four and a half million rubles; that is, in ordinary tax. If they think a man has anything at all, they will tax him for all he has got.

Senator STERLING. Were you taxed pretty high under the old régime?

Mr. ———. Nothing like that. If we paid a tax of 50,000 rubles, we thought that was pretty big. The figures now run into millions. Now, if you pay this tax to-day, in two weeks maybe they will come around to collect the same tax again. We pay that into the local soviet, but we do not know where it goes to. We have not any idea.

Before I came over from Russia I tried to get out by way of Siberia to the Czecho-Slovak front, and I was in Nijni Novgorod, where Prof. Dennis was. I even called to see him, but he was gone. I had about a month going from door to door with peasants, going right through the country, just knocking on the door and asking them to let me in at night. I spoke Russian well, and I used to have some pretty good talks with the peasants, and I tried to get their idea of the Bolshevik situation. The peasants in Russia are absolutely opposed to the Bolsheviks. Before they would let me into the house they would ask, "Are you a Bolshevik?" And when I told them I was not a Bolshevik but that I was an American, then they would open everything and give me anything that I wanted, when they knew that I was an American. But they would not let me in until they knew that I was not a Bol-shevik. They treated me very fine.

Now, as to elections in Russia. I will tell you of an election that I saw in this town. I talked with a man that participated in it. At one place they had a soviet which was elected just at the beginning of the Bolshevik revolution, and it ran along for a whole year. They were in power, but the Czecho-Slovaks were coming up and the people, the peasants all around, would say, "When are they coming? Why do they not come? Why do the allies not come? The allies are right close up." They used to point to some place where you could say that the allies were. I do not know how they used to find it out, but it passed from mouth to mouth. In the city which is the capital of the state of Novgorod, where there was a soviet, they heard that the soviet in this town of Nijni Novgorod was not as Bolshevik as it should be, and the people around there were pretty anxious that the Czecho-Slovaks should come in; so one day they sent their men down there, three delegates, to meet and talk with them, and the soldiers rounded up as many of the members of the soviet as they could and shot some of them, but some of them got away.

SENATOR STERLING. Just for the reason that they were not Bolshevik, they were shot?

MR. ———. That is all. Then they called a meeting of all the peasants who were elected to represent the different villages around—this was a county seat; that is what it was.

SENATOR STERLING. A county soviet?

MR. ———. They called them in to hold another election and one of the men told me this story. Here are the very words that they used at this election. They called these peasants in and one of these men from the capital said to them, "We have got to elect a new soviet. This soviet is going to be Bolshevik. If you elect any man to this soviet that is not a Bolshevik we will shoot him. Any man who is here that is not a Bolshevik can get out."

Well, they pretty nearly all went out. A few stayed around. I do not know whether they were Bolshevik or what they were. They had some elections, but they did not elect enough men. Whether they could not find enough candidates or whether there were not enough left in the party I don't know. So one of them just went around the village asking who were Bolshevik, and they went over the village and picked out men for that soviet. I looked into the character of one man pretty well and I found that he was a drunkard, had never owned, you might say, the shirt on his back; just a thug. He was one of the representatives. He was called in there and put in, and told "You are elected." That is the way they carried on the election there, and I think you will find that that story is typical of how they elect their soviets all over Russia.

SENATOR STERLING. How are those members of the soviet apportioned among the population; what is the ratio?

MR. ———. That I have forgotten. I think it is 1 to every 25,000 workmen and 1 to every 425,000 peasants. There has been a complaint about it on the part of the peasants.

(Thereupon, at 5.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 14, 1919, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Maj. Humes, will you please call the next witness?

Maj. HUMES. I will call Madame Breshkovskaya.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. CATHERINE BRESHKOVSKAYA.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. When did you leave Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I left Russia two months ago.

Maj. HUMES. When you left Russia what was the condition of the schools in Russia? Were they in operation?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. We had no schools, we had no teachers, we had no pencils, no inks. Even when I was in Moscow, for months we could not get ink. When you did get it, it was very bad.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know whether the schools are in operation in any part of Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. There were schools last year, but now they are empty. The teachers were thrown out by the Bolsheviks, and many had nothing to do, because they had no furniture, no materials to teach the children. There were also no books. I was asked by my teachers to come to America and to pray, and pray very deeply, to bring some millions of books back to our peasant children, for we had no books.

Maj. HUMES. When you left Russia, were any of the factories in Russia running?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Perhaps you have read in your papers and perhaps you have learned from your own people in the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association in Russia that there is no clothing, no food, and no goods. Even our cooperations have nothing to sell to the peasants, for we have no industry now at all. The factories are destroyed, and there are no importations, for we have no transportation; no railroads for transportation.

Russia gives the privilege to every American to come there, and it is our custom and habit to give preference especially to the American people. For many years we were accustomed to treat the American people as our friends. Up until this time the Russian people were fond of the American people, and they were not afraid of their intervention.

Industry is quite destroyed, and we have no furniture for the use of our schools. We have no machines; we have no tools, no scissors, no knives, or any of such things. We have here many merchants who came to beg something for Russia, some goods; but nothing is running to transport them.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is your home, madam?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. My home, sir, is Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What part of Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. All over. I have no home of my own; no house, no home.

Senator NELSON. What part of Russia were you born in?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. You know, perhaps, that half of my life I spent in prison and in Siberia.

Senator OVERMAN. How long were you in prison?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Thirty-two years.

Senator OVERMAN. Thirty-two years in prison?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Yes; in prison, in exile, and at hard work, altogether, in the hands of our despotism, for 32 years; that is all.

Senator OVERMAN. What is your age now?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Seventy-five.

Senator WOLCOTT. For what were you in prison?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. For socialist propaganda among my people. We have had a dynasty of monarchs, who were terrible despots, in Russia.

Perhaps you have all heard that 15 years ago I was in America, and I told all that to your citizens.

Senator OVERMAN. How does the condition of the Russian people to-day compare with the condition when you first came over here?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. We Russian socialists and revolutionists were so happy to see Russia free two years ago, and we hoped when we got quite free to get excellent laws for her freedom all over Russia, under the government of Kerensky. We got political freedom and personal and social freedom, and we hoped to begin to build the Russian State on a new form. We could do it, for the government was in the hands of the people, and all the peasants and all the workmen and all the soldiers were together and accepted those laws. We hoped to get land for all, and the Kerensky government wrote many times in the papers and announced that the people would get the land, but that we should wait until there could be a national assembly which would confirm all these new laws. So I say that for six months the Russian people were free, and had in their hands every possibility to have order and to have freedom, and to have land.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you freedom there now?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Perhaps you know, sir, that many years ago the German Government sent her spies over to Russia and prepared this war; and not only the Germans, but many Russians who were abroad. When the revolution was on and everybody was free, and Russia was about to have a constituent assembly, out of Germany came Lenine and Trotsky with their group, and all these traitors of Russia came to begin their propaganda. Perhaps you will say it was the fault of our provisional government not to take them and put them into prison. Perhaps you will say it; but the government was so liberal and hoped to see our people so happy with new possibilities, that it would not make any arrests. It was too liberal. And, as you will remember, it was a time of war, and Russia was weary of this war, and there were 20,000,000 Russians, grown up boys and men, who were sent to the front, and for three years Russia was forced to work only for these 20,000,000, making nothing for herself. The people were tired and weary, and our soldiers, when they got the propaganda from Germany and from the Bolsheviki who came into Russia, were very glad to hear it. They believed that the German population were brothers of our Russian soldiers, that the German soldiers and the Russian soldiers were brothers, so they had no reason for continuing the war.

Then Lenine and Trotsky, with the aid of German money, overflowed Russia with their propaganda.

We also have now many, many millions of paper money printed by Lenine and Trotsky, and it is a great misfortune for Russia. All the people who served our tyrants in Russia, the old bureaucratic class, the gendarmes, all those of the old régime, became Bolsheviki, and they made a large company who would overthrow the régime of Kerensky in Russia.

After October of 1917, when we saw that the Kerensky government was overthrown, with all faithful servants of our people we immediately addressed our hopes and our prayers to our so-called allies. I myself, 14 months ago, wrote a letter to the ambassador of America, Mr. Francis, exposing to him all that was done; that we had no national assembly in which people could express their views; that it was overthrown by the Bolsheviki, and instead we came under two gendarmes, Lenine and Trotsky. Our people, believing perhaps at first that they would do some good, even listened to them. Lenine said himself, "Nothing will be of us. There will be another czar after the Bolsheviki. But a legend will remain in Russia after us."

But now, these days, all say Russia is in fault. I wrote to your embassy in Russia that if you would be so good as to give us some support (from 50,000 good soldiers of your armies) the Bolsheviki would be overthrown. Yet I got no answer.

Meanwhile in Siberia, and over all Russia, the criminals were set at liberty, and after the Brest-Litovsk peace we got in Moscow two mighty rulers, Lenine, and Gen. Mirbach from Prussia. He was there, and he was all over Russia. He asked to get all the German and Magyar prisoners to be gathered and armed, to make new troops against Russia. He asked, too, to disarm at once the Czecho-Slovaks, who forced their way to Vladivostok to get to France. Lenine obeyed these orders and sent troops to do it. The Czecho-Slovaks had no more desire to remain in Russia. They wished to go to France. Russia, after the Brest-Litovsk peace, could not use their forces, so that they tried to get to Vladivostok, and their little army of 80,000 troops were dispersed over the Volga and away about Siberia. Mirbach understood that this was so much good for those soldiers to get to France and come back against Germany, so he gave the order to disarm them. The first troops, who were nearest to Moscow, were disarmed. Yet they left some arms with them. Then Mirbach ordered to disarm them all—every Czecho-Slovak soldier.

Then came some Red Guards from the part of the Bolsheviki out of Moscow, with some officers, and they asked the Czecho-Slovaks to be disarmed. The Czecho-Slovaks understood that if disarmed they would be as prisoners and left in Siberia, and that Mirbach would make of them all he wished; so they decided not to go to Siberia and not to be disarmed, but to turn toward the west, and they began to fight—these gallant soldiers.

First, they took the town of Nicolaievsk, and then Omsk and then Tobolsk.

All the time Lenine and Trotsky and all the so-called Bolsheviki were entertained and given support from Germany by the German Kaiser and his Government. I do not know if the German people were in this complot. Certainly German soldiers, many of them, were, for they would make show of their brotherhood to our soldiers.

After disorder grew, after all our factories and mills were destroyed in Moscow and Petrograd, all our depots and supplies which had been provided by our zemstvo, by Kerensky's government, all that was given to the Germans. The Bolsheviki could not oppose in any way. They were quite dependent on the German Government and Mirbach and the other German generals, for we had no army, and he would have the support of the German Government.

SENATOR STERLING. Were German soldiers helping the Bolsheviki against the Czecho-Slovaks?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Help them? Against the Czecho-Slovaks? Certainly, and the Czecho-Slovaks combated very well with the German people and the Magyars. They hated them, yes. Now they are entirely for themselves, and as they have their own republic, they would go back. Now Russia will be left quite alone. Yes; if we had our own forces; the Russian forces against the Bolsheviki. We had no organization to fight with them. The Bolsheviki grew and grew in forces. Idle men, who did not have any work, for all the factories were shut, nolens volens became Bolsheviki, too, because there was nothing to eat. The industries were all gone. The factories were shut, and there was no material to work on and no desire to work on the part of the workers. They said all the bourgeois had to be overthrown, and the workmen would work alone to make our industries. Not so many, but a few, of the Bolsheviki gave the example of giving the factories into the hands of the workmen. In one or two months it all was destroyed. Nobody worked, and they could not continue because they were inexperienced in these matters.

Our peasants alone are working in the villages. There is not any industry since then. For instance, take the coal mines; it is so easy to use them. But they could not use them. You must feel, yourself, the need of the Russian people.

We ask you for everything. We ask you to give us paper, to give us scissors, to give us matches, to give us clothes, to give us leather to make boots. We ask everything; not because we are so poor, but all our riches are under the ground. Russia is destroyed in industry and husbandry. There is no industry at all. What we need is to have handicrafts in Russia, to have schools, and to spin and weave, and to make boots; because we are naked. I am ashamed to express myself that we are like mendicants now; that we must ask everything, ever things like this [indicating a penholder], but it is so. You know when you send your Red Cross you send your medicines and every sort of necessity. If you came without your own medicines and other things, without your clothing, you would do nothing, because there is nothing to work with.

Also I assert that the Bolsheviki destroyed Russia and divided it and corrupted the people of Russia. They turned loose on the people all the criminals that were out and in the prisons. They are now with the Bolsheviki. They have never a soviet composed of all honest people. They are the refuse of our people in Russia.

And now you ask, how does the people support such conditions? Dear me, our people supported for 300 years our despotism, and when 15 years ago I was here in America I was asked "If your despotism is so bad, why do you people stand it?" Our people are illiterate. Our people never had access to the government; never had sense to deal with the political questions; never were permitted to read papers where was stated the truth. Our people are like children. There is a person here who has spent three years in Russia, and he says to me, "Oh, yes; to understand the psychology of your people one must understand the psychology of children." They are good-hearted and openhearted, and they have confidence in everyone especially in those who after so many hundreds of cycles of repression and poverty and suffering will promise them to have peace, as did the Bolsheviki; to have bread, to have schools, to have everything. They did believe it. Now, they do not believe anyone. But there is nothing now to have. And after that, I do not hope that any of our allies will be so generous—I will say so bold—as to give us armed help. I do not hope.

I see everybody is so much involved with their own affairs and interests, that Russia is left alone. Yet the Russian people would be raised up by those who would give them help, who would give them tokens of their friendship not only with words and not only with promises, but with real help; to secure our railroads, for instance; to have for us school books; to have for us merchandise and several sorts of machines; for our peasants began to be accustomed to have machines out of Germany and out of America. Now, we have none at all. All that we had before is used up, now. For five years we have not been working for ourselves; for five years, three years with Germany and now two years in civil war. Lenin and Trotsky promised to make peace and to have peace in Russia, and after their peace with the Germans in Brest-Litovsk they said, "We will reconstruct Russia"; and when German troops came into west Russia, and made every sort of disorder, then Trotsky exclaimed, "We shall have a crusade against Germany;" yet in two weeks Lenin made a declaration, "We are not so foolish as to begin again to make war with somebody, for certainly otherwise our efforts to deepen and deepen the revolution would fail," and instead of beginning to make war with the German people, they began to make civil war in Russia; and instead of having one front, between Russia and Germany, we have now, I will not say five, but I will say hundreds of fronts all over Russia, for everywhere we have gangs and bands. Now, the people, being starving, being naked, they will go and serve Trotsky or any leader or any general, who will make them brigands. Here they turn around, and with Germans, and others, prisoners of Russia, all Russia is robbed, and all Russia has nothing now, and all Russia will fight, perhaps, for many years among themselves, before they get out of this boiling pot, and will find out an issue for themselves.

I will not say anybody is in fault, no; but we are left alone, and we do not now hope to get any support from any side. It will be very hard for us to fight in our own country for five, six, I do not know how many years, before we begin to be reasonable and strong-minded, and understand our own interests.

Yes, the people is depressed, morally and spiritually depressed; and it is not so fresh, you know, not at all. Depressed, the people is. And now bolshevism will not be finished in Russia so soon, for we see now that it spreads more and more around Russia. When I was talking to one member of our elected government, Gen. Boldoreff, he said, "See, in some years we are going to give help and restore order in Europe." Certainly, Russia shall help herself, and have rest and order, and then it is quite sure that this venom of Bolshevism will die out. You in America, you mix together Bolshevism and socialism. I have been a socialist for 50 years, and I wished to get my people free, and have all political rights in Russia; and when two years ago we got them, then I would say to myself, "Now we will construct, and not destroy. We will construct; we will raise our people and build and construct and create, to make a beautiful place out of Russia." And the Bolsheviki are now saying, "We must destroy, and destroy, and destroy."

I have a letter from one of my young partners who brought his wife from Petrograd to Vladivostok. Everywhere where the Bolsheviki are, there are no intelligent people; there is no intelligence; all killed or hidden, for they destroyed not only our factories and our mills, and not only our schools, but they destroyed, they killed, all the intelligent people, the best professors, the best professional men, the best men we had in Russia, hundreds of them; and I myself was hidden for two months in Petrograd, and for six months in Moscow before I left it. Thousands of old socialists, revolutionists, are killed by the Bolsheviki as being reactionary and counter-revolutionists.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Why did you hide?

MRS. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Oh, dear me! I was illegal in Russia. I have friends who hid me. I expected to live in Russia, in this part where there are not Bolsheviki, and to work with my peasants. Our peasants are everywhere; and every peasant is so tired of the Bolshevism that he only says, "If only some good people would come and rescue us!" Very often I have said, "For shame! You ask help of them, and you ask the American people. Why do you not help yourselves?" "Oh, we are so tired; and we are disarmed." You see, the German Government was so clever, had so much foresight; and all our soldiers who were discharged were disarmed before this coup d'état.

SENATOR STERLING. So that the peasants had no arms?

MRS. BRESHKOVSKAYA. No arms, no powder. They were without any arms. And the Bolsheviki have all things.

I will finish my speech by repeating what I have said, if you Americans could help us and aid us to have in Russia a national constituent assembly, it would appease all the people. When it is said that you Americans do not know how you can act, it is not essential, to my mind. You could act; and in Russia you can not understand how it is. It is quite simple. We are an original people, perhaps; but we need what all other people need. We need order; we need to work; we need political freedom; we need all that is due to every free nationality; a quite democratic government; not, as they claim, any Lenine and Trotsky, but a government elected by the people.

We must have good transportation. We have now none. Also, we must have schools.

Maj. HUMES. Which government treated the people of Russia the best, the old régime government or the Trotsky-Lenine government?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Ah, perhaps many people are now, especially among the peasants, calling for the Czar again. They were denied paper and newspapers and education, but they could work; and that is now impossible. Everywhere we have fighting fronts, and everywhere the people are persecuted, and everywhere we have soviets, and the soviets are composed of people sent out from Petrograd and Moscow, that rule the district. Certainly the mindful would never have a tsar again; never, never! Even the most of the people never would have him again; and we will fight until we have a democratic government. But when we compare this view with the conditions under Lenine and Trotsky, if it would endure twenty years, for instance, Russia would be dead. The people would be kept corrupted.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that Lenine and Trotsky were the tools of Germany?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I do not believe it; I am sure of it, sir.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that they received German money?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Yes. They also make this paper money and flood Russia with it. Every pood of our rye bread now costs 500 or 600 rubles.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that the bolshevik government of Lenine and Trotsky is a tyranny and a danger and a menace to Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. It is. But more than a danger, it is destroying Russia. It is on the verge of being quite destroyed.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that this government will be destructive of the liberties of the Russian people?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Already we have no liberty in Russia. No newspapers except the bolshevik newspapers are permitted, sir, and therefore you read only bolshevik newspapers. There are no universities, no colleges, and no schools. All of them are shut. Certainly Russia will struggle and will shed her own blood for many, many years to become free. We have no freedom in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Is this government by Lenine and Trotsky worse for the Russian people than even the bad government of the Czar?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. What a question do you ask, sir! I, for instance, would suffer for twenty years not to have a czar; but simple people who work for their bread would certainly prefer a czar to Trotsky and Lenine. I can not believe that 180,000,000 people would have to suffer and struggle without any peace. It is impossible. It will be finished. And if Russia will have a czar, if Russia will have dictators, if Russia will have bolsheviki, it will be the fault of our allies, because they do not help us.

Senator NELSON. What is the feeling of the Russian peasants towards the bolshevik government? How do you stand with reference to it?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. They are all against the bolsheviki. When the bolsheviki come to the village and ask for bread and grain and potatoes and meat, they fight with them. They fight with sticks against them. They will not be robbed. They have been robbed by German troops and robbed by the bolshevik troops, and robbed by Magyar troops. The bolsheviki consider the peasants bourgeois if they have a cow, some grain, and some potatoes. Only proletariat, only those who have nothing at all, can go about Russia and rob everyone. We have no banks, we have no stores or shops, we have no ships, we have nothing now, and we have thousands and thousands of people without work, who join the troops and go all over Russia.

Senator STERLING. I would like to ask what you think of the withdrawal of the allied forces from Russia—the French, British, and American troops, that were there?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. You ask only about the American troops?

Senator STERLING. All allied troops.

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I shall be frank and say that the French and British troops, especially the British troops in Omsk, were in fault for the last coup d'état. Certainly if they had not had those troops they would not have made us appoint dictators instead of electing people.

Senator STERLING. I do not quite understand.

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. The French and British troops in Omsk are responsible for the coup d'état which put a dictator in place of an elected assembly, and of course we are not in favor of such kind of troops.

Senator STERLING. But aside from that, do you think the presence of allied troops, American, French, and British, aside from the circumstance that you name, would be helpful to Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. If they should fight with us against the bolsheviki they would aid us, but when they leave the bolsheviki to do what they wish to do, it will not help us. Russia has no arms, no munitions, nothing, and the allied forces are too few; 1,000 British, 2,000 French, and 1,000 Italians. Already our neighbors, the Japanese, are sending in their troops, and instead of having in Russia the American intervention, American aid, we will have the intervention of Japanese troops, with very selfish intentions. And perhaps some dictator will be able to use them to give the whole of Siberia to the Japanese people and to keep Russia for some years more in civil war. I assure you, sir, there will be a time when the Japanese and German people will have an alliance; and certainly the first who will suffer will be Russia. You will not help us unless you keep out such invaders as the Japanese, and help us to get rid of the criminals such as the Bolsheviki. Of that I am sure.

Senator STERLING. Do you think a sufficient allied force in Russia would help to restore the constituent assembly to power and give you a democratic government?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Not only a large force of troops would help but if committees would come to Russia and ask to have an assembly formed in Russia, it would help. If you had come to our help a year ago, perhaps 20,000 of your troops would have been sufficient. Now it will take 50,000; not less and perhaps more. Fifty thousand armed troops that would fight would help us to reestablish the constituent assembly.

Senator STERLING. Do you think, Madame, that an army of 15,000 or 20,000 allied troops would have prevented the establishment of a Bolshevik government in Moscow?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I am sure of it. Even yesterday a Czecho-Slovak said to me that if they were not supported they could not hold out; they could not fight alone. The Russian people have no arms and the Bolsheviks would be sure to get through into Ukraina, and with the aid of the German troops they would go straight through the country. When you ask how many troops would be needed, it depends. If you put a million troops in a place and they did nothing, they would not be as good as 50,000 troops who could fight. If you get 50,000 troops that will fight, that will be enough.

Senator STERLING. Do you think such troops would be welcomed by all but the Bolsheviks?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Certainly, if they asked for them a year ago. They are crying, "Save us. Come and defeat the Bolsheviks, for we can not exist. There is no work in Russia."

Senator STERLING. Suppose this Bolshevik rule goes on, and as a result of Bolshevik rule there is disorder and chaos in Russia, will it not lead eventually to the domination of Russia by Germany?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Certainly.

Senator STERLING. You think it would?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. If Bolshevik rule continues, Japan and Germany will cut Russia into pieces. That is quite plain, for having no forces to fight against them, and always occupied with her interior disorders, certainly those two neighbors will come in and make of Russia their own colonies. The Japanese have already begun to make them. They already have bought houses and materials and goods in the east of Siberia, and have openly confessed that it is to their interest to have Siberia in their hands, to keep for themselves and they say, "We can not permit anyone, including the American people, to ask us to take a subordinate position."

Senator STERLING. Is there any possibility of America helping industrially as long as the Bolshevik rule?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. While the Bolshevik rule? Would you ask us to sit at the table with criminals and deal with them? If all Russia is destroyed, and all the people shot or hung, it means nothing to them. All they want is to sit and rule, after they have corrupted our people, corrupted our soldiers, and corrupted our sailors and corrupted our workers. Only peasants they could not corrupt, because in every village there are only a very few Bolsheviks.

Senator STERLING. And on that question you feel that you can not treat or deal with the Bolsheviks?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Certainly not; not when they deceive everybody and destroy everyone, especially honest people. Honest and intelligent people are destroyed in Russia. I say to you that for the head of Kerensky they promised 100,000 rubles—only to have his head.

Senator STERLING. Madam, have you read the appeal of the Russian Economic League to the people of America in regard to the withdrawal of American forces from Russia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. No, I have not.

Senator STERLING. It is an appeal by five or six whose names I do not now recall.

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I do not remember. I read, sir, two months ago that your good President wanted to give from your American bank $5,000,000 to aid commerce between America and Russia and Russian corporations and people. That is very well. But I ask you what will be the use of this proposition if we have already American goods in Vladivostok, many millions of tons, and we can not move them, and speculators get hold of them and hold them for high prices, and they can not move them because there are no railways? Sugar costs 20 rubles in Kharbin, and they sell it for 800 rubles in Omsk. It is impossible to get goods from that place. We have no sugar. To-day some lady asked me why we had no sugar. A short time ago we had no grain, and we had no oil—no kerosene oil. We have no bread. There is some bread in the villages, but in Moscow there is not. Neither is there any in Petrograd. They have no grain. All of our provinces are depending one upon another, and will have to do so until we have railroads and communication on the rivers. Until then we will always be depending upon one another. All improvements in husbandry and in agriculture have been stopped, and any improvements in industry have been stopped. We have none now.

Bolshevists got their principles mainly from the socialists, and misused them. Instead of creating in Russia they began to destroy and overthrow what was done until now.

I am surprised that you, who are so clever and so mighty, you do not go and see yourselves what has happened to Russia. But do not see only the Bolsheviks, in some towns, but go through all towns and ask our people and our workmen what is their idea. Russia is 12,000 miles long and 6,000 miles broad, and it can not be known by any except those that spend all their lives, as to what is there, what is their people, and what is their country, and what are their sufferings, and what are their needs. For 25 years I had to learn and for 50 years to struggle against every evil and every misfortune which our people suffered.

Senator STERLING. To what extent, madam, are there soviet governments in Siberia?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. There are none. Perhaps somewhere there are, but I do not know of any in Siberia.

Senator STERLING. In European Russia are there any soviet governments that are not controlled by the Bolshevik element?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Every soviet government now springs up controlled by brigands, like bubbles out of the water.

Senator STERLING. They do not have to be residents of the town or district in order to become members of the soviet?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Now, they come with guns and take possession of the soviets. If the Russian people could have been organized they would have overthrown the Bolsheviks long ago. But there has been a collapse of forces, a collapse of spirit, and we can not accuse our people. They have suffered all through the centuries, as serfs under a despotic government, and now in this terrible war they have suffered much. Many mothers had six boys at the front. They are quite ignorant of their country. The people in the provinces have no conception of what is going on around them. Every peasant knows only his village, his district, and nothing more. Yet we will work, and we will learn, and some day we will be strong, religious people. We are religious.

Maj. HUMES. Is there a greater amount of crops planted under Bolshevik rule than under the old régime?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Planting is diminishing. The landlords are not so bold to risk, and the peasants are not so sure the land will be for them, and therefore they will not even attempt to cultivate much land, and without horses they can not, so the planting diminishes and diminishes. We have not exported any grain for five years. All was left in Russia. Nevertheless they are quite near starvation. What does it mean? It means that for instance in many provinces the peasants are hiding their grain. They will not sell it into the towns. They are always saying, "Give us goods. Give us machinery, wares and goods, sugar and tea, all we need, and we will sell you our grain. Otherwise, you give us some paper money, and what shall we do with it? Nothing at all." And they think, too, that they must sell at the price fixed by the Bolsheviks where there are Bolsheviks, and this price is not high; but when they want to get anything in town—to buy anything else—they must pay for a pound of sugar 40 rubles. Therefore they will not sell their grain to the Bolsheviks, and brigands are going over Russia and robbing them, so that they are hiding their grain in the ground—making great holes in the ground and putting the grain in—and much of the grain is rotting. All over Russia it is destroy, and destroy. There is no order, no industry and no work.

Senator STERLING. Do you have any idea, madam, how many people have been killed by the Bolsheviks? Has there been any estimate made?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. It is said that the war against the Germans took only half of those who are killed now. Twice as much as we had in casualties during the war have been killed by the Bolsheviks. It is not imaginable to you. They shoot, for instance, thousands and thousands of them at once. Every man and every woman who is against them, as they believe, is shot or hanged.

Senator OVERMAN. How many people have fled the territory or account of this terrorism?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. All the provinces are overflowed with refugees. There are refugees in every town now, and we have committees for refugees. They come out of the towns quite naked. They come in during the night, women with children, and old women, and many of them come from the towns quite naked. And of sickness, there is typhus everywhere.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know of any agents who are spreading the Bolshevik propaganda in this country?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I have heard of them. I have heard that you have 3,000,000 Russian Bolshevik refugees. Perhaps it is not quite so much. But I am sure that all the Bolsheviki, all these criminals who are making propaganda in Russia, will make the same propaganda everywhere. They will not work, but they always have means to put out this propaganda. Here in America your democracy could be so well organized against Bolshevism. I am sure there is liberty of association here, of assembly, of unions, and so we socialists hoped to have such an organization in Russia during the first three or four months after the revolution; but until now mankind has many bad instincts, it is true; and when one comes to the poor people and demonstrates his worst side of nature, certainly they will find things pretty bad. And so it was in Russia. But I am glad to say that all the Russian people are not corrupted. Yet it is quite enough to have some 100,000 of such corrupted people, to bring misfortune over the whole country. It is quite enough. We have no navy, we have no factories, we have no guns, we have no transportation. All of those which we had the Bolsheviki have sold to the German people. When I spent six months in hiding in Moscow, every day there was a train going to Orsha, a town down near Germany. Every day they sent down cars loaded with goods from Moscow to Germany. Every day goods were carried out. So that our national riches, our best art productions, and all of that, has gone to Germany. All of that they sent to Germany and nothing was left for the people. Ask anybody if the organization of the Bolsheviki is for the welfare of our people, and nobody will answer you that it is. We have no schools, no colleges, no universities. You will read in the papers that everybody is working and learning. But the fact is that there are no factories, no mills, nor anything.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROGERS SMITH.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Smith, where do you live?

Mr. SMITH. Brooklyn, N. Y., at present.

Maj. HUMES. What is your business? What are you connected with?

Mr. SMITH. The National City Bank.

Maj. HUMES. Were you connected with the National City Bank in Petrograd?

Mr. SMITH. I was.

Maj. HUMES. When did you leave Petrograd?

Mr. SMITH. September 2.

Senator WOLCOTT. What year?

Mr. SMITH. 1918.

Maj. HUMES. In September, 1918?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you come away with this American colony?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. I came out with Mr. Lee's party.

Senator OVERMAN. Why did you leave there?

Mr. SMITH. Why, the American consul, Mr. Poole, had received word from the Government to get all the Americans out, and we took the opportunity to get out. Conditions were certainly getting worse and there was no good in our remaining.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Smith, will you just describe in your own way the condition of affairs as you found them in such parts of Russia as you visited, commencing with the November revolution and the events leading up to that revolution, through to the time you left?

Mr. SMITH. I came in there in June, 1917, in the early part of June, and was present at the time the Bolsheviki in July first tried to take power and were put down by Kerensky, who brought up forces from the front. I was there during the summer, and at the time when the Bolsheviki were finally successful, when Kerensky was forced to flee. They had the provisional government in the Winter Palace—that is, the ministers—and the final taking of the Winter Palace took place in the early morning, and the following morning we saw prisoners being led out by these sailors from Kronstadt, after the Bolsheviki were in full control of the city.

Maj. HUMES. What were they leading the prisoners out for?

Mr. SMITH. When they had gathered them in the palace, they brought the ministers over to the fortress of Sts. Peter and Paul. The Bolsheviki had really obtained control then. They had this big program—land, peace, and bread for everybody—and they brought over all the troops in Petrograd, the soldiers that were stationed there, to help them. Of course it was really started by the workmen of the factories, and they had managed to convert the soldiers garrisoned in Petrograd to their ideals, with this platform.

Maj. HUMES. Now, what was that platform?

Mr. SMITH. Land, peace, and bread. Peace with Germany, land for everybody—the peasants—and bread. I do not think that any of this has really been successful. It is quite evident.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they get bread and peace?

Mr. SMITH. They haven't much bread. They give bread to those that work. Those that were against them they did not permit to have bread.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they divide up the land among the people?

Mr. SMITH. They did not exactly divide it, or at least there was no special plan of division. They simply took it. If a man next door had any more land than they had, they would simply take it. There was constant strife, as far as I could determine. And as soon as one got a little more land than his neighbors, he was declared to be bourgeois.

Senator WOLCOTT. It went up and down all the time?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; constantly.

Senator WOLCOTT. If a man got up, the penalty was that he had to go down again?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

The food conditions were getting terrible in Petrograd, especially in February, 1918. In addition to that, the Germans were within 50 miles of the city. No one could tell whether they could get up there or not. Contradictory reports were printed in the newspapers.

In fact the Bolsheviki themselves did not know. They were coming so near that people were getting out of town. A German commission took real control of the city. The troops, of course, never entered, as is well known. At the time Mr. Treadwell, Mr. Brown, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Welsh, and several others, the last Americans in Petrograd, it was said, evacuated on March 19, Mr. Treadwell went to the bureau where they are supposed to get passports—

Senator WOLCOTT. That was when?

Mr. SMITH. March 19, 1918. He was unable to make himself understood in English or Russian. The clerk spoke only German. They got on the train, and in the station the train was held there for some time. The usual thing is for the commissar of railroads to come through and collect the passports. The commissar came through and he looked into the apartment in which these men were, and he said in broken English, "Well, boys, are you going to take a little trip?" This man was named Shatoff. He was known by Mr. Brown. He was a Jew from the East Side of New York.

Senator NELSON. What was his other name?

Mr. SMITH. That is the only name I know.

Senator NELSON. What was his official position?

Mr. SMITH. The commissar of the Nicolai Railroad—the chief commissar.

Senator NELSON. He was a Hebrew from the East Side of New York?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. As the commissar of that railroad, what were his duties? Was he what we call a superintendent of the railroad?

Mr. SMITH. No; he was supposedly the Government control officer appointed for the railroad. He had no knowledge of the technique of the railroad, or anything of that sort. It was up to him to control more or less the operation of the railroad.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was it a large railroad system, or just a little short line?

Mr. SMITH. It is the line between Moscow and Petrograd.

Senator WOLCOTT. A very important line, is it?

Mr. SMITH. It is the best operated line in the country at this present time.

Senator STERLING. What had this man's business been in New York?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know what he did. We did not get any personal history from him. Mr. Brown can tell you if you get in touch with him.

Senator NELSON. Could he talk English?

Mr. SMITH. Perfectly.

Senator OVERMAN. Continue with what you were about to say when you were interrupted.

Mr. SMITH. He collected the passports, and went through the train, and later came back and said, "Well, boys, I am afraid you will have to stay in Berlin to-night; you can not go over to Brooklyn to-night." I said, "What is the matter?" He said, "There are only about five or six passports of the people on the train that are in order." That was his announcement at that time. We were moved partly out in the yard, and held up for a long time, but finally the train did actually go through. That was a little incident that I wanted to bring in. I have noticed several inquiries here before as to whether Jews are in control of the Government, or in the government. That is the only incident I directly know of.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see any other East-side men over there?

Mr. SMITH. I saw no other men from New York, or from America, myself. I have heard many stories, but I do not remember them. I have heard plenty of stories, and I have seen plenty of Jews in the government. The man that arrested us on December 26, 1917, the man in command of the party, was a red-headed Jew, a Russian Jew.

Maj. HUMES. You say arrested. Do you mean at the time they undertook to take over, or did take over, the National City Bank?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; when they took over all the banks.

Senator NELSON. Did they take over your bank?

Mr. SMITH. They did not take it over in the way they did the others. On the morning when they were to take over all the banks, they sent a squad of soldiers down, and the chap in command who entered the bank said we were all arrested, that the bank was arrested and belonged to the people. The manager and the assistants conducted negotiations with this man who was sent down there, and got him so confused that he did not know just what his orders were, and we telephoned quite a lot. Finally we succeeded in getting him to take the manager and the secretary to the State bank of Russia to see the chief commissar of finances, and the man in charge up there took them under arrest. They went up to the State bank.

Senator OVERMAN. Did this fellow speak English?

Mr. SMITH. No; not this one that came in. He was quite Russian. They went up to the State bank and wished to enter the offices of the chief commissar up there. There was a big line of people waiting, and they started to go in ahead of the line, and the people all exclaimed, "No; go down at the end of line." They said, "We are arrested." They said, "That does not make any difference; go down to the end of the line."

They finally saw this chief commissar, and after considerable negotiations, we arranged that they should not put a commissar, that is a special commissar, in charge of our bank; that we would be permitted to go on revising our books and getting them in order, and taking care of our clients, under certain provisions.

After five days they withdrew the guards. Our only commissar was the chief commissar of the State bank at Petrograd. Of course, he was not in the bank, nor did he directly control us. We agreed to abide by their decrees, that is, in the matter of paying out certain sums of money. It was not only our own best policy, but it fitted very well, under the circumstances, to agree to do that.

Senator OVERMAN. How much did they let you pay?

Mr. SMITH. They allowed us to pay 150 rubles a week to Russians and foreigners, with the exception of Americans. There was no special exemption, but we were allowed to pay 500 rubles a day.

Senator OVERMAN. How much did they tax you?

Mr. SMITH. They did not tax us anything.

Senator STERLING. That meant to pay out on deposits?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the depositors could draw that quantity of money each day; and as I said, they withdrew the soldiers, and we were never bothered with them again in the bank.

Senator STERLING. What reason was given for restricting the payments out on deposits?

Mr. SMITH. Lack of currency; and at the same time, they had not settled on the policy as to just what they were going to do. They wanted to see that nobody drew out a large amount of money and used it for counter-revolutionary purposes to hurt the government, which was a very good reason. The currency stringency had existed for a long time before that.

Maj. HUMES. Did you have any way to pay out money except by currency?

Mr. SMITH. We could issue a check on the State Bank, and then it was up to the depositor to receive that check and try to get the currency.

Maj. HUMES. Was there any specie passing current at that time?

Mr. SMITH. Nothing at all.

Maj. HUMES. Was it ever possible for anybody to get specie instead of paper money?

Mr. SMITH. The current rate, when I first came to Russia, was 10 rubles for 1 gold ruble. Of course, there were no gold rubles, but 5 or 10 rubles in gold amounted to 50 or 100 rubles in paper.

Senator STERLING. Is that true now?

Mr. SMITH. With gold?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. There is a very great scarcity?

Mr. SMITH. Very great; yes, indeed. I did not see any gold in Russia in a great many days.

Another very interesting thing was what they called the revision of the safes and safe deposit vaults. The way they acted is rather amusing. The Bolsheviks declared that all the property which was in the vaults of the banks—that is, the safe-deposit vaults—should be confiscated; that is, all the property, such as gold and silver, and things of value of that sort.

Maj. HUMES. Securities?

Mr. SMITH. Securities were exempt. Only gold and silver; and, of course, coins. It was necessary, however, for everybody to appear there, who had a safe, and open it in their presence, and they would examine everything in it, and take away what they felt they were going to confiscate, giving a statement showing that they had taken it, but no promise to pay or return it. It was a rather touching sight. Fortunately we had no gold or anything of value in these safes. We had securities, that was all, and they could not confiscate them.

Senator NELSON. Did they levy any tribute in any form on your bank?

Mr. SMITH. Never.

Senator OVERMAN. On the other banks, did they?

Mr. SMITH. They did not levy any tribute on the other banks. They nationalized them.

Senator NELSON. That is, they took possession of them and ran them themselves?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, they ran them to a certain extent.

Maj. HUMES. Did they subsequently take possession of your bank?

Mr. SMITH. No, they did not take possession of it. They told us to evacuate our bank. We were in Vologda at that time. We were forced to evacuate from Petrograd and go to Vologda.

Maj. HUMES. Did you take the bank with you?

Mr. SMITH. We took the bank to Vologda.

Maj. HUMES. Was the bank afterwards taken over, too—the People's Bank?

Mr. SMITH. Never.

Maj. HUMES. What is the state of the bank now?

Mr. SMITH. It is just closed.

Senator NELSON. You took it over to Vologda?

Mr. SMITH. We moved out to Vologda, because of the food crisis and the imminence of a German invasion. We really never believed the Germans were coming into Petrograd, because we could not see how they would dare do it. Further than that, they did not have the force to run the city; it was too enormous a task, and it would be no advantage to them to have the city, except for political purposes for their own people, to say that they had captured Petrograd.

Maj. HUMES. What was the extent of your deposits when you closed the bank, approximately?

Mr. SMITH. The deposits would amount to, including valuables—you mean securities and so on?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. About 300,000,000 rubles.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there a reign of terrorism while you were there?

Mr. SMITH. The only terrorism I could testify to was the searches. Everybody was in constant fear of search.

Maj. HUMES. They were in fear of search. Were they actually searched?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; plenty of them. I was awakened one morning about 4 o'clock by a loud pounding on the door, and, of course, the rumor had gone around that they were going to make searches; that was in Vologda in July, 1918.

Senator NELSON. After you moved your bank there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; this was where I was living. I heard this pounding on the door, and went over to the curtain and looked out to see what it was, and I saw another Jew with three soldiers—armed soldiers—pounding on the door of the upper part of the house. There is a stairway leading to the second story, something like a Washington flat. Finally they were admitted, and we heard all kinds of rumblings and poundings upstairs. In the course of an hour or two they went away. They had taken away all supplies of provisions. They did not search the lower part of the house. In the lower part lived the president of the local soviet of the Bolsheviks. That was probably the reason. But similar searches went on that night. I know of 20 actual searches. There may have been a great deal more that same night. They went across the street and searched, and took 60,000 rubles away from a man, and all his silverware.

Senator STERLING. Were the searches that were made searches for money and valuables?

MR. SMITH. Principally for food, but they took anything they could find. It was the commission against counter-revolution, speculation, sabotage, etcetera, etcetera.

Senator NELSON. Did they take possession of buildings?

MR. SMITH. Yes; they requisitioned buildings wherever necessary.

Senator NELSON. And they requisitioned private houses?

MR. SMITH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And turned the people out?

MR. SMITH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And put their own people in?

MR. SMITH. Yes; that brings out a very interesting fact in relation to the schools in Russia. Of course, it was in the summer time then, and the schools were not running, and there was no real necessity for keeping those buildings empty. They turned most of them in Vologda into barracks for the soldiers, and I heard that they had not decided whether they were going to open those schools or not in the fall. We left on the 5th of August, and we do not know what happened later, but everybody seemed to believe that the schools were really at an end.

Maj. HUMES. You went from Vologda to Moscow?

MR. SMITH. From Vologda to Moscow. We arrived there at midnight. Vologda was the first city we had been in where there had been seeming peace, where we did not hear constant shooting of machine guns every night. There would be an occasional shot down near the station where a lot of hooligans, as they called them, congregated.

Senator NELSON. That is on a branch of the Siberian Railroad, is it not?

MR. SMITH. Yes, sir. When we got to Moscow the first exclamation we made was, "We are back home again." There was constant shooting of machine guns, and everything.

We stayed in the Moscow station for several days. We had heard that the English and French had all been arrested, but the Americans had not been touched; but it was rumored that they might be, and we felt we would be on the safe side if we did not go into the city, so we arranged to get a cottage about 30 miles outside of Moscow, where all the boys went—the boys on the staff. There were some 20 people in the party at that time, who lived in this empty cottage. We had no beds or furniture of any sort, but slept on the boards.

Senator STERLING. Speaking of the schools, if I may call your attention to them again, are you acquainted with the conduct of the schools prior to the time they were closed there?

MR. SMITH. Not very familiarly; no.

Senator STERLING. What kind of schools were they that were closed, common schools, graded schools, or higher educational schools.

MR. SMITH. The schools in Vologda which were occupied by the soldiery were of all sorts. There were children's schools for children of 8, 10, and 12 years of age, and then there were schools for young men and women, more or less equivalent to our high schools. But it is not significant that the schools were closed, because it was in the summer time, in vacation time, and in Vologda the conditions were not as bad as they were in Petrograd or Moscow, by any means.

Many of the old local authorities seemed to be holding high positions there.

Senator NELSON. But the significant thing was that they were occupied by the soldiers?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; but that can be very well explained by the necessity. They had soldiers stationed there, and these buildings were empty, and not being used for many months. What I wish to point out is that it was the general opinion in the city, of the people I talked with, that the schools would not be reopened. The school-teachers who taught in these schools were trying to find out whether they would be opened, and whether they would be able to secure their positions back again, and they never met with any actual assurance.

Senator STERLING. Were these Russian schools, so far as you know, open to all classes?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. There was no discrimination?

Mr. SMITH. There was no discrimination after the revolution.

Senator STERLING. Do you know as to whether prior to the revolution there was discrimination or not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know definitely, but I understand there was discrimination against certain classes.

Maj. HUMES. What did you find in Moscow with reference to any terrorism or machine-gun firing?

Mr. SMITH. The machine-gun firing and the rifle shooting that you heard there at that time, in August, 1918, you could not trace to any definite contest between different parties. It was more or less outbreaks in one quarter or another, private quarrels, the result possibly of forced searches where people resisted. There was no order, and no real police which was effective. They had police to a certain extent, they had militia, but you could not call it an orderly city such as we have here.

That brings up another interesting thing, if you would like to hear about it. A man whom I knew quite well in Petrograd was forced, in order to earn money to get food, to join the Bolshevik searching parties, and in that way he made his living. These parties were promised three-quarters of the spoils when they would make searches for provisions, valuables, or whatever had been declared matter for confiscation by the government. These parties would receive three quarters of the spoils. The other quarter supposedly went to the city; I do not know where it went. At any rate, this chap was in one of these parties, and was able to make a livelihood, and I guess made some money out of it. When we came back to Petrograd this last time, we inquired for him and found that he had been killed. We wanted to know how it happened—why he had been killed. He was out searching one night and they met another searching party in the same house, and they came to blows, and he was killed.

Maj. HUMES. How much loot does a man have to acquire before he becomes part of the bourgeois?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know. The only time that I had special reference to that was in the case of the peasants. We were brought in touch with that when we were in this place outside of Moscow. There was a peasant there who in former days just had his little cottage and a small piece of land, and he had grown rich and successful, and the other peasants were very jealous of him, and they insisted that he was a bourgeois. That is a Russian expression.

Maj. HUMES. You say he had become rich. What was he worth? What do you mean by rich, as riches go in Russia at this time?

Mr. SMITH. Well, it is very hard to tell. You can not get statistics of any sort in Russia. The man may have had 50,000 rubles right in his back yard under the earth; but he had food, that was the main thing, and he was able to buy shoes and clothing. That indicated to his neighbors that he was wealthy.

Maj. HUMES. Then a man who had plenty to eat, plenty of food and clothing, was looked upon as wealthy, and he was in the bourgeois class that was to be discriminated against?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. The possession of what we call necessities here was an evidence to them of riches?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, indeed; inasmuch as a pair of shoes cost 400 rubles, or $200 under the old exchange value.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was that price a post-revolutionary price?

Mr. SMITH. It is the price that was current when I left Russia, 400 rubles in Moscow for a pair of shoes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was that after there had been a great flood of this printing-press money?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir. It was due to the flood of money, and at the same time it was the constant shortage of shoes. There were no shoes coming in. The people who had a few stocks were selling out at enormous prices; but they were constantly getting down to the zero point where there is nothing left.

I have heard in these questionings before us some question of the crop conditions. I know from talking to peasants and people in Vologda that they did not plan to plant any more in their own acreage than was sufficient for themselves, because they knew it would be confiscated.

Senator NELSON. Is that a good farming country around Vologda?

Mr. SMITH. It is a dairy country—and vegetables.

Senator NELSON. Is it a prairie country or timber country?

Mr. SMITH. A timber country. There are a great many places that are quite open and taken care of under cultivation. That was especially true in sections where the Bolsheviki were not in complete control. When we went to Moscow, and came again from Moscow to Petrograd—when we went from Moscow over to Vologda and then back again to Petrograd—I noticed that the lands all along the railroad were under cultivation, and wheat and rye flourishing, big crops, and I was very much surprised until I questioned some Russians about it, and I was told that these were all Bolshevik farms. They were close to the railroad, which, of course, was under the control of the Bolshevik military officers in the different villages along the way, and they saw that the land was tilled and the crops raised. I suppose there was some understanding with the farmers whereby they would pay for any surplus, or see that they should be properly paid.

Maj. HUMES. They made a point of cultivating the land along the line of the railroad?

Mr. SMITH. That is all I could see, of course, and I wondered why it should be under cultivation, knowing the peasants were disinclined to raise crops. Of course, that is a very high section of the country, and is not a wheat country, and that does not indicate the conditions in the rest of Russia.

Maj. HUMES. Have you any idea how much gold and silver and currency was confiscated from the banks or from individuals?

Mr. SMITH. No figures were published. I can tell you only from rumor.

Maj. HUMES. Well, in banking circles, among the people that had some idea as to how much money there was—how much currency there was for business—can you give us some estimate of probably how much there was?

Mr. SMITH. There was a train which took these valuables to the State Bank of Petrograd, that is the head office of the State Bank of all Russia—a train took the valuables, including gold, silver, and securities, to Nijni Novgorod—and it was said that this train carried 74,000,000,000 rubles' worth of treasure. A great deal of that, of course, was stocks and bonds, and I can not tell the proportion of gold or silver or valuable coins of any sort in what was on the train, nor can I tell—

Senator NELSON. Do you know the condition about that time of the Russian State Bank, how much gold reserves it had, and how much paper currency it had outstanding?

Mr. SMITH. I can not remember. I had the figures in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Well, approximately.

Mr. SMITH. I could not tell you.

Senator NELSON. My recollection is that they were supposed to have had the equivalent of $400,000,000 in gold, and I have no idea how much paper currency. But whatever they had was taken away to Nijni Novgorod?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. That was the time they expected the Germans in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Do you know what became of it after it got to Nijni Novgorod?

Mr. SMITH. No, I do not.

Senator NELSON. Did they take everything from the bank?

Mr. SMITH. They did not take everything; that is, it has not been proven that they took everything.

Senator NELSON. But they took the gold?

Mr. SMITH. That is what I understand. There may be some left still in the bank. They may not have been able to get everything on the train.

Senator NELSON. Were you in the country when the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was entered into?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Is it not your understanding that the Germans got a good deal of gold at that time?

Mr. SMITH. It was a part of the treaty that they should receive a certain indemnity.

Senator NELSON. Yes; $200,000,000 of gold, it seems to me.

Mr. SMITH. Something like that. It is my understanding that a great deal of that was sent over to Germany.

Senator NELSON. I remember it because under the terms of the armistice that treaty of Brest-Litovsk was canceled, and they were ordered to return that gold. Do you recall that?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, that is true.

Senator NELSON. Did you ever come across either Lenine or Trotsky or any of their followers?

Mr. SMITH. Well, I came into frequent contact with their followers, but I never came in contact with Lenine or Trotsky.

Senator NELSON. Did you ever see men there who had been over here in America?

Mr. SMITH. That was the only instance, that I have cited.

Senator NELSON. Who were connected with their government—government officials?

Mr. SMITH. You mean American Government officials?

Senator NELSON. No, officials of this Bolshevik government? Did you see such men who had been over here?

Mr. SMITH. That is the only case that I know of, the one that I mentioned of Mr. Shatoff.

Senator NELSON. That railroad commissar?

Mr. SMITH. I did not see that, but I have it from the testimony of men upon whom I can rely.

Senator NELSON. And he was from the East Side of New York?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. You graduate pretty good commissars there, do you not?

Mr. SMITH. I know that on the day that I went to Russia, in May, there were 300 Russians, some of them going back to their country.

Senator NELSON. From this country?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; some of them Jews, but most of them real Russians.

Senator STERLING. That was in May, 1917?

Mr. SMITH. May, 1917; yes, sir. There was a very interesting and amusing incident that took place. One of these fellows was parading up around the first-class cabins, on the promenade deck, and he was politely requested by one of the junior officers to go on his own deck in his own class. He said, "No, I am a free man. Russia is free, and I can go anywhere on this ship."

Senator STERLING. Did any of those men going back to Russia indicate an intention to take part in a counter-revolution, or a Bolshevik revolution, against the revolution of March, 1917?

Mr. SMITH. I did not come in contact with any of them. They were in the steerage class, and they were talking mostly in Russian or some foreign language that at that time I did not understand.

Senator NELSON. Did you come across Kerensky?

Mr. SMITH. I have seen him, but I never talked with him.

Senator NELSON. Were you in any other place in Russia other than those places you have mentioned?

Mr. SMITH. Only three places.

Senator NELSON. Petrograd, Vologda, and Moscow?

Mr. SMITH. Petrograd, Vologda, and Moscow; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Novgorod?

Mr. SMITH. Never.

Senator STERLING. Where were you at the time the Duma was in session, at the time the revolution broke out?

Mr. SMITH. Petrograd.

Senator STERLING. When the Tsar was deposed?

Mr. SMITH. When the Tsar was deposed?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. I was in America.

Senator STERLING. You were in America then?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir. I thought you meant the dissolving of the Duma by the Bolsheviks.

Senator STERLING. No.

Senator NELSON. The Duma was extinguished by the Kerensky Government.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Senator NELSON. Yes, it was frozen out by that government.

Mr. SMITH. That is news to me.

Senator OVERMAN. Were any of the better class of people, the bourgeois, holding any offices?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know of any in the government proper. I know that a great many of the factory owners and the former directors of the banks were working with the Bolsheviks, but I do not know of any in the government.

Senator OVERMAN. Was that for their protection, do you think?

Mr. SMITH. For protection, and from a desire to save their own properties; to do what they could by their presence to guide the operation of the factory, for example, properly.

Senator OVERMAN. They pretended sympathy with the Bolshevik movement?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know how strongly they professed themselves in favor of the Bolshevik movement. I think it was more or less a compromise on the part of both. The Bolsheviks wanted somebody there who understood the business, and on the man's part, he wanted to look after his interests as well as he could. He could not get out of the country, and his family would starve to death if he refused, so the best thing for him to do was to stay in the concern and operate it.

Senator OVERMAN. Did many of them get out?

Mr. SMITH. A great many of them did. Thirty-six thousand Russians were supposed to be in Sweden.

Senator NELSON. When you left, had things gotten settled in Finland?

Mr. SMITH. In Finland everything seemed to be quite orderly. It was a complete contrast to Russia.

Senator NELSON. Had the Germans left Finland at that time?

Mr. SMITH. No, they had not. We saw Germans marching; and in every important station—Viborg, for example—we saw German officers sitting in the waiting rooms.

Senator NELSON. Did you have much difficulty getting out of Russia?

Mr. SMITH. No difficulty. We had difficulty getting across Russia.

Senator NELSON. That is what I meant.

Mr. SMITH. Yes. I did not know what you meant.

Senator NELSON. That is, across the border into Finland.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you have to bribe the officers to get through?

Mr. SMITH. We paid them—I do not know the exact figures. Mr. Huntington, I think, can tell you. We paid the commandant some money to carry the luggage about 100 feet across the border. Dr. Huntington can confirm the exact amount.

Senator NELSON. Did you have to pay anything for moving the train?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; we had to pay the cost of that.

Senator NELSON. I mean, did they stop at stations and want extra pay from you?

Mr. SMITH. No; not that I know of. If anything like that was done it was not known generally among the occupants of the train.

Senator STERLING. When you had to pay the cost of the train, that was something beyond the usual fare, was it not?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know how it worked out, but I do not think we were cheated in any way on that. We got a special train and pretty quick service all the way through. They put a dining car on the train, and were very attentive. This was for the American consuls, the American colony and the Italian mission.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were you acquainted with anyone in Russia who seemed to be very intimate with the Bolsheviki leaders, and who is now in this country again enlightening the people here about Russian conditions?

Mr. SMITH. No; I am not.

Senator NELSON. What did you do with the assets of your bank when you left? Did you leave them in Russia, or take them along?

Mr. SMITH. In Russia.

Senator NELSON. You left them there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Whom did you leave them in charge of?

Mr. SMITH. May I decline to answer that question publicly?

Senator NELSON. Yes; I have no objection.

Senator OVERMAN. Were there many people on the streets during the time you were there, walking up and down the streets?

Mr. SMITH. In the early days there were. The last time that I was in Petrograd, the streets were quite empty.

Senator OVERMAN. Were there any ladies on the streets?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the Bolsheviki treatment of the ladies?

Mr. SMITH. I have never seen any cases of brutality or persecution, but the conditions were such that many women of the better class were forced to dig potatoes in the field and sell newspapers on the streets, and do really demeaning work for a woman.

Senator OVERMAN. In order to get something to live on?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM W. WELSH.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. Where are you from, Mr. Welsh?

Mr. WELSH. New York City, I should say now.

Senator OVERMAN. How long have you been in this country?

Mr. WELSH. Twenty-seven years.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. WELSH. I left Russia at the same time as Mr. Smith, the 1st of September last.

Senator OVERMAN. How long were you in Russia?

Mr. WELSH. Just lacking a month of 2 years.

Senator OVERMAN. What was your office over there?

Mr. WELSH. I was in the National City Bank.

Maj. HUMES. In what capacity?

Mr. WELSH. As a junior officer; subaccountant.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Welsh, will you just state in your own way your observation of conditions from the time you reached Russia, during the revolution, and the conditions as they existed in Russia during that time, to the time of your departure?

Mr. WELSH. We arrived in Russia in October, 1916, which was several months before the March revolution, the first revolution. After we had been there some time, a month or so, and learned a little Russian, you could hear an undertone of protest against the Czar, and especially against Razputin and the Czarina. The revolution was looked for at the end of the war, when the soldiers returned, but came, though not as a surprise, yet earlier than people had expected.

The first days of the Russian revolution were perfectly wonderful. Madame Breshkovskaya yesterday spoke of the wonderful spirit of everyone at that time. I can confirm that; that the people, from the aristocracy right straight through to the soldiers on the streets, showed a wonderful feeling of brotherhood which, of course, was expected to be capitalized for the welfare of Russia, but which seems to have been perverted by the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Were you there when Razputin was killed?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. One question that has been asked and which I noted was this: What class of people came to Russia from America after the first revolution? I met most of the people that came into the bank, and met a great many of the Russians who came from New York to Russia, and in almost every instance they had been in this country from 9 to 10 years, from the time of the first Russian revolution in 1905 until this second revolution. This was not an unusual statement by many of them, and it was given by one in particular. When I asked him why he came back, he said, "Because I have come back to a free country." He asked me, "Do you think America is a free country?" I said, "I know it is." "Well," he said, "do you know you can not say anything you want or do anything there you want to?" I said, "No, not in time of war."

(At 4.55 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, to meet tomorrow, Saturday, February 15, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM W. WELSH—Resumed.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Welsh, will you take up your statement where you left off last night and tell us the conditions as you saw them and found them?

Mr. WELSH. I think I was relating about the influx of the Russians from America just after the revolution, and of the fact that as they came into the bank to bring in their American dollars for exchange, and to make change, it was not unusual at all to have them interrogate you and say, "What kind of a country do you think you have got over there in America? I suppose you think you have got freedom. Do you suppose that a person can, like they can in Russia, go out and say anything that he wants to with perfect freedom of speech?" I said, "No, the United States is at war, and every loyal American ought to keep his mouth shut." Many showed very strong antagonism to the United States. I made it a point to ask as many as possible how long they had been there. Most of them had come into the United States in 1905 and had remained in the United States 9 or 10 years. In almost every case none of them had applied for or taken out any citizenship papers, and they came back there condemning the United States.

Senator NELSON. And they were leaving the United States and coming back to Russia because there was no liberty in the United States?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. Because there was no liberty in the United States.

Senator NELSON. They were coming back to Russian freedom?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, they were coming back to Russian freedom. Of course, Russian freedom to them is freedom, because they are now on top. Many of them are Bolshevik leaders, like Shatoff, who has been spoken of.

Senator NELSON. But freedom to them meant the right to exploit everything and everybody else but themselves.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. To take what they wanted, do what they pleased, and shoot down whomsoever they pleased, if necessary.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were they well supplied with money?

Mr. WELSH. No, not necessarily. They were well clothed, as compared with the Russians, because a laboring man in this country would be a bourgeois in Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say a laboring man in this country would be a bourgeois over there?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, according to Russian standards.

Senator WOLCOTT. What makes him a bourgeois? Suppose he is not a house owner, but he does own household property, has got a piano and has a home and comfortable bedding, beds, bureaus and such things—a home nicely furnished—would that constitute him a bourgeois in Russia?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Even though he does not own his own home?

Mr. WELSH. Not only that, but if a man is well dressed and wears a white collar.

Senator WOLCOTT. He is a bourgeois?

Mr. WELSH. To the average hooligan, as they call the Bolshevik supporters, who are the rough necks there, every man that wears a white collar, or a woman that wears a hat, is a bourgeois.

Senator NELSON. The Russian workman wears a blouse, does he not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. With a kind of belt around it?

Senator OVERMAN. A woman who wears a hat is in the bourgeois class?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. It was not uncommon at all to hear conversations in the street cars of the peasant women, or working women, addressing women who had on hats, saying, "You people who wear hats, you think so-and-so," and then going on in a tirade against them; but the distinction was, "You women who wear hats."

Senator WOLCOTT. What I am trying to get at is this. When we speak of the bourgeoisie, many people have the idea that they are the class referred to in this country as the well to do, the people who have laid up some substance, saved a little something, and have got a little bit invested, but that is not the case, from what you say now. It simply means a person who is enabled to live in comfortable, decent surroundings, without necessarily owning any property other than household goods, comfortable household equipment and so on. Now, that is the bourgeois, is it, that kind of person?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. In other words, the typical laboring man would be a bourgeois in Russia?

Mr. WELSH. The laboring man in this country, as he lives, with what he owns and the conditions of his life, that condition of life put into Russia would make him a bourgeois?

Senator WOLCOTT. And would mark him as a person to incur the enmity of this ruling crowd there?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, of the Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. And they would take away what he had?

Mr. WELSH. They might take it away. But what surprises me is this. There are a great many supposed Bolsheviks in this country, who, if they were to step on Russian soil, would be immediately taken as bourgeoisie, and before they had been there very long would be considered counter revolutionists?

Senator WOLCOTT. They would soon find themselves in the class marked for starvation?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; they would be in that class.

Senator NELSON. Did these Americans that came over to Russia—I mean these East Side fellows that came over, that you have described—actively enter the ranks of the Bolshevik crowd?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And become officials among them?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. There were some—not many, but there were some—real Russians; and what I mean by real Russians is Russian-born, and not Russian Jews.

Senator NELSON. You mean Slavs?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; people who had been really political exiles, who came over in the hope, as Madam Breshkovskaya expressed it yesterday, that they now had realized their revolution. Those people are now in Russia, and if they have not starved, they are starving, because they can not work with the Bolsheviks, and with the Bolsheviks there is no compromise; you are either with them or against them.

Senator NELSON. There were a few there that were real Russians, you say. What were the balance? Were they Russian Hebrews?

Mr. WELSH. There were many, yes.

Senator NELSON. Did the Hebrew element predominate among them?

Mr. WELSH. I can not say it predominated, but it was very noticeable.

Senator NELSON. They joined the Bolsheviks, did they not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They were not like the others that you have described, that were disappointed?

Mr. WELSH. No. It might be well to explain a little the general fact that most of the Bolshevik leaders are Jews, in order to avoid misunderstanding. In Russia it is well known that three-fourths of the Bolshevik leaders are Jewish. This fact does not prove, however, that the Bolsheviks are pro-Jewish or that the Jews are pro-Bolshevik in Russia. In many cases it happens that decidedly the opposite is the case. The Bolsheviks claim to be first and last internationalists and anticapitalistic. I know of several cases in which well-to-do Jews have been persecuted in quite the same way as the other Russian bourgeois. A Jewish factory owner, whom I knew very well, was hounded for months by the Bolsheviks and spent most of his time away from his own home in the houses of his friends. He had finally succeeded, however, in buying off the Bolsheviks. He recited to me the instance of a friend of his, a Jew, who was arrested by the Bolsheviks and held for 100,000 rubles. His wife, on the advice of friends, protested that she could not pay that much. They told her to get what she could, and she returned with 50,000 rubles. They then said that she had gotten that so easily she could go and get some more. She returned the second time with 10,000 rubles, which she paid over. She was then told if she wanted her husband she could have his body.

Bolshevism can not be explained along racial lines alone. The Bolsheviks are made up of the very worst elements of many races. It is important, however, that Jews in this country should not favor Bolshevism because of any liberties or privileges which they may think are being accorded to the Jews in Russia by the Bolsheviks. They should study the facts carefully and not be prejudiced by any racial feeling, or they are sure to bring the odium of Bolshevism unjustly to the door of the Jew. The best Jews in this country would do well to brand the Jewish Bolsheviks in Russia as anti-Jews, which they really are, for they bring nothing but discredit to the Jewish race.

Senator OVERMAN. It was testified yesterday that they had searching parties that went into people's houses at all times of the day and all times of the night, and took food and everything they found. Were these people that went over from this country who were there, this crowd you described, in the searching parties, in order to maraud, raid, steal, and kill?

Mr. WELSH. No, the searching is done by the soldiers and people lower down. These people who come over from the United States, being intelligent, educated people, became naturally the leaders. As an instance of who might make up these searching parties, take this case: The sweetheart of our maid was the son of a Bolshevik commissar, though he himself was not a Bolshevik, and we had conversations many times in our house. He had been working for the Trayolgolnik Rubber Company, there, which was shut down because they expected the Germans to come in. That is the largest rubber company, perhaps, in the world. There was no work. Although his father was a Bolshevik, he was not a Bolshevik, yet he joined in with these searching parties; for, as he said to me, "If I do not do it, somebody else will, and I have to live."

I have with me some coins that he sold to me that were taken in these searches. Some of his young Red Guard friends who used to come to the house and have tea with myself and the others would say, "Of course, we are working for the Bolsheviks, because we have got to live." But I remember in the month of June last, when everyone was anticipating the overthrow of the Bolsheviks, these same two were saying that they, too, expected their overthrow, and I asked, "Then what?" "Then we will have a constitutional government, perhaps the cadets, or social revolutionists, and we will work for them."

I spoke on a Tuesday night in May with this particular young boy, the sweetheart of the maid. On Thursday morning at 5 o'clock I was awakened by soldiers coming into my bedroom and asking for my passport. They were polite and said, "Do you know Victor Stronberg?" I said, "Yes." They said, "Who is he?" I said, "He is engaged to our maid." They said, "Have you seen him lately?" I said, "I saw him two or three nights ago." "Did you see him last night?" I said, "No." "Did you see him the night before?" "No." "That is all." They went out.

I put on a bathrobe and went out into the kitchen, where soldiers were stationed. In the dining room they had my maid and another young Russian who had also been a soldier, but was not a Bolshevik. They were cross-examining them. I asked the Bolshevik commissar what it was all about. He said, "These things we do not talk about in public."

They took the maid and the soldier off at 7 o'clock in the morning. They were held under arrest until 7 o'clock at night. They were brought before the commissar and the commissar said to the maid, "Do you know Victor Stronberg?" The maid answered, "Yes; I was engaged to marry him." The commissar said, "I simply want to tell you that he was shot last night." There was no reason given, and, as far as I know, even though the father of the boy was a Bolshevik commissar, they had not been able to ascertain why he was shot. There were conjectures, but they did not give reasons. They did not need to.

Senator STERLING. Have you reason to suppose that there were many such executions as that, summary executions without trial or hearing?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. I want to put in here one statement. A person that comes out of Russia and who has been out of Russia one month is not in a position to state what is the condition in Russia at the present time. You can tell what the trend of events has been. But for people who have come out of Russia a year ago to stand up and talk as authorities on Russia is ridiculous.

People might ask me if I personally knew of British or Americans who were persecuted while I was there. I left on the 1st of September. My answer would be, no. The British were not allowed to leave; that is, the young British of military age were not allowed out of Russia. However, a young Englishman who was connected with our bank succeeded in escaping from Russia one month later. We came out the week when the terrorism began, when Lenine was shot at and Uritsky was killed in Petrograd, and the next week came out the statement, "For every Bolshevik, 1,000 bourgeoisie."

Senator STERLING. What did that mean?

Mr. WELSH. That meant that they would stand up against the wall 1,000 bourgeoisie for every Bolshevik that was shot. We, of course—many of us that were leaving there—said, "Why did they not get Lenine? We were sorry they missed him." The Englishman who came out a month later said, "I know you said that when you came out, but we who remained were down on our knees every night praying God that they would not get him, knowing that if they did, they would go through with their threat and stand us up against the wall;" and he stated that for 10 nights straight—every night for 10 nights straight—in Moscow they shot 150 bourgeoisie; arrested them at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning and shot them before daybreak. He was a man that had won the Georgian Cross—the Russian Georgian Cross.

Senator STERLING. What is that cross awarded for?

tions, and, as he told me afterwards, "As you know, we got so that we did not mind the promiscuous shooting you heard every night going on, because they were holdups, usually, and soldiers shooting guns off in the air, but the thing that got on your nerves was this, that in the daytime you would see a group of 30 or 40 well-dressed people surrounded by Red Guards walking through the streets, and then at 12 or 1 o'clock you heard the shots going "putt, putt, putt," knowing that for each shot some one was being stood up against the wall, without any question." He said that was the thing that unnerved you. They not only stood them up against the wall, but published their names in the papers: and if such papers could be gotten out of Russia you could get the names of the leading people who were shot.

Not only that, but they published the names of others that they held as hostages, saying these, too, would be shot if any more attempts were made on the lives of Bolshevik commissars.

I have gotten away from your question, but I wanted to make the point that I could not say from what I had gone through personally that the Americans or foreigners were persecuted, because the Americans were fairly well treated: but this Englishman who came out one month later described a condition that was completely changed. He himself for five nights did not sleep in his own house, but had to sleep from place to place. At one time he heard a searching party come into the courtyard demanding to know were there any bourgeoisie there. He was on the top floor with a Swedish friend of his, a young journalist and very poor, and the Russian doorkeeper down below said, "No, there is only one family of poor foreigners upstairs, who have nothing, so there is no need to look for them." But for five nights he himself did not sleep in his own house.

Senator NELSON. Did you notice any activity of the Germans in connection with the Bolshevik forces?

Mr. WELSH. As related yesterday, when we came to evacuate from Petrograd and applied for our permits, Consul Treadwell, who had come back to see the last of us Americans out—there were five or six of us, the manager of our bank and his English secretary, the American correspondent, Graham Taylor, and myself—Consul Treadwell, who had come back from Vologda on what was then a perilous trip, to get us out, said that when he applied for the permit to get out of Petrograd, they spoke only German at the commission.

Senator NELSON. Were there German officers there—military officers?

Mr. WELSH. There was a German commission from Germany in Petrograd at the time. The German war prisoners were at perfect liberty; and the thing that aroused your enmity was to see them walking about the streets in groups. And not only that, but the Germans had sent in and reclothed them with the parade uniform that had been discarded by the old German army, and they would appear on the streets with fine scarlet red coats, with white braid, and blue coats, with yellow braid, parading up and down the streets of Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. With the old German military uniform?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they were unmolested?

Mr. WELSH. Unmolested, speaking German on the streets of Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. There seemed, then, according to that, to be an affiliation or sympathy between these German soldiers and the Bolsheviks?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, at that time. As I say, the embassies had evacuated in February, and our bank and a number of the other interests evacuated on the 9th of March, Mr. Treadwell engineering all of this, taking care of all of it; and then he returned and came back with us, the few that I have spoken of that were left.

We were in daily communication as to the progress of the Germans. As you know, they took Riga, and came on and took Reval, and came on and took Narva, and came on and took Luga, and they were within four hours of Petrograd, and might have walked in at any time. There was no defense whatever. We, of course, were anxious to stay to the very last minute, but we did not wish to be caught. We were told by the neutral embassies that if we did not leave on the next day, which was the 20th of March, we would be caught by the Germans, so naturally we went out on the night of the 19th of March.

Mr. Smith yesterday recited the incident of our train being stopped after we were three-quarters of an hour out of Petrograd, and Bill Shatoff, the commissar, putting his head through the door, saying, "Well, boys, you are taking a little trip?" And we answered in American slang, "Yes, Bill, we are going down the line." "Well," he said, "I've got to look you over." So we gave him our passports, and he came back in about half an hour and said, "I am sorry, boys, but you have got to sleep on the Island to-night. You can't get over to Brooklyn; the subway ain't running." We asked, "What is the big idea?" "Well," he said, "you can't run the Siberian express through to Vladivostok for four or five people, can you? Besides yourselves, there are only five or six people that have got passports to go on." "Well, what's to be done?" He said, "I don't see anything to do but to go back to Petrograd."

That was most promising for us, just pulling out, and knowing that the German Government was already in Petrograd, and German-speaking people in charge of the department where we got our permits to leave Petrograd, to be told that there was nothing to do but to go back again. Brown knew Shatoff because he had seen him and been with him a little there in Petrograd, so he took it upon himself to take Bill Shatoff aside and see what could be done, and he said he would see what he could do. Shatoff came back in half an hour or so, making it about an hour that we were held up, and said, "Well, boys, it is all fixed up. You may run along now. Give my regards to Broadway." He was then the head commissar of the Nicolai Railroad, which is the chief railroad between Moscow and Petrograd, and also the Siberian line.

Senator NELSON. He wanted to be seen, did he not?

Mr. WELSH. Well, he didn't mind a little side play. I think it can be verified—I do not know for sure, but he is something like the chief of police, or the chief of the military forces in Petrograd at the present time.

Senator STERLING. Do you know what his business had been before going to Russia?

Mr. WELSH. I do not, but it could be verified easily enough.

Senator NELSON. Did he live in America?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; otherwise he would not have known Brooklyn and the island so well.

Senator NELSON. He had graduated on the East Side?

Mr. WELSH. Perhaps you might put it that way.

Senator NELSON. You have a Bolshevik school there, have you not?

Mr. WELSH. Well, I have been in Russia for two years, and I can hardly speak for what is happening here now.

There is one point I would like to make, too, that a great many real Russians came back at the time of the revolution. A train was sent out specially to release Babushka and bring her to Petrograd, and it was a wonderful feeling that all the Russians showed. I have a friend—a friend because she came to work in our bank—the wife of a Russian secretary to a neutral country, who returned after the revolution. She had been always a revolutionist. Her father had been worth millions at one time. She had been worth several millions in her own name.

Maj. HUMES. You are speaking of rubles, now?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, rubles; which before the war were worth 50 cents to our dollar here. Her father during the war lost his money. She lost hers trying to help him. She came back, and there being no livelihood, the Bolsheviks having confiscated all the securities and tied up all the deposits in the banks, she went to work in one of the banks. I got to know her very well, a very refined woman, from a family that has been 200 years in the imperial court. She had been in the Russian court since her debut; had been in the neutral court. She was a very refined woman.

Some of us went back and forth from Petrograd to Vologda trying to attend to our interests. There were only just a few of us Americans who did that, and going back and forth we used to bring food. She wrote me in Vologda that she had gone to the doctor, who had ordered her to have an operation for appendicitis, but, going home, she had found her maid sick with influenza. She said, "I am nursing her night and day." I returned on the seventh day of the maid's illness to Petrograd. This woman, who had been ordered by the doctors to have an operation for appendicitis, was waiting on her maid night and day, attending to her. It only goes to show the fine feeling that is shown by many of the aristocracy and well to do and educated people for their servants.

The maid died after 12 days, and the woman was practically a wreck. She had not been able to have her operation, and her condition was such that she could not have stood one. We had been able to bring some food from Vologda, and she used to laugh and say, "The doctor has told me that I should have white bread, that I should have butter, that I should have chicken broth." She said, "Just imagine it!" There was absolutely nothing of that kind in Petrograd. We brought in some white flour and we brought in some fresh eggs, and we brought in some butter. I succeeded in getting a little from the American Red Cross for her. The Red Cross supplies were just then running out. She regained, not her health, but some strength, and was able to get up and go around, and she went back to the bank, working.

When we came out on the special train from Moscow on the 26th of August to Petrograd, we were in Petrograd five days, held up by the Bolsheviks; but on the 1st of September we left.

Senator STERLING. The first of this last September?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. I got to see this woman again, and to ask her what she was doing. The Bolsheviks were giving people in the fourth class nothing to eat at all. Further than that, they had instituted a house-to-house inspection where they reported if people were caught buying outside the regular system of cards. If they did that they were reported as engaged in speculation; and people buying even at exorbitant prices were subject to charges of speculation for buying food, if on the card system they were not entitled to it, the Bolshevik's theory being, "Let them get out and work." This woman, who, as I say, was highly refined, had been in the imperial court for years, in answer to my question as to what she was doing, said, "For the past week I have been digging potatoes, up to my knees in mud, for a pound of bread and 8 rubles a day." You can know what 8 rubles means when I tell you that butter was 30 rubles a pound, sugar was 30 rubles a pound and bread was 12 rubles a pound; and yet this woman was digging potatoes for a pound of bread and 8 rubles a day.

Senator STERLING. What kind of bread was it?

Mr. WELSH. It was a black bread, which at one time almost ruined our stomachs, but it was the only thing you could get. If you can imagine a bread made out of the scrapings of the bottom of a bran bin, you have a description of the bread.

This woman told me she had contemplated committing suicide, and would have done so except for her son; and while she was nursing her maid she had said, "Out of my personal acquaintances in the court, 23 women have committed suicide since the revolution because of the conditions." She added, "Now, imagine what that would mean to you if you could pick out 23 women acquaintances that you knew of that had committed suicide."

Maj. HUMES. This compensation of 8 rubles a day and a pound of bread, that was paid by the Bolshevik government, was it not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. They were paying that?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. That was their wage scale?

Mr. WELSH. That was their means of getting the bourgeoisie into the working classes.

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. WELSH. It is all very well for a Russian peasant woman, who is as strong as a man, and much stronger than the average American, I dare say. She can go out and dig potatoes and eat black bread, and things of that kind. But for a highly cultured woman of that class of people, to demand that she and that class of people go out and do the same thing is brutal.

Senator WOLCOTT. You used the expression awhile ago that they had to get out and work. I want to know what that expression means when it is used by a typical Bolshevik.

MR. WELSH. Digging potatoes. First or second class work. That is, manual labor. You can get the most on your bread card for that kind of labor.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do they consider, for instance, clerical work as working?

MR. WELSH. Yes, that is second class.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is not favored, then?

MR. WELSH. It is favored, but a person who does that does not need as much sustenance as the laboring man.

Senator WOLCOTT. How do they regard practicing medicine? Is that regarded as work?

MR. WELSH. That is in the third class, as far as I remember; and the lawyers are also in the third class, or in the fourth class.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is a school-teacher; we will say, a college professor?

MR. WELSH. I think Madam Breshkovskaya made the point yesterday that there are not any universities or schools going except those run by the Bolsheviks, and that means this, that in all the universities and all the schools that were going, the Bolsheviks turned out the teachers, or they were stopped because of the influenza, or because of lack of funds and things of that kind. Then the Bolsheviks tried to reorganize these with their teachers, but a great many teachers throughout Russia are not in a position to teach.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, do you know how the Bolsheviks regard the profession of teaching?

MR. WELSH. Those who are teaching for them as Bolsheviks, of course, receive their bread allowance, and so forth.

Senator WOLCOTT. No, but I mean the people who teach the young; not those who teach them to read and write, but those who go into the little branches of education a little bit higher—mathematics?

MR. WELSH. The people who have been teaching the young and doing that, who could not find it compatible to become Bolshevik, of course they have no occupation, and enter into the class—well, it is open to them to fall into either of the other two classes. They can go out and work by the day, and many of them do. I know personally of some who have taken up shoemaking, the sewing of shoes, the making of shoes by hand—anything to earn a living. But their old teaching professions, from the old schools, have been done away with. My Russian teacher, who had taught in one of the universities—girls' universities—and two or three other places, was turned out in every case. She had always been a social revolutionist. The last I heard of her, her brother had come in to visit from Viborg. She had met him, but his passport had to be turned in when coming into Petrograd. They were planning to go to their family in Kiev. The brother went, a week later, to get his passport, and he never returned. She spent a week or ten days going through all the prisons in Petrograd, and finally located him. She went to Uritsky, the chief commissar, to find out why he was arrested, and what prospect there was of his being released. He said, "Your brother was in Finland with the White Guard, and is a White Guard." She said, "You have no proof of it." "Well, he is an officer, and he was there, and," he added, "if we did to him like the White Guard did to the Red Guard, you could have his body by now, and I do not see any reason why we should not do it yet."

We had brought some flour from Vologda for her, and as urgent as the need of flour was, she never came for a week to get it, because of her efforts in trying to get some relief to her brother, and she told me they had to resort to all the old methods that you may have heard of, of the Russian exile, baking a loaf of bread and putting into the middle of it a note, and all such subterfuges, to get communication with her brother. That is one case that I know of.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether her brother was shot or not?

Mr. WELSH. I never got to see the teacher again, but the possibilities are that he was, because they were shooting prisoners because they could not feed them.

One month later, after we came out, one of the employees of our bank, who was a Serb, who came out later because he could not come out with us, told me that his landlord was arrested. That was at night, because they always come in the early morning and the night. The landlady went to the Bolsheviks the next morning to see if she could do anything for her husband, bring him some food, or anything, and they said, "What do you think we are running, a hotel? If you want his body, you may have it."

Senator NELSON. Did you see any looting or taking possession of houses and buildings?

Mr. WELSH. I heard of any amount of it.

Senator NELSON. Can you describe some of it?

Mr. WELSH. I did not see it personally, although this happened to be one of the members of the British Embassy. He was going through what they call Narodny Dom Park—that is, the People's House Park—with another friend. He was held up. It was in the late afternoon. His fur coat and valuables were taken away, and while he stood there, people passing by within 20 feet did not dare to give any assistance. They hurried along so that they would not be stopped.

If this is the time, I would like to give a description of what happened to the Russian banks; but in answer to this other question, let me say this: Almost all banking in Russia is done in cash. If it was a large sum, if the people had the necessary permit for you to give them a large sum of money, which took three or four days to get, you would give them a check on the State Bank, and they would go to the State Bank, and after getting a permit to stand in line they would go the next day and stand in line, and if successful would get their cash the next day. The operation would take about four days. Inside of the State Bank there were spotters.

Senator NELSON. Spotters?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, spotters for hooligans or highwaymen outside, who would pass the word along, saying, "Such and such people are coming out with 100,000 or 200,000 rubles in cash." Then as they would go along the street with the cash, an automobile would drive up to the curb, men would jump out and hold them up, take the cash, and drive off with it. It was a constant danger in sending out bank messengers, and if a man stayed out over two or three hours, it was the thought that possibly he was held up.

In May there were two instances where bank messengers, or factory messengers, I forget which, that is messengers sent out by large factories to get cash to pay the workmen, were held up, or rather, shot. The automobile drove up to the curb and the men jumped out and shot the bank messenger and then took the money off the body, in broad daylight.

Senator OVERMAN. How did they treat the women? What were their morals?

Mr. WELSH. Well, I can not say personally, because I do not know. I should think that Dr. Simons, or somebody who was more or less interested in the social conditions, in that way, would be a better authority. I was interested more in what happened to the banks.

Maj. HUMES. Tell about the Russian banks.

Senator NELSON. Russia has only one central bank, has it not?

Mr. WELSH. When, now or——

Senator NELSON. No, they did have?

Mr. WELSH. No, Russia had as many as 35 banks. They have but one, now.

Senator NELSON. They had 35 banks in Russia?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Government banks?

Mr. WELSH. No.

Senator NELSON. That is what I mean; how many government banks did they have?

Mr. WELSH. They had one State bank.

Senator NELSON. That is what I mean; one government bank.

Mr. WELSH. Yes; but besides that, they had 30 or 35 very large banks.

Senator NELSON. But they were private banks?

Mr. WELSH. They were private banks.

Senator NELSON. They were not state banks?

Mr. WELSH. Not state banks.

Senator NELSON. The government had only one, the Imperial Bank there at Petrograd?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir. Some of these banks were larger than any we have in the United States.

Senator NELSON. The gold reserve was kept in this state bank, as you call it?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. For the whole country?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you remember what that was before the revolution?

Mr. WELSH. I am not sure. It could be verified. There are statistics in this country on that. I think it was 1,000,000,000 rubles gold.

Senator NELSON. Yes; about $500,000,000 in our money?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; $500,000,000.

Senator NELSON. What was their paper circulation at that time—I mean, before the revolution?

Mr. WELSH. Before the revolution? It is better to go to the actual statistics on that, which may be had in this country.

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to know the amount of paper issued now.

Mr. WELSH. Well, it is reported that the budget for the Bolsheviks for the year was something like 70,000,000,000 rubles, which must be printed.

Senator NELSON. What became of that gold reserve in the State Bank?

Mr. WELSH. You may have read in the papers that as a part of the Brest-Litovsk treaty a payment in gold was made to Germany.

Senator NELSON. About $200,000,000?

Mr. WELSH. $200,000,000?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WELSH. And the actual gold was transferred to Berlin.

Senator NELSON. And what became of the balance? Did the Bolsheviks take it?

Mr. WELSH. Well, you say the Bolsheviks. The Bolsheviks have taken over the State Bank and all the private banks.

Senator NELSON. Yes; so that they took it over—the whole thing?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Are they running the State Bank now?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Through their officials?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Have they taken it out of the hands of the old officials?

Mr. WELSH. Oh, yes, sir; the Bolsheviks came into power on the 7th of November, our style—the 25th of October, Russian style.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know who the head man is, on top, of all these banks, the way they are now?

Mr. WELSH. He changes. I do not know who he is now.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you known any of them?

Mr. WELSH. Not personally.

Senator WOLCOTT. But do you know about him?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was he a banking man?

Mr. WELSH. No; I think he was a lawyer.

Senator WOLCOTT. A lawyer?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. He became the head of all these banks?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; I think it would make it clearer just to sketch what happened to the Russian banks, and then you can question me.

Senator NELSON. Yes; that is what I would like to know.

Mr. WELSH. When the Bolsheviks came into power they seized the State Bank on the 25th of October, Russian style (the 7th of November). The other banks went on a strike, so to speak, and would not have anything to do with the State Bank. They were at a disadvantage, however, because their cash reserves were in the State Bank, and under the uncertainty people would not deposit money—cash. Therefore the banks soon ran out of actual cash. They were forced, from circumstances, to come to some kind of an understanding with the Bolsheviks, which they tried to do. It was unsatisfactory, both to the bank people and to the Bolsheviks, and the Bolsheviks cut the Gordian knot by seizing all of the banks on the 14th of December, Russian style, the 27th of November, our style. On that morning a group of soldiers entered each one of the banks and seized it in the name of the People's Bank. They seized the books. All the Russian clerks went on a strike. Those clerks remained on a strike for six months.

Senator NELSON. In those banks?

Mr. WELSH. In those banks. Now, if you will kindly keep these facts in mind, you can get a picture of the chaos and try to apply it to the United States. You can see what happened. These clerks remained on strike for six months. The Bolsheviks, wholly undaunted, put in their own men to run the banks. The banks remained closed three or four weeks, and after that the Bolsheviks announced that they would open four branches of the People's Bank. Into those four branches they threw——

Senator NELSON. Where were those places?

Mr. WELSH. They picked out four of the largest old banks, and called them the domiciles of the first, second, third, and fourth branches of the People's Bank.

Senator NELSON. At what points were those located?

Mr. WELSH. I am speaking only of Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. WELSH. This was only in Petrograd, because the head offices were in Petrograd.

Senator WOLCOTT. Just a moment. The 35 banks you spoke of a moment ago were all in Petrograd?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; the bank system of Russia is these 35 banks, having offices, branches, all through Russia. Their head offices are in Petrograd, and it is not like it is here, where we have thousands of State and national banks. There were 35, very large banks, with branches all through Russia, so that the seizure of those banks meant the seizure of the banking system of Russia.

Into each of those four or five former banks were put branches of the People's Bank. Now, you can get the picture by imagining that if the Guarantee Trust Co. was picked as one of the branches, the books from the First National Bank and the National City Bank, and, perhaps, from the Chatham Bank and three or four others would be taken to those premises and put into that bank. Everyone had to go to the one bank for money.

Senator NELSON. That is, the 35 banks were consolidated into four?

Mr. WELSH. Into four. Many of the books were lost. Many of them were retained by the old employees, hidden by them. The Bolsheviks could not get them. Many of them were lost in transporting them, because the soldiers knew absolutely nothing of the value of those books. In fact, in the former Siberian Bank they were unable to find one of the current account books for six months.

Senator NELSON. In the Siberian Bank?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. It was literal chaos. You could not get anything done, and every bank transaction that was done, in order to get it through you had to send some one personally. I have gone many, many times to the Russian banks to see a transaction put through, and it would take perhaps three weeks, following it up continuously, to get a transaction effected which in this country is done through the clearing house within one or two hours on the same day.

Senator NELSON. How did the public get along under those conditions? How did they manage to get money out of the banks?

Mr. WELSH. They did not get it out of the banks. They made a ruling that the workingman being unable to live on 600 rubles a month, no one was allowed to draw more than 600 rubles a month from their current account. That meant that people ran out of cash. They had to sell their valuables and what they could, or go out and dig potatoes, as I have said, in order to gain a livelihood. In Petrograd when we left, all over on the central streets there were, by tens and twenties, commission shops where you could buy some of the finest old antiques, gold and silver and everything you could think of, at ridiculous prices, sold by bourgeois who were selling them for money in order to get food.

Senator NELSON. There was a perfect chaos then prevailing in the bank business?

Mr. WELSH. Perfect chaos; and the same thing took place in the factories, in industry.

Senator NELSON. Did these leaders abstract any of the funds of the bank? Did they help themselves to the funds of the bank?

Mr. WELSH. I can not answer that authoritatively, but I can cite one or two cases which may throw light on it. No one was allowed to withdraw money, as I said, over the amount of 600 rubles a month, except factories for the purpose of buying materials or paying the workmen, and then only when the committee of the workmen in charge of the factory gave their O. K. These committees in the beginning oftentimes would come to the employer and say, "Our salaries are such and such, and we need so much;" and there was several hundred per cent increase in salaries. They would say, "You draw a check on your account for it and we will get the money." A manufacturer might protest and say, "We have no funds in the bank." "That does not make any difference. You draw a check and we will get the money." Many, many accounts have been debited with checks, in which there were not sufficient funds to pay, up, I should say, into the millions. How the bank officials, the Bolshevik bank officials, are ever to make the adjustment, a banker can not imagine.

Senator NELSON. And you can not tell, with regard to these men who profess to draw money out for manufacturing purposes, whether they apply it to that or not?

Mr. WELSH. No. The situation became such that if a manufacturer protested they simply came in to him with guns and said, "Either you do as we say, or get out."

Senator NELSON. Did the workmen take possession of the factories?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they appointed committees to run them?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Did they succeed in operating them?

Mr. WELSH. They succeeded for perhaps a month or two, until materials ran out and until funds ran out, and they could not realize on anything.

Senator NELSON. What did they do then?

Mr. WELSH. Then they quit.

Senator NELSON. And what became of the workmen?

Mr. WELSH. They went back to the villages.

Senator NELSON. Oh; in the country?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. In Petrograd at the time of the revolution there were upward of 3,000,000 people. In Petrograd at the present time, or when we came out, it was stated that there were not over 500,000 or 600,000. The workmen have gone back into the country.

Senator NELSON. Among the peasants?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. The bourgeoisie have tried to find refuge where they could, and what few people there are left now are starving to death. There can be no doubt about it.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think those workmen, after they get back among the peasants, after they have failed in their efforts to run the factories, will see a new light?

Mr. WELSH. I think most of them have.

Senator NELSON. And they will be cured?

Mr. WELSH. Most of them are cured. As Babushka pointed out yesterday, there is very little Bolshevism in the country among the peasants. There is Bolshevism, if you want to call it such, in so far as the Bolsheviks promised the land to the peasants; but that was a promise which all friends of Russia made to the peasants. When the peasants, then, were allowed to take the land, they had no further interest in Bolshevism, and they are anti-Bolshevik.

Senator NELSON. Are you familiar with the land system of Russia?

Mr. WELSH. Well, somewhat; but I am not—

Senator NELSON. As I understand it, and I want to see if I am correct, after the serfs were emancipated, the lands were assigned to the village communities—what they call mirs over there—and were not in absolute, individual ownership, but were assigned to the communities, and then these village communities, through their authority, allocated lands to the peasants, either from year to year or for a period; is that correct?

Mr. WELSH. That is correct; yes.

Senator NELSON. Then there grew up a number of peasants who would buy out their land allotments?

Mr. WELSH. Buy them out; yes. They now would be landowners and bourgeoisie.

Senator NELSON. Yes. They would be capitalists.

Mr. WELSH. Yes; they are capitalists; and yet born peasants; perhaps their grandfathers were serfs. They themselves peasants, and the backbone of Russia, as our American farmers are the backbone of America.

Senator NELSON. This land confiscation, mainly, whatever there is done so far, is to confiscate the estates of the big land owners?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Down in the black belt, in the Ukraine and that country, there are large landed estates in private ownerships, or were before the revolution; is not that the case?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And it is probably those lands they are confiscating and attempting to apportion among the peasants?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; but there is no system. The peasants living upon a great estate would take it upon themselves to take the estate, and the way they would take it would be that instead of saving the cattle and swine, and things of value, they would come in and burn the houses, and destroy the cattle, chickens, etc., because they have no conception of preservation.

Senator NELSON. The peasant farmers over there do not, like our farmers, live each on his own individual piece of land, but they live in villages, do they not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And then they go out from these villages each day and cultivate their patches of land?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they for many years under the Czar's government have had a sort of local government in those villages, and have elected their own communal councils, have they not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. So that they had a sort of local government, under the old system?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Now, this new system of the Bolsheviki is to establish what they call soviets in all these villages, is it not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And also in the cities; and have these soviets elect delegates to the general soviet at Petrograd, is not that it?

Mr. WELSH. That in theory is it.

Senator NELSON. I mean that is their theory.

Mr. WELSH. It is not the way it practically works out, because it works out practically that Moscow sends out from Moscow representatives who call themselves and make themselves the soviets in the towns and the villages.

Maj. HUMES. Senator Nelson, I have the land regulations, if you would like to have them read at this point.

Senator NELSON. You have the present regulations?

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Senator NELSON. But not the old regulations?

Maj. HUMES. No, but I have the Lenine order.

Senator NELSON. You might put that in the record, if you have it.

Maj. HUMES. I was going to put it in the record, but I thought perhaps you would like to read it.

Senator NELSON. I know something about their present land regulations. I was referring to the old system.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there anything else from this witness?

Maj. HUMES. Did you know Mr. Treadwell?

Mr. WELSH. I got to know him very well and to think very highly of him.

Maj. HUMES. What position did he occupy?

Mr. WELSH. He was the American consul in Petrograd at the time of the evacuation of the allies from Russia.

Maj. HUMES. Was he arrested by the Bolsheviki?

Mr. WELSH. He was not arrested at that time, but under orders from the consul general at Moscow, he was sent into Tashkend, Turkestan, where he took over not only the American interests but the allied and British interests, and he was arrested there and held by the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. That is down below the Caspian Sea?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; and as far as I know now, he is still held by the Bolsheviks.

Senator OVERMAN. You say Treadwell is held by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; our American counsel at Petrograd is held in Tashkend by the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Did you become acquainted with Albert Rhys Williams over there?

Mr. WELSH. No; personally, I did not.

Senator NELSON. Do you know anything of his activities there?

Mr. WELSH. Personally, I do not. In fact, he was a stranger to me until I heard of him over here.

Senator NELSON. He did not do any business with your bank?

Mr. WELSH. Not that I know of.

Senator NELSON. Or with any of these Russian banks?

Mr. WELSH. He may have with the Russian banks.

Senator OVERMAN. Where did the Red Cross keep their money?

Mr. WELSH. Largely in our bank, I believe.

Senator OVERMAN. Who managed the Red Cross funds over there?

Mr. WELSH. Well, while Col. Thompson was there it was handled under him as chairman, and under whoever was the authorized representative of the Red Cross.

Senator STERLING. Were you there at the breaking out of the revolution in March, 1917?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir; I went to Petrograd four or five months before that, and remained almost two years during this whole period.

Senator OVERMAN. Was Col. Thompson over there?

Mr. WELSH. Yes; he was in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Did he affiliate with the Bolshevik people?

Mr. WELSH. Well, it is a question just what you mean by affiliating. Of course, we all had to work with the Bolsheviks because there was no other government.

Senator OVERMAN. I got a letter this morning—I do not know whether there is any truth in it or not—stating that he had contributed funds to the Bolshevik Government. Do you know anything about that?

Mr. WELSH. Personally, I do not; but it can be verified from other sources—that is, verified whether it is true or not.

Senator OVERMAN. I am getting letters from all sorts of people, and I do not know whether they are true or not.

Senator WOLCOTT. It can be verified from what sort of other sources—individuals, or through banking records?

Mr. WELSH. Not through bank records, I do not think.

Senator NELSON. Was he not carrying on propaganda there to have himself appointed minister from this country to the Bolshevik Government?

Senator OVERMAN. That is Robins you are thinking of.

Mr. WELSH. I do not think Col. Thompson did. I might say here that when the Bolsheviks came in they came in with their principles and promises which, on the face of them, as Breshkovskaya said, were taken over from the socialists and people who agreed with the latter, and many of us felt a certain sympathy, you might say, with the Bolsheviks and what they were trying to do; but afterwards, when the best Bolsheviks found that it was incompatible for them to stay in with the other robbers and people who were at the head of it, who had begun to pervert all the principles and things they were standing for, everyone was out of sympathy with them, and many of the Americans, who may have been in Russia at the time when Bolshevism was in good favor, may have carried away that impression and still hold it, but it is an erroneous impression which would have been corrected if they had stayed in Russia and seen how the Bolsheviks perverted these same principles down through the months that followed.

Senator STERLING. You say you were there at the time of the revolution, when the Tsar was deposed?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. The Duma was in session then, was it not?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. I would like to have your opinion in regard to that. Was there confidence expressed in the Duma and the leaders of the Duma at that time, as to the kind of government they might work out.

Mr. WELSH. There was a wonderful confidence. The spirit of the Russian Revolution was perfectly wonderful. It was like a great moment in the life of a nation. And that is the hopeful thing about Russia, because the Russian people showed at that time what was in them. They may have gone back, they may be depressed now, and the people are suffering with melancholia, but that is the great sustaining hope that people like Breshkovskaya have; and the hope for Russia is, without question, that Russia is going to right herself.

Senator STERLING. Was there faith in such leaders as the president of the Duma, and Miliukov, and others of that class?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, at that time; and later with Kerensky and the others. I have heard Breshkovskaya state that they became entangled in their legalisms, as to whether or not a thing was legal and they lost sight of the fact that the thing to do was to put things into action. So the people became impatient with them, and when the Bolsheviks said they could do what the Kerensky government and the others could not do, the Bolsheviks succeeded in getting into power.

Senator STERLING. When Kerensky came in power there was general confidence in him?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, there was remarkable confidence. He was the man of the hour at that time.

Senator STERLING. What was the reason for his failure?

Mr. WELSH. I think Breshkovskaya stated here that he was lost in the intricacies of his legal mind. He would debate as to whether a thing was legal to be done, when the thing to do was to decide whether it was to be done or not immediately. He hesitated.

Senator OVERMAN. I was impressed with what you said as to the state of mind there now being one of melancholia.

Mr. WELSH. As I said a few minutes ago—going back to that—from the time we evacuated on March 19th, up until June 24th, I made four trips to Petrograd, and then again was in Petrograd during the week from the 26th of August to the 1st of September. Going out from where we were in Vologda, where there was a little food, a little refreshment, and life seemed a little brighter, to come back into Petrograd was terribly depressing. All your friends that were left there, all the people that you knew, were suffering from melancholia, and you just could not help but feel terribly depressed at the hopelessness of the whole situation; and then people would turn and ask, "What is America going to do?" And we, as Americans, would try to encourage them, and would say that America was going to come to their help, and we believed it would.

Senator STERLING. In what way did you think that America would come to their help?

Mr. WELSH. Every foreigner in Russia at that time looked on the Archangel expedition as a real movement for intervention. We were at Vologda at the time. There were no Bolshevik troops there except 300 Lettish troops, and the commandant of the Lettish troops said himself that they would not fight if the allies came, because they were there for police duty. In fact, a Lett who was not a soldier, but had married and was a very respectable man, told us that he could get these same Letts to take a boat, arm it, and escort us to the allied lines.

Senator OVERMAN. What would be the result if intervention took place? Would these peasants that are sad and depressed, together with the bourgeoisie who are starving, appreciate America's coming in there, and rally to the cause?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, absolutely. They looked forward to it, and we looked forward to it when we were in Vologda. We expected each week that the allies were coming down. They had the whole railroad, and they might have come on a train right straight down to Vologda, without any interference at all. We expected it. And the Bolsheviks in Moscow expected it, and arrested the British and French embassy officials as hostages. They did not come. Many of the people who were interested in throwing the Bolsheviks out showed this, and became marked by the Bolsheviks, and later had to pay the penalty with their lives. They expected the allies to come in and give them relief. They tried to do what they could, and when the allied help failed them, they were taken by the Bolsheviks and executed.

Senator STERLING. How much allied help do you think would have been required for the Czecho-Slovaks and the loyal Russian Army, such as there was of it, to have saved Moscow?

Mr. WELSH. At that time, when the allies took Archangel, 20,000 troops, we all believed—although we were not military authorities—might have taken Moscow and Petrograd and established order out of chaos.

Senator STERLING. Did not the Czecho-Slovaks take several towns there, Samara among them, against greatly superior forces of Bolsheviks?

Mr. WELSH. Against tremendously superior forces. They took Samara; they took Kazan; they took Perm; they took most of those places.

Senator STERLING. Ufa is one.

Mr. WELSH. Yes; Ufa—without any resistance whatever. In fact, while we were in Moscow, Kazan was taken by the Czecho-Slovaks, and the report of the Bolshevik commandant was, "We have evacuated from Kazan without the loss of a single man;" and he was awarded a medal for bravery for having a hole put through his hat.

Senator NELSON. And those forces that you refer to there coming up from Samara, working northward, were expecting to get help from the allies?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And because they were disappointed in that, they met with reverses. If we had had a small force then, and met them there at Vologda, and furnished them ammunition, and cooperated, they would have gotten the upper hand then, would they not, as what they needed was ammunition and arms?

Mr. WELSH. That was the belief of those who were there. They were moving on, seeking to take Perm, and they were going on to Viatka, which they could have taken. We looked for them to come in on the Siberian line through Viatka and make a junction with the forces from Archangel and Vologda, thus making a front and cleaning up the situation.

Senator NELSON. There were two forces, one coming in from the Siberian line, and the other coming in from the south.

Mr. WELSH. From the north.

Senator NELSON. And then our forces from the north?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And both of those two other forces were expecting to get help from our forces coming down from Archangel?

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Expecting more ammunition and supplies than anything else, and they did not get it?

Mr. WELSH. Not only that, but—

Senator NELSON. That Archangel move was as fatal a move as the move of the allies at the Dardanelles. If they had had a force of 50,000 men there, or 25,000 men, with ample supplies of ammunition and everything else, the Bolshevik government would have been at an end?

Mr. WELSH. That was our belief. It was our belief that the forces they had there were sufficient if they had moved, if they had come down. As Breshkovskaya pointed out yesterday, a million troops that stand still are no good to Russia, but 50,000 that will fight and move are a help.

Senator STERLING. What would be your opinion as to the effect of a reasonably large allied force in Russia to-day, as a stabilizing, conserving force that would prevent the disorders and excesses of the Bolsheviks, and enable them to work out a stable government?

Mr. WELSH. I tried to make the point that it is hard for anyone who has come out of Russia a month previously to speak with authority on it. We can speak of conditions when we were there, but you must consider this, that when at that time we felt that that force of 20,000 could have taken it, we knew the sentiment of the Russian people. Since then the Russian people have had to submit to the disappointment of their hopes that food would be brought to them and that the allies would come and take the Bolsheviks off their neck. That hope has been deferred, and what it has turned into I can not say. Whether it has turned into distrust sufficient to make allied intervention a failure now I can not say.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Welsh, the Russian people in all their wars have been brave fighters and good soldiers. Why, in your opinion, does not some leader rise up and organize these soldiers and overthrow these Bolsheviki among themselves?

MR. WELSH. I think Breshkovskaya tried to make that plain yesterday. The people have been systematically starved by the Bolsheviki for eight months—the leaders and the people. They have searched on the streets and in the houses for arms of every kind for the last six months. There are no arms except in the hands of the Bolsheviki; there is no food except in the hands of the Bolsheviki. Those leaders whom you might have looked to at that time that I spoke of, when we were expecting the allies to come in, those leaders came forward, but were seized by the Bolsheviki and executed. After such drastic measures when people who had the courage came forward on the strength of the hope of belief in the allies, when that hope was not realized, how can you expect the people to rise up?

The other point is that the peasants, who are the great body and mass of the Russian people, are self-sufficient unto themselves. They are back in the villages, where there are no Bolsheviki. If the Bolsheviki come out they fight them with pitchforks or anything they can get. I, personally, with two other companions, was almost mobbed in a little village 5 miles from Vologda, because they thought we were Bolsheviki. We had come out to see an historic monastery there, and were going through the place. Just before us had been some Russians who may have been Bolsheviki. At any rate they were exceedingly impudent to the monks. They left, but we remained in the monastery. Some people came up to us and asked what we were doing. We said, "Nothing, just looking around." They said, "Who are you?" We said, "Americans; allies." They said, "That is very well. Make yourselves at home."

That was a group of 15 people. We went farther on, and later the group grew to 50 people. These were not satisfied, and while some of them were demanding that we should get out, others who had been there earlier spoke to us and tried to apologize, saying, "Some Bolsheviki have been here trying to requisition the food of the monastery, and our peasants are afraid that you are Bolsheviks. Therefore it is best that you should leave." "Well," we said, "if that is the case, we will leave," and we started to go; but by this time there was a very large crowd, of 150 women and men. Luckily for us, there were no large sticks or stones; but we, not being Russian but being Americans, tried to take it humorously and if possible make the best of it, whereas an ordinary Russian might have lost his temper and fought back, and would have been mobbed by them as Bolsheviks. This was 5 miles out of Vologda. That is convincing to me of the peasants' attitude toward the Bolsheviks.

SENATOR OVERMAN. If some leader should rise up and lead these peasants against these Bolsheviki, they would have no munitions, no guns?

MR. WELSH. What would they lead them with? With pitchforks and clubs, with the Red Guards having machine guns and all modern equipment? They have the complete equipment of the Russian Army; that is, all that was not given to the Germans.

SENATOR STERLING. Would not allied intervention in sufficient force be reassuring to those peasants, and would they not, although at present not armed, give their moral support to such intervention?

Mr. WELSH. I think a Russian can answer that question better, but Breshkovskaya answered that question yesterday by saying yes. For myself, I feel that the great need of Russia at the present time is food. If the allies could go in with food and provisions and with enough armed force to see that that food was not given to the Bolsheviks and did not fall into the hands of the Bolsheviks, but was given to everyone alike, and if they wanted to give to the Bolsheviks, well and good—because you can not tell whether a man is a Bolshevik or not by what he says to-day, and I can cite an example of that—but to go on, you can not expect people to make an orderly government when they are starving to death. But give them food, give them clothing, and help them to a self-respecting position, and they will work themselves out. But if this thing is allowed to run on, the intelligent and educated people are going to be systematically starved out and the restoration of Russia is going to take years and years instead of a few years.

Senator OVERMAN. There has been a great starvation of those people, has there not?

Mr. WELSH. Breshkovskaya stated yesterday, in answer to one of your questions, as to how many the Bolsheviks had killed, and said that the casualties of the war with Germany were only one-half of what the Bolsheviks had killed. The word "killed" in that sense, I believe, should be interpreted to mean not only killed by guns, but by actual starvation.

Senator OVERMAN. You think, if this thing goes on, that thousands of people will be starved to death?

Mr. WELSH. Thousands have starved to death. There is absolutely no question but that in the city of Moscow to-day there is absolute starvation. We had been on what you might call starvation rations for eight months, with no sugar, no butter, no white bread.

Senator OVERMAN. No meat?

Mr. WELSH. Horse meat; and when it is asked if horse meat is appetizing, it is appetizing, but when you go down the street and see three or four horses that have dropped dead yesterday, and come back to-morrow and find one of them half cut away, and go back the next day and find the same horse still lying there, cut still further away—and I have seen one horse lying for five days, to my actual knowledge, in one place, and being continually cut up—you do not enjoy horse meat under those conditions.

Senator OVERMAN. I should think that would produce disease among them.

Mr. WELSH. If you ask a person coming out of Russia at the present time, "Have you the flu?" he will say, "Oh, yes." The flu is not anything to them. Over here it is terrible; but in comparison to what life means in Russia the flu is a minor thing.

Senator OVERMAN. What will be the result, then, if this state of affairs goes on for another year?

Mr. WELSH. There is positive starvation in Petrograd and Moscow; and, as Breshkovskaya pointed out yesterday, the north of Russia is not self supporting. It gets additional food from Siberia and the south. What grain they had coming on was reaped in August. We left there in September, one month later, and there was already a shortage. If there was a shortage after one month, how could that crop last through September, October, November, December, January, and right straight through until spring? And it will be spring before they can get any edibles at all—any potatoes, any grain, or anything of that kind. It should be perfectly plain that under such conditions there can be nothing but starvation.

In the winter of 1917 the American Red Cross kept thousands of children from starving to death by the very well-organized and worked-out distribution of milk—condensed milk. Their supplies ran out in May, 1918. Since then there has been absolutely nothing of that kind to be given to the children and babies of Petrograd and Moscow. There is only one answer, and that is starvation. The mother of my assistant in the bank, as far back as March, 1918, was making bread, for which they paid 20 cents a pound, out of meal from which they make linseed oil that is used to feed to cattle. She was making bread out of that meal to feed the family. That was as far back as March, 1918, almost a year ago. People in this country have absolutely no conception of it. For instance, Breshkovskaya yesterday was astounded at the ignorance of the American people. We always feel, "Why ask these questions? Do you not know these things?" It is terrible that people in this country can not picture or realize what is happening in Russia at the present time.

Senator NELSON. The food-producing and grain-producing portions of Russia are all south and east of these centers of the revolution.

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is, around Petrograd and around Moscow and around Vologda, and all those places there in the northern part of Russia, they do not produce enough for their own support.

Mr. WELSH. They do not produce enough for their own support.

Senator NELSON. The food must come either from the Ukraine country or from Siberia.

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Senator NELSON. But do you not think that if they had transportation facilities and could distribute what there is in Siberia and south Russia, they could supply themselves?

Mr. WELSH. They could; but the key to the situation is this, that in the sections where there is food the peasants will not sell it for the money they have in Russia, which deteriorates from month to month. They say, "Give us shoes, give us implements, give us anything, and we will give you our grain." So that no one can go in there and take it. The Bolsheviks can not take it away from them and neither can anyone else. Unless you can send from this country supplies of other kinds to be exchanged for their food, they will not release it.

Senator NELSON. The starvation you speak of is not confined to the peasantry in the country? They have enough food to live on? It must be confined to the people in these large cities?

Mr. WELSH. It is confined to the people in the large cities; and yet there is a very stringent shortage among the peasants. We asked our maid in Vologda, who was quitting then, in August, to go back to the harvest, how much land they had. She said, "I do not know." "Well, how much crops do you raise?" She said, being exceedingly ignorant, "I do not know how many bushels, etc. I know it is not sufficient for our family." That was the way she measured it.

Senator NELSON. Their lack of desire to raise more food is due to their fear that it will be captured by the Bolsheviki? Is there not something in that?

Mr. WELSH. There is something in that; but she stated that for many years past the land they had in their family was not sufficient to support the family. She was working in Vologda and earning money to support herself, and sending money to the family.

Senator STERLING. What do you say as to the condition involved in Senator Nelson's question, namely, that the peasants are not producing sufficient grain because of their fear that it will be taken by the Bolsheviki?

Mr. WELSH. I think that is true; and Breshkovskaya yesterday stated it as a fact, and she ought to know.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Welsh, are you familiar with the method of electing these soviets and the way they conduct their elections? Have you any instances that you can relate?

Mr. WELSH. I do not think anyone can be familiar with that, because there are no elections.

Maj. HUMES. Give us a sample of one method, if you know of such.

Mr. WELSH. Well, in Vologda, where we came in closer contact with it, the soviet authorities there were outsiders, and not Vologda people. They had come from the outside. Vologda had been a very progressive city, and therefore the change through Bolshevism was very slight. That is, they retained the city organization of the distribution of food, etc., and the Bolshevik president of the soviet was a fairly moderate, liberal man, so they got along very well until in July the Moscow government sent up a commission from Moscow which threw out what had been the bolshevik soviet, and took entire charge of the situation, and organized a committee of five in whom full legislative and military powers over the city of Vologda were placed.

Maj. HUMES. Were these five people residents of Vologda, or outsiders?

Mr. WELSH. They had come from Moscow. One of them was our friend Radek, who was with Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg in Berlin.

Senator NELSON. Who recently has been arrested in Germany?

Mr. WELSH. Yes. He, I believe, is an Austrian.

Maj. HUMES. How did they run the city, and what was the reason they found it necessary to depose the original soviet?

Mr. WELSH. All the reasons I do not know, though one reason that was given was the presence of the allied troops in Archangel, and they came under that pretext.

Maj. HUMES. How did the new soviet conduct the affairs of the city, as compared to the way they were being conducted by the original soviet?

Mr. WELSH. They simply issued mandatory decrees. The other soviet, which was made up of liberal socialists and liberal Bolsheviks, had tried to conduct a semblance of an elective government, which was true in the beginning of the Bolshevik government throughout Russia, but, as in Vologda—and Vologda is only illustrative of what has happened all over—the Bolsheviki, to preserve themselves, found it necessary to send in a dictatorship and take over the government.

And when some people talk about the Bolsheviki, telling us about a constitutional government, what is said may have been true when the Bolsheviki first came in, but what you want to know is the state of conditions at the present time, and in Vologda at the present time the government is in the hands of a commission of five.

Senator NELSON. This Vologda commission was sent from Moscow?

Mr. WELSH. Yes, with Radek at the head of them. They issued mandatory decrees of any nature that they felt necessary.

Then, too, it is a well known fact that the Bolsheviks dispersed the National Constituent Assembly which met shortly after they came into power, for the reason that it did not have a Bolshevik majority.

Senator NELSON. And took possession of whatever property they wanted, buildings, houses, furniture, money, and I suppose everything.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, and at that time they started in and arrested some hundred or so of the leading people of Vologda and held them several weeks. Twenty of them they took as hostages to Moscow, and I do not doubt at all but that those twenty have been killed.

Senator NELSON. How big a place is Vologda?

Mr. WELSH. It was 40,000; but Vologda is characteristic of where the peasants have grown up, and the leading people were only one generation removed from the peasants themselves; and yet those same people fled from this commission when it entered the town, and had to hide themselves wherever they could.

Senator NELSON. So that the people of that town, the rank and file and the masses of the people, were not in sympathy with that committee of five that was sent there?

Mr. WELSH. Not only that, but, as I stated, the Lettish troops who were there, supporting them at the time, would not have resisted the allies had they come down. That is the statement of their commandant, who had offered, through their friend, to help us get to the allied lines, if necessary.

One of the reasons for the strength of the Bolsheviki at the present time—the strengthening of the Bolsheviki at the present time—in my opinion, is this: They were on their last legs when the allies came in, or were coming in. Lenin was for coming to an understanding with the allies. Trotsky said “No, we must arm the German and Austrian prisoners, and institute a period of terrorism and go to the front and beat back the Czecho-Slavs, and win out that way,” because in those months it looked as if Germany was winning. So they armed the German prisoners and the Austrian prisoners—the Austrians not so much, because they were more in sympathy with the Russian people—and sent them out against the Czecho-Slavs, and that was successful.

In the revolt at Yaroslav, that took place, I think it was, in July, the White Guard held it for three weeks against the Red Guard, without any possibility or outlook of the Red Guard winning out until they took the German officers and German prisoners from around Moscow and sent them up there; and as we passed through Yaroslav three or four weeks later, the whole north of the town looked like a picture of northern Belgium, completely wiped out, trees standing there without a leaf, and with houses burned and razed to the ground, in the section where the White Guards had been.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know anything about financial support for the Bolsheviki coming from any source other than the confiscated funds in Russia?

Mr. WELSH. I do not know of any from the outside, if that is what you mean.

Maj. HUMES. I thought possibly you might have some knowledge of that.

Mr. WELSH. I do not know of any, but they have done such things as the following: At the time we were leaving Moscow they had requisitioned all the goods, all the clothing in the dry goods stores, and an order was issued that they should requisition all furs—that is, furs in stores and storage. It was contemplated that there would be a requisition of all fur coats and a redistribution from the bourgeoisie to those who needed them, and a week or so later when we came out and were held up in Petrograd, I had an opportunity to talk with the manager of the English magazine there, and he had received his orders that his store had been requisitioned, and an inventory taken of his entire stock, and the whole thing was under the control of the Bolsheviki, to be sold at their price, and he was to get a selling commission.

Maj. HUMES. He was to get a commission? In other words, requisitioning is confiscation.

Mr. WELSH. They confiscated goods for which perhaps he would have paid 100 per cent, and sold them and gave him 15 per cent as a commission.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROGER E. SIMMONS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. Where do you reside?

Mr. SIMMONS. Hagerstown, Md.

Maj. HUMES. You are connected with the Department of Commerce, are you not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; trade commissioner.

Maj. HUMES. Have you been in Russia during the last few years?

Mr. SIMMONS. Eighteen months. I just returned 10 days ago.

Maj. HUMES. During what period of time were you in Russia last?

Mr. SIMMONS. From July, 1917, up to November, 1918. I came out in April to Stockholm through Finland to write reports and establish contact by wire with the Department of Commerce in America, and then went back to Russia.

Maj. HUMES. Will you state to the committee in your own way the conditions, as you observed them and found them in Russia during that period of time, with reference to the manner in which the Bolsheviki Government is controlling things, and the actual conditions that exist as to their policy in Russia and the economical and manufacturing conditions there?

Mr. SIMMONS. My work, generally, was study of the lumbering industry and the exploitable forests of Russia, in connection with the rebuilding of the devastated portions of Europe. It was quite necessary, the lumbermen of this country thought, as well as the Department of Commerce, that we should know where the vast amount of the supplies that would be required for that work was to come from.

If America has to supply all or a great part, it will draw enormously on our forestal resources. If America only had to contribute a nominal portion of the demand, it was necessary to know how much, so that we could make our arrangements to meet the obligation. For the investigation a commission of four men was appointed. Two went to countries that would consume the lumber in reconstruction, France, Belgium, Italy, and Greece. The other two went to producing centers, one to Scandinavia, Norway and Sweden, and one—myself—to Russia.

I entered at Vladivostok on the 1st of July, 1917, and for six or seven months worked through Siberia, touching the important centers of lumber production and investigating areas where there was a possibility of profitable exploitation of the forests.

Senator NELSON. In that connection, before you proceed further will you indicate where in Siberia you found the lumber areas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Where I found the best forests?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The best forests, in terms of merchantable stands, I found in eastern Siberia, the basin of the Amur. This basin, you will recall, also embraces northern Manchuria, vast areas of which also possess excellent and valuable stands.

Senator NELSON. How about on the Usuri?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a part of the Amur. Here the woodlands are valuable.

Senator NELSON. And along the Sungari River?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Sungari runs through northern Manchuria. As I told you, the forests are very excellent.

Senator NELSON. Is there much timber in the valleys of those streams?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and very excellent timber in many places; the best that is to be found in the whole of Siberia. The next area going west is southeast of Lake Baikal.

Senator NELSON. The valley of the Shilka River?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the valley of Shilka River the stands are mediocre. Here exist, as is characteristic of much of Siberia, vast areas of swamps. Out of these swamps rise ridges, and on these grow excellent timber. Between these ridges the extent of these swamps is so great that generally the valley does not afford excellent opportunities for exploitation.

Senator NELSON. Going west, what other points did you strike where there is good timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. Regions of small valleys the rivers of which either have their source or empty into Lake Baikal, especially south and southeast of Lake Baikal.

Senator NELSON. Then farther west?

Mr. SIMMONS. Farther west, we come next to the valley of the Yenisei, where stand the best and most extensive areas of timber that are to be found in the whole of central Siberia.

Senator NELSON. Is that pine timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; first pine: two kinds of pine; one we call Pinus sylvatica, or Scots pine, and the other Pinus cembra, or Kehr pine. The latter is similar to white pine of our Lake States—Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin. This wood is similar in texture and grain to white pine, although slightly darker in color. The species perhaps the most predominant is spruce, Picea abovata. Larch and fir are other soft woods commonly met with. Birch and alder are the most frequent of the hardwoods; neither met with in stands of value for lumber production.

Senator NELSON. Is the spruce the same kind that we have in America?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Siberian spruces are, comparing the mechanical and physical properties of the woods, not the same species as grown in this country, not as valuable as the Sitka spruce of Washington or the spruce of the Appalachian Mountains, usually called West Virginia spruce.

Senator NELSON. How does it compare with the Scandinavian spruce?

Mr. SIMMONS. The predominant species is the same.

Senator NELSON. Where did you next strike the belt of timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. In western Siberia. Here the situation is extremely interesting in that there is an insufficient lumber supply to meet the market demand. The reason is that the rivers gravitate to the Arctic, and the forest stands are north of the populated centers. According to their system of lumbering it is unprofitable to raft timber upstream. The market supply comes from the Altai Mountains down the Irtysh River. By the rotation system of cutting timber, conducted according to forestry principles, and therefore much ahead of America, not a large enough supply is available from areas close to transportation to meet the demands of 8,000,000 people.

Senator NELSON. Is there not a lot of timber in the valley of the Ob?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is. There is a lot in the valley of the Ob and its chief tributaries.

But remember that in this region the land area is exceedingly vast. The timber stand is not merchantable over all of this vast expanse nor over three-fourths of it. The conditions here are similar to those that I have told you exist in the valley of the Shilka, ridges rising out of swamps like islands, distinctly separated, upon which grow stands that are merchantable.

Senator NELSON. In going across the Ural Mountains, do you strike any timber there; for instance, in the valley of the Kama?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; excellent timber in many localities.

Senator NELSON. Is it pine timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. High grade pine, spruce, larch, and birch. Birch, generally, is not merchantable; trees do not grow to proportions large enough for saw logs.

Senator NELSON. Did you examine the territory north of the Siberian Railroad between Perm and Petrograd?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That country bordering on what I call the Arctic region?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. In that section of Russia the country drains to a considerable extent toward the Caspian Sea, this is the upper part of the Volga Basin. The major portion gravitates toward the Arctic, comprising the valleys of the North Dvina River, the Onega, Mezen, Pochora, and Kola Rivers. The divide is in the southern part of the country you speak of, Senator Nelson.

Senator NELSON. Is there not timber around the White Sea, in the Archangel region?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, most excellent; not in close proximity to Archangel.

Senator NELSON. South of it?

Mr. SIMMONS. South from about two to eight hundred miles is the region where the best merchantable stands abound.

Senator NELSON. Is there a large quantity of timber there?

Mr. SIMMONS. The separated areas are often very large. Over 60 per cent of the timber resources of European Russia are in this region.

Senator NELSON. That is a region of swamps and timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a region of swamps and timber.

Senator NELSON. Not very well settled, is it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Very sparsely.

Senator NELSON. Not much of a farming country?

Mr. SIMMONS. The only farming is for individual family needs. The chief occupation is lumbering. The people live in villages.

Senator NELSON. That is north of the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is north of the Siberian Railroad; in that section you referred to.

Senator NELSON. Were you up on that new line that they have built from St. Petersburg north to the Kola Peninsula?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator; or rather I should say, I was down it.

Senator NELSON. Well, down it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I came from Murmansk down, investigating the character of forests and locating, of course, the best timberlands available in that region of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Is not that good timber?

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not bear comparison to the timberland tributary to Archangel.

Senator NELSON. Taking the extent of the country, there are large forests around Lake Onega?

Mr. SIMMONS. There are forests not immediately around, but on rivers and streams directly flowing into the lake.

Senator NELSON. And on the other side of Lake Ladoga is the situation, generally, similar?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. I have understood that was a good timber country?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is. Relatively, however, it does not measure up to regions around Perm and toward Archangel.

Senator NELSON. Now, you go on with your story. I was trying to get at the timber.

Mr. SIMMONS. You know the geography wonderfully well.

Well, as you see, my work in Russia was to investigate lumbering and forests. Naturally, this brought me largely in touch with peasant villages, and into contact often with the laborers and in the woods and at the sawmills. The sawmill industry is the second largest manufacturing industry of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Have they up-to-date sawmills there that compare with our up-to-date mills in this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. The system of manufacturing is entirely different. They use gang frame sawmills. I doubt if you have seen them in this country. By one operation the log is sawed into boards, planks, or timbers. The band saw on the carriage system used in America, taking the log back and forward against the saw, is rarely seen in Russia. The machinery of some of the Russian sawmills is up-to-date; in others it is quite primitive.

In the rural parts I was thrown particularly with peasants and laborers working in the woods. When I came into the large civic centers, seats of governments, of provinces, I was largely connected with officials of the local forestry bureaus, while in big cities and port cities I had contact with the exporters and jobbers of lumber and lumber associations.

When I arrived in Siberia the revolution had taken place. Kerensky was then in the saddle. The economic conditions in eastern Siberia were very good, compared to what I found them in European Russia. Of course, they were not up to normal, because of the world's war. People generally were all longing for peace; and they were looking forward with great expectation, as soon as the war was over, to the reestablishment of greater economic activity and extension of industry, which they anticipated would be very marked.

I met the Bolsheviks in Irkutsk.

Senator NELSON. Do you mean by that the Kerensky officials?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Or the Lenine people?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the followers of Lenine.

Senator NELSON. Of Lenine and Trotzky?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. That is a good plan. Call one the Kerensky and the other the Bolsheviks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well, sir.

Senator NELSON. That is a good distinction.

Mr. SIMMONS. When I got there, the Bolshevik revolution had started, and I could see the difference at once. I saw the banks and stores were being closed, lumber mills not running, business generally at a standstill.

I then became interested, as I saw the revolution directly affected my investigation. It started the thought, "Is this revolution going to disrupt the lumber industry, and is Russia, the greatest producer of export material in the world, going to step out from furnishing its normal supply?"

I therefore began to regard political movements more closely. I soon learned that the Bolsheviks were striving to establish "autocracy of the proletariat," according to Lenine's pet theory. The Russian proletariat represents 95 to 97 per cent of the population, whereas the bourgeoisie classes, containing the royalty, the intelligentsia (influential because of high learning), and the capitalists, represent only from 3 to 5 per cent. You can see that if an autocracy of the proletariat could be established it would in a large measure be quite representative of the Russian Nation. But the proletariat is composed of various classes and elements. The peasantry is the largest. Jobbers, clerical forces, rank and file of many professions—clergy, dentists, etc.—students, small manufacturers, seamen, soldiers, industrial workers, fishermen, trappers, among all of these there were demoralized elements. It was these, led by agitators, that held the reins of government in Irkutsk.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is, the demoralized element?

Mr. SIMMONS. The demoralized element; those who heretofore had not been thrifty and saving; largely indigent and careless.

Senator NELSON. Living by their wits?

Mr. SIMMONS. Perhaps so, sir. They did not, in my opinion, represent the substantial laboring forces of Siberia.

So I proceeded westward and arrived next at Krasnoiarsk. Here I saw part of a battle between Cossacks and Bolsheviki soldiers.

Senator NELSON. Where is that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Krasnoiarsk. I confirmed my view that the rank-and-file Bolsheviki were the least desirable element as to morality and substantial citizenship. In carrying on my investigation I had to get in touch with the best of these men, those important among employees of the government, who directed and assisted administration of forestry organizations in different governments. In my interviews it was evident they were not men of sufficient intelligence to qualify for the work in hand, and with little conception of forestry principles.

Proceeding westward, I came to the cities of Tomsk and Omsk and Novo Nikolaievsk. Here was observed the same trend toward industrial and economic disintegration as in Irkutsk, which I just described, by the closed shops, factories not operating, general business stagnation, all resulting in honest toilers being thrown out of employment.

I began to speculate that if this state of affairs existed in Siberia, it would also be found in Russia. In Perm, Vologda, and Petrograd the same conditions were evident, but apparently not so well developed.

Along the trans-Siberian line, proceeding slowly, I had a chance of reading the literature that the Bolsheviki were distributing in connection with their active propaganda; also the decrets, proclamations, and the public formal announcements of all kinds of the local and national authorities. Many of these sounded plausible, aimed to be constructive, ostensibly, and in their idealism and promises were golden. I could see how people would be attracted, and for the first 8 to 10 weeks understood their sanguine hopes. But after this time disintegration was rapid and I saw the awful results. The modus operandi was not in line with theories. They talked ideals but did not act ideals. Practices showed there was decided immorality; decidedly, the game was not being played squarely, the people being deceived by the leaders. I suspected it from the very beginning from what I saw in Siberia. If you will let me, I will read to you a significant admission in that connection.

This statement was written to me, at my request, by an American that it could be given to the American consul general. It reads as follows: "Bonch Bruevitch, the executor of the acts of all the people's commissars, not a strong man, but a close friend of Lenine's, who, working in the same office, is able to influence Lenine strongly. A power in the government as long as Lenine lives. He states that the Bolsheviks have not worked out a code of morals yet, and until they do, the end justifies the means. Any lies or dictatorial methods are worth using as long as they are in the interests of the working classes. A close friend of his says he has no compunctions, lying whenever there is an advantage to be gained from it for the Soviets." The movement is immoral, absolutely.

When the revolution began, those in power were face to face with three great problems, as I saw it. They were confronted with the question, "What are you going to do with the army and with the war?" The Russians were then still in the war. "What kind of government are you going to form?" "What are you going to do with the land question, and will you stop economic disintegration?" You recall what they did with regard to the war. That disgraceful, humiliating treaty of peace of Brest-Litovsk is the answer.

Senator NELSON. They laid down and quit.

Mr. SIMMONS. They laid down and quit; but in doing that the Bolsheviks gained the favor of 10,000,000 soldiers, who wanted peace. They wanted peace because the conditions under which they were fighting were unbearable.

What were they going to do in the formation of a government? It was a long debate, face to face with the question, Should they make this a political revolution and establish a government as a political and social basis together, or should it be solely a social revolution, to work out their great aims in life and Lenine's dream, "the dictatorship of the proletariat"? They decided on the last course, relegating the political revolution to the background. The Soviet government, composed solely of Bolsheviks, of a portion only of the "manual proletariat," is a government in name only. Rightly stated, it is a well-organized institution functioning to further the social revolution, the overthrow of all recognized standards of morality and civilization. It is purely a social revolution, absolutely. Everything that you will hear given you in testimony of men who have been in Russia looking on this movement from a disinterested standpoint will sustain this. Let me, please, right here in this connection bring in one remark. The American Government never had better officials, more loyal men, more conscientious in work, and thoroughly honest in every endeavor they made, than the men who represented us in Russia. The laudable work of the ambassador is generally known. I refer particularly to the embassy officers, of the Department of State, our Consular Service to a man, the representatives of the Department of Commerce, one of whom you have listened to, and the American military mission. I know them all and have seen them in action under dangerous and trying conditions. Aside from the Government, I wish to mention the personnel of the Y. M. C. A. and part of our Red Cross. All these men, sir, whose Americanism can not be questioned, or their patriotism, did their work conscientiously and efficiently. If they are to appear before you, which I trust they will, I can assure you almost all of their respective testimony will generally agree. I have talked to all of them. They denounce Bolshevism.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why do you say "part of our Red Cross"?

Mr. SIMMONS. I only came in contact with a part of the Red Cross. I am only taking those men with whom I came in contact.

Being a social revolution, of course the worst parts about it are the results of the awful class hatred the Bolsheviki leaders are inciting. They are inciting it in every part of the country by their publications and in all their efficient propaganda. It has not been any more disastrous in any parts of Russia, I believe, than it has been in many villages among the peasantry.

Their policy has as an underlying motive the arousing of class antagonism, the proletariat hating the bourgeoisie. In practice it means that the less fortunate in every industry and institution bear animus against those qualified to hold better positions. This has been indirectly the cause of most of the incidents of terrorism witnesses have spoken of, more of which I will tell you about later.

When it was seen that the peasantry did not rally to the support of the Bolshevik cause and that they refused to sell grain for rubles without value, the Bolsheviki took the class issue to the villages. Lenine calls this movement awakening class consciousness of the peasantry. He organized for this work "poor committees" as they are called in translation. These committees of soldiers go out to the villages to inflame the dissatisfied elements and to extract by force food from the peasants. You know these villages are organized, having men who work land according to the communal system. Others own small holdings in fee simple, while another class of peasants have no land and work as hired labor. The last-named class I should not think would represent much more than 20 per cent. Those that have land to work are satisfied to some extent. Many need more land, their apportionment being too small; and besides, the peasantry, of course, want sufficient land given to meet the demands of all. But Lenine sends the poor committees, agitators, to incite peasants who have no land to conspire against those who have, and to take the guns he gives them for fighting, robbing, and plundering neighbors in their own and neighboring villages.

Senator NELSON. Who have land?

Mr. SIMMONS. Who have land. When you come later to read, gentlemen, the history of the Russian revolution, some of the bloodiest fights, you will find, and worst horrors, have occurred in villages. Those simple, peace-loving people have been living among themselves for centuries in more or less harmony under their communistic system. But all of a sudden Lenine, by his nefarious policies, sets the passions of the demoralized class aflame and turns them against the other two classes. Instead of promoting brotherly love and helping to make the sentiment of the nation one for the good of all, as we are striving to do in America, the Bolsheviki are trying by jealousy and animosity to disintegrate the population of various localities into classes with a view of the honest toiler being overcome and subjected. Now, this is a serious matter. The peasantry represent 85 per cent of the 160,000,000 Russians.

In Russia class hatred is seen manifested everywhere. I will mention one illustration which I saw in Petrograd—the undressing of a woman. I had heard about it before. It was about 6.30, growing dark, as I was walking down Nevsky Prospect on my way home. I heard a yell of distress from a woman up a street running perpendicularly to the Nevsky. There two soldiers were removing the cloak—a very good substantial cloth coat—from a woman. And when protests were made by the standers-by, the answer was, "We have blacked your boots and washed your clothes for many years. Now you bourgeoisie have got to bow to us and wash our clothes and black our boots." Undressing to steal clothes went on to a considerable extent in Moscow, Petrograd, and Kiev, according to reports. It went as far as taking off besides cloaks the very dresses of women, and where they could handle it, taking also the clothes and overcoats off men.

Senator WOLCOTT. I take it from what you say that this was not an elegantly dressed woman, but just an ordinarily dressed woman.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, the elegantly dressed women were similarly treated, but they would be careful not to walk on the streets except in daylight. But this particular instance that I witnessed was of a woman 30 years old, I should say, who belonged to the middle class. She did not have on a sealskin coat or anything very expensive; merely a heavy, warm, substantial cloth coat.

Now, you can see that all their practices aimed to invite people to do acts of that kind showing intense hatred—I wish I could think of another word, it is more than hatred—detestation—against people that they thought were a little higher up. Now, remember, as I pointed out in the first place this hatred is against a good many of these people in the cities, and people like the peasants who had land, who belong to the proletariat. But because they did not agree, they call them bourgeoisie. You can see that they are fighting parts of the very class for whom they say they are trying to establish a dictatorship. They are not trying to put the proletariat in power, but the most demoralized elements of that class, which represents, gentlemen, a very small per cent.

Now, this class hatred is a matter we have got to consider, I think, with a great deal of interest and a great deal of seriousness, because it is the basis of their international movement.

If you will let me take the time to read to you a statement made by Lenine, I think it will bear out that this is the Bolshevik international aim. This appeared in a newspaper, the Severnaia Comuna, No. 139. The date is not given, but this number of the paper would be about November 12 last. This translation was made by one of my interpreters.

The following remarks were made by Lenine in his speech at a sitting of the central executive committee in Moscow:

"We were," said he among other things, "never so powerful as we are now. On the other hand, we never ran such a danger as now. The west European capitalists, together with the American capitalists, now have grasped that bolshevism is a force not to be neglected and resisted in order to destroy it by common effort." Mr. Lenine puts his hopes as usual in the international revolution of wage earners. He points out to the sympathies of the independent labor party in England, of the socialist party in Scotland, as well as of many trades unions (syndicates) in France. But he is especially optimistic with regard to the help which he hopes to get from Germany. "In all countries," said he, "the revolution grows by channels which in different countries differ widely. In some the revolution can come one or two years later than in others. All have to pass certain political developments. But the wage earners of the whole of Europe begin to wake up and go forward with gigantic steps. The enemies of bolshevism direct their efforts chiefly against us. We must concentrate all our attention toward the southern front. There will be decided the fate not only of the Russian but of the international revolution. We have, however, many chances for victory as people's minds have undergone an evolution. They know now they are defending, not the power of imperialists, but their own interests, their own land and freedom, their own factories, their own liberties.

"The discipline in the Red army is growing. We have already organized good officers who passed new schools. Our southern front is the front against the united Anglo-French imperialism. But we are not afraid of that fight. We know that this imperialism will have soon to fight with the inner enemies. The power which crushed the imperialism in Germany will crush also America and England. This force will grow. The more the Anglo-French troops will advance into Russia they will meet increasing danger, and they will help our cause to spread like the Spanish disease."

I have several other matters here along the same lines, but I do not believe you want to take the time.

Senator NELSON. Hand them to the secretary for the record.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here is a short one. Lenine said at the Moscow congress, according to the Izvestija, No. 223, November last:

For all those who took part in the workmen's movement for some time past it is evident that in this year a real dictatorship of the wage-earning classes is going to be established.

In the Severnaia Communa, No. 51, one of the commissars in concluding recommended various measures. [Reading:]

I advocate a propaganda on a large scale among the German prisoners, with which the formation of an international regiment can start.

Now, gentlemen, these people have a wonderful propaganda, not only in Russia, but in western Europe and Scandinavia. I am going to show you their policy in their own words. In the same paper, the same number and the same date as the one quoted, it goes on to speak about the organization of the army which this commissar hopes can be made to reach 3,000,000. He says:

The most interesting part of the scheme is the organization of the huge propaganda work in the towns and villages as well as in the army itself. "We must mobilize our papers, our journalists, our artists," says Poddosky, "Let every day dozens of trains spread our papers, our proclamations, our posters and our drawings. Let us organize in every village, in every company, groups of readers and lecturers. Let the cinemas spread our ideas. Let the gramophones, which now are to be had in every village, make propaganda for us."

In Russia they are carrying that out quite effectively.

Senator NELSON. They are carrying it out, too, in this country, are they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not perhaps verify it, gentlemen, but I heard that Americans that I had seen in Petrograd had left Russia to come to America as Bolshevik agents to establish a bureau of intelligence or propaganda in line with this policy.

Senator NELSON. Americans that were there in Russia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and they brought with them Russians, I believe. This I do not know positively, yet I got it from good authority.

Senator NELSON. They came over here to establish Bolshevik propaganda in this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. Right along that line, I was sent out to make an address before the annual convention held last week of the rotary clubs.

Senator NELSON. Where?

Mr. SIMMONS. At Grand Rapids, Mich. It was of the clubs of the ninth district. About 800 delegates were present. Michigan is vitally interested in the Russian situation because a large portion of the American troops in Archangel are Michigan troops. I was utterly astounded when I saw the ideas prevailing, in that it seemed to give some justification to the Bolshevik experiment, as they understood it, but particularly in that these Americans of marked intelligence did not seem to know that the movement was absolutely immoral, anarchistic, and a menace to Europe, America, and the world.

Senator NELSON. At what place was that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Grand Rapids, Mich.; delegates from all over that section.

Senator WOLCOTT. Just a moment. The Rotary Club is an organization made up in the various cities, is it not, of one prominent representative from each business?

Mr. SIMMONS. Aimed to be the top notch.

Senator WOLCOTT. The class of people you talked to represented the cream of the business world?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator. The best representatives of business interests of those localities from which they came. In meetings they aim to get at the bottom of questions. In fact, it is one of the purposes of their organizations, as I see it, to study national, State, and local questions with a view of trying to help to arrive at the most intelligent solutions.

I do not know why people of this class have not got right information upon which to base decisive conviction. This is one of the great dangers of wrong propaganda, its insidious effect. Bolshevism is a greater menace to the world, gentlemen, even than was German militarism, if you will allow me to express an opinion. The false ideas being circulated are not the truth about this Russian Bolshevik experiment. I spoke in Grand Rapids for over an hour. They were more astounded when they heard the simple tale that I told, merely relating my experiences and observations, than I was to learn their impressions brought out during discussions on the subject of the withdrawal of American troops from Archangel.

Senator WOLCOTT. You were astounded with their apparent sympathy with Bolshevism, as they understood it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not sympathy so much as lack of conception, as they understood it.

Senator WOLCOTT. You discovered, I suppose, that they had an entirely false impression of what you know to be the truth?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. They discovered it, and stated it in a resolution.

Senator OVERMAN. Had they gotten their idea about the Archangel troops from what they had heard from the Congressional Record and other places?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no idea, Senator. I am only telling you the thing as an example; just to couple it up with what I said regarding Bolshevik propaganda. Being absolutely immoral and insidious, it has to be watched and fought.

Senator WOLCOTT. The important thing, it seems to me, connected with that Rotary Club incident is that by some means or other, devious, perhaps false, ideas had been injected into the minds of those very substantial people.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is certain that far from the right ideas have been or are being circulated.

Senator WOLCOTT. And very clever, unseen propaganda had been at work.

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you ask them how they got such ideas?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. This was in a formal meeting. It did not occur to me to go into details.

You seem to be interested along that line. I met another man. He was a major in the Army. I happened to meet him as an old friend at the La Salle Hotel in Chicago. Again I was surprised to see his impressions, which corresponded to what I told you concerning the Rotarians—absence of right intelligence on the Russian subject. From lectures, different periodicals, and pamphlets in some way circulated in the Army camps, the impression he felt was not perhaps one of sympathy with, but of toleration for, the Bolshevik experiment. He said, "Will you not come right with me and make a speech and tell the soldiers and people at my camp what you have told me?" He saw the importance of spreading the truth. And I tell you, Senators, on my way back to Washington, after talking to men on the train and seeing the same thing confirmed, I realize that good Americans are up against a great work. And I think you—this committee—in starting this investigation are doing the country wonderful service if these hearings bring out the truth, and I think they will.

It is a matter, gentlemen, that we have got to look at seriously. Every consideration that made necessary the formation of the league of nations counsels protection of the world's common security against Bolshevism. If you had lived in prisons, as I did, and had had the experiences of us in Russia to the last, and seen the suffering and heard the wails of the people of all classes all over that big country, you would agree with me absolutely.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do I understand the purport of this statement to be that Bolshevism, in its practical operation, is as bad as war, which the league of nations is hoping to obliterate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. I should say that the same considerations that make that institution necessary to prevent war make the world's common fight against this foe, Bolshevism, just as necessary.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have been told, you said, that Americans have come back from Russia for the purpose of spreading this Bolshevik propaganda in this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was told that in Petrograd, before the time they left.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know any of them?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have seen them, yes, sir, and I think I have met them. I am not sure. I saw them many times in Petrograd.

Senator WOLCOTT. I suppose you would not want to brand anybody as a Bolshevik unless you knew of your own knowledge what he stood for; but do you know or did you know in Petrograd any Americans who were intimate with the Bolshevik leaders, who are now in this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. I saw one right here, in the Capitol.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who was he?

Mr. SIMMONS. Williams; Albert Rhys Williams.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know of any others?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I do, but I do not feel justified in saying that they were Bolsheviks. But Williams, I heard, had been employed by the Bolshevik government to come here and start a bureau of publicity.

Senator WOLCOTT. You got that information in Russia?

Mr. SIMMONS. In Russia, in Petrograd. It was told to me, but not by him.

Senator NELSON. No; but by reliable people?

Mr. SIMMONS. From a source that I consider to be very trustworthy.

Senator NELSON. And you have no doubt in your mind that it is so?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am quite sure of it, and would offer the name of my informant except that he is in Russia and it might mean his death.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of any money being sent over here?

Mr. SIMMONS. Only by hearsay, Senator. I do not know of any being sent. I do know of money being sent into Scandinavia, Sweden, and Denmark, from information that I got from diplomatic officials unofficially. But the very fact that men are under the employment of the Bolshevik government in this country indicates that money is over here. They have to be paid.

Senator NELSON. Somebody has got to pay them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Well, now, go on and tell us more about the operations of the Bolsheviks over there, what you saw and heard.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have told you about the policy of propaganda and of its immorality. I have also referred to the scheme of the leaders to keep the power, holding it by having cornered almost all the available food supplies and holding all ammunition and all guns in their possession, and everything that the Czar had accumulated for war with Germany. They took these in that moment when they overthrew the Kerensky government. As they said to themselves, as reported at that time, "We do not know what is going to happen six months hence, nor two months hence; we have all implements of war in our hands and are the only ones who are practiced in their use, so now is the time to take the power for the workmen."

The Kerensky government fell, I think, largely from the fact that those three big questions faced them that faced the Bolsheviks: What are you going to do with the war? How are you going to stop this economic disintegration? What kind of government are you going to form? Kerensky left the solution of these to the constituent assembly. Unfortunately, in a big country having no organized election machinery the constituent assembly could not be elected and convened in less than from 8 to 10 months. The unrest of the soldiers, sailors, and workmen, with arms and ammunition in their hands—well, the temptation was too great; they would not wait. The peasants were willing and wanted to wait for the constituent assembly. The peasants in the form of the local governments of the zemstvos—the royalty and the big land holders at the time of Kerensky had been taken out of these bodies—were satisfied. The zemstvos were for the first time representative of the peasant class, as they should have been. Of course, the peasants wanted a land reform, but they wanted a systematically organized reform, not the promulgation of just an arbitrary land seizure such as the Bolsheviki at the beginning declared.

The next point I want to make concerns confiscations. A concrete instance was my own experience. After I had left Petrograd, gone to Stockholm and come back, and I returned to my apartment that I had rented for lodging, on that day piled in the hall were all the bric-a-brac, pictures, furniture, rugs, and other appointments that could be moved. This work was in charge of four soldiers. It happened that the little American flag that I had left was still on the front door. I walked in and asked what this meant. They told me that in the name of the people's government they were dispossessing Col. Poncheledjiff, whose rooms I had rented, of his property. I spoke to them and said, "You can not touch this property. This property belongs to me. Go back and tell your superiors that an American official has paid the rent of these rooms furnished, and then if they want you to move these effects come back and see me again." They never came back.

They went around and plundered houses and apartments in that way. The worst part was that often after they confiscated appointments they made the owners, for instance if they lived in 10 rooms, occupy 3 or 4, and assigned the other rooms to workmen and soldiers, who in temperament and mode of living were incompatible and undesirable to live with. It made life a perfect hell for the owners because, too, of the class hatred existing. In some cases, gentlemen, they went so far as even to make defenseless women give up their two or three room apartments and get out on the streets without a place to lay their heads. I can not give you a concrete instance of this, but I heard it many, many times from men of the American colony, men that I knew well and could believe, and the very names of the people were often given at the time they told me about it. People would be turned out from homes they owned or rented, with no place to go. You will find to-day that most of the bourgeois that remain in Russia, and also many belonging to the better elements of the proletariat, are living in cellars, in undesirable quarters, and the very best rooms are being occupied by the—

Senator NELSON. By the rabble?

Mr. SIMMONS. Largely by the rabble and by fanatics and the demoralized classes. With their power, of course, they took away the titles of property. They made the bold declaration, "You do not have to pay any more rent to your landlord, for your apartment belongs to the state." And, of course, no more rents were collected unless they were collected by the state. All the property owned by private ownership was taken away, and owners were compelled to pay rent.

Senator NELSON. And the people were simply tenants?

Mr. SIMMONS. Simply tenants.

Senator NELSON. And the state was a great landlord?

Mr. SIMMONS. And the state was a great landlord.

Then they went further. You heard it rehearsed to you yesterday. They started what they called "the search for food." They would go into people's homes, and if they had there a little larger supply of flour, sugar, meal, or potatoes than they thought they ought to have, a few days' supply or more, they would compel them to give up his food. Often at the same time they would arrest the occupants.

Senator NELSON. Take their food supplies without paying for them?

Mr. SIMMONS. Without paying for them, take their food supplies. Then, of course, as you know, they took over the big landed estates. In confiscating them people resorted to pillage and arson—widespread destruction. They not only confiscated the landed estates—I am coming back to this land question a little later—but they tried to requisition also the land of the peasants.

Senator NELSON. In the communes?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; and the small holdings that the peasants in other years, under the Czar, were allowed to own in fee simple. When they came to take over the peasant holdings they found that they had a big problem on their hands, because they met with formidable assistance.

All of the practices in connection with the subjects I refer to aroused widespread opposition, and the protests became widespread to such an extent that the Bolsheviki became alarmed. They said it was necessary, then, on account of these protests to start an organization which would handle this counter-revolution, as they called these protests. You see, the people could not make organized protest because they did not have arms, ammunition, or food. To make organized protests you have got to have backing—sources of supplies. They had nothing of the kind, nor did they have any connection with the outside world from whence they could get assistance. Protests by individuals and bodies banding themselves together in meetings and strikes, and by newspapers, they considered all of this counter-revolution or sabotage, and because it became so universal they established a special council, with autocratic powers, called "the special council to combat counter-revolution, sabotage, and speculation." You have often heard of the secret police of the Czar and the terribly brutal things that they did. This special council is many times worse than that secret police organization ever thought about being. They began to deal with counter-revolution in a high-handed, tyrannical, and spotic way. Right there, gentlemen, when you hear people say that the formation of the Red Guard army was because of allied intervention, put it down as untrue. The beginning of this formation of the Red Guard was for the purpose of putting down these public

Senator NELSON. This opposition at home?

Mr. SIMMONS. This opposition at home. In the formation of that Red Guard they used machine guns, and withheld food—did everything to drive men, up to the age of 50 or 55, to take up arms. They went over to Courland, to the Letts, and made the young men big promises of large pay and much food, and it was through the Letts—they could not get Russians at first—and through the Chinese in Russia and through the German prisoners in Russia, that they formed the nucleus of the Red Army. I was told concerning the German prisoners. I did not see them as privates.

Senator NELSON. Did not the Germans cooperate with them?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will come to that later, if you please. Foreign soldiers were the nucleus of the Red Army at a time early in the revolution. I want to get the idea into your minds that the intervention of the allies, or the occupation of Archangel or Odessa, wherever they may have made occupation, was not the cause for starting this Red Army.

Senator OVERMAN. It is now half past 1, and we will take a recess until 2.30.

AFTER RECESS.

(The subcommittee reassembled at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of the recess, and at 2.45 o'clock proceeded with the hearing of Mr. Simmons.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROGER E. SIMMONS—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Simmons, you may proceed where you left off.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was saying that the formation of the Red Army was started due to protests springing up all over Russia, which were termed, by the Bolsheviki, counter-revolution; then I spoke about the organization of the special council to combat counter-revolution, sabotage, and speculation. This council was despotic, tyrannical, and unprincipled in its methods. They had power that it was said publicly was greater than Lenine himself possessed, and it was largely due to the workings of this special council that much of the terrorism that followed was brought about. I will begin to speak of terrors after I refer to my own experiences. I was working in the Vologda forest district. It was in July, 1918. I had in my pocket a letter from the commissar or the minister of commerce, Bronski, a letter from the commissar of agriculture, Kerelencho, and a letter from the chief of the forest service, a bureau under the department of agriculture. These letters called on the soldiers and the employees of the northern governments to lend me every assistance possible. These commissars realized my mission to Russia was a peaceful one, and one which very likely would result to Russia's good—they wanted the American public and the English-speaking public to know about the forestal riches of Russia, and for that reason they were especially anxious that my work should be facilitated. About that time Lenine called on the allied embassies and legations that were then located in Vologda to remove to Moscow. They refused, knowing the fate of the ambassador of Germany which had taken place just recently, and at the same time they felt that Vologda was a point where they could better struggle with the problem of the scarcity of food, on account of Vologda affording better transportation facilities. This city, you know, is at the junction of the Trans-Siberian and Archangel-Moscow Railroads.

Senator NELSON. It is the best way to get out of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Lenine insisted on his proposal to come to Moscow, and the American Ambassador, who was the dean of the corps, said that if there was any moving to be done he would move to Archangel, which he did.

After he left, the only Americans—in fact, about the only foreigners—left, were the employees of the National City Bank, one of the embassy secretaries, and myself.

A few days later the local Bolshevik leaders made these men leave Vologda and go to Moscow. The embassy's secretary refused, though they ordered him to go first. He told them he was not going to leave a station where there were American citizens for whose safety he was responsible. They made him leave—compelled him at the point of the bayonet. At 2 o'clock in the morning they came for him, so he told me. They put him on the train which took him to Moscow.

Senator OVERMAN. What was his name?

Mr. SIMMONS. His name was Norman Armour, a man who put duty ahead of all personal consideration and safety, and a man that was a thorough American.

Senator STERLING. He was secretary of the American Embassy?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; second secretary.

Shortly after this the manager and the employees of the National City Bank, compelled to go to Moscow, departed from Vologda, and that left me the only foreigner in the community. I did not go, being sick with pneumonia, and I could not at that time leave my bed.

After I got well I attended to work in the immediate vicinity of Vologda, and then, wishing to change my base of operations, I applied to Kedroff, who was the commissar of that community, for permission to leave the city. One had to have permission to leave any city or town, not any village. He replied, after looking over my papers and seeing that I had these from high Moscow officials, that a man with such papers could go any place. He said, "Come back the day after to-morrow—I will not be here to-morrow—and then I will let you know." This delay disturbed me somewhat.

The next day there appeared in a newspaper of Vologda, written by Kedroff, a public declaration calling upon all soldiers, peasants, and workmen to shoot at sight any American, Englishman, or Frenchman that they ran across; that citizens of these capitalistic countries were absolutely foes to the workmen's government, and any of these foreigners in the three northern governments over which he, Kedroff, was supposed to be presiding were enemies to Russia.

According to his instructions, I came back to his office the next day and was presented to his assistant. His name was Iduke. Iduke is a Lettish Jew, a man of a very irascible nature, and, on account of his experience in the uprising in Yaroslav, where the protest against the Bolshevik régime had become quite formidable, he had the reputation of being the cruelest and the most bloodthirsty Bolshevik leader of the revolution. He called for the papers in my case, which I had left previously for Kedroff to look over. Picking up my diplomatic passport, he looked at it, folded it one way, and tried to tear it as he threw it on the floor. As he did so he exclaimed that that passport was made at the American Embassy in Russia—which it had been, because I had my other passport stolen that I obtained in Washington—and he said that no such instrument so made would be recognized. It was signed by the ambassador of the United States, David R. Francis.

He then scrutinized hurriedly some of my other papers and said, "Your case requires me to put you in prison." There was an interruption at this juncture of two Kronstadt sailors excitedly appearing at the door, which I may refer to later under another subject, but in about 30 minutes I was taken by the Red Guards, three of them, and cast into a prison car. This car was attached to this field-staff train, the same where the officials mentioned had their offices. This car that Kedroff used was said formerly to have been one of the private cars of the Czar. It was a very beautiful wagon. I was imprisoned about 12 o'clock, the middle of the day.

At about 4 o'clock in the afternoon I sent my secretary to ask Iduke the cause of my detention and to give me permission to establish contact by wire with the American consular officials in Moscow. He came back apparently much distressed and worried. Tears were in his eyes. He said, "Iduke says that the American consular and diplomatic officials in Moscow are in prison. No more are Americans recognized officially in Russia. As for the cause of your detention, if you will ever know in this world, you will know to-morrow morning at 6.30."

In this cell with me was a man who had been arrested previously. Although born in Russia, he had gone to school and graduated at Oxford, I think, or one of the universities of England. Liking the English people and England so much, he became naturalized. He returned, however, after some 12 or 13 years to visit his parents, who lived within the Kostroma government. Governments in Russia correspond to our States. He was not in anyway perturbed over his arrest when I met him in this Russian cell, the cause of which he did not know. He was a man humorous, light-hearted, and jolly. We played chess together. My secretary happened to have a small chessboard in his portfolio. This English subject was called before Iduke. I presume it was Iduke. Anyhow, he was called to headquarters about 4.30 p. m. He came back mentally much perturbed. He said: "I do not like the situation. I do not understand these people. They are not Russian. I do not know why they accuse me nor what they are going to do with me."

About a quarter to 7 that evening three soldiers came in with bayonets on their guns, in some sort of formation, and took him out. He wanted to take his coat—it was in the summer time and he did not have his coat on—but they told him it was not necessary, and he left his coat, thinking, as I thought, he would return. He never returned. Later, on the way to Moscow, I learned—one of the guards told my secretary—that he had been shot.

Of his own volition, late in the evening my secretary wrote a declaration to Kedroff, outlining his personal activities in the interest of the Russian revolution, stating that he had been in exile for 11 years under the Czar, and how he had assisted Kerensky after the first revolution. He gave as reference the minister of justice in Moscow under the Bolshevik régime.

Senator STERLING. Do you recall who that minister of justice was, or is, if he is minister of justice?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not tell you that, sir. I just know he was the minister of justice. He also gave as reference a man by the name of Rosen, who was head of the Lettish division, formerly an editor in Boston of some socialistic paper. I had met him myself, previously.

The word came back over the phone that this man who was my secretary was responsible, had been in thorough sympathy with the revolution, and belonged to the social revolutionist party. On the strength of such a good report, about 2 o'clock in the morning Kedroff's secretary came into my cell, found me writing what I considered my last letters, and stated that I would be sent the next day to Moscow for trial before the "special council to combat counter revolution, sabotage, and speculation."

Up to that time I fully thought that my end was momentarily growing near. This was a wonderful relief, because I realized that of the people and government officials that I knew in Russia, many were in Moscow.

The next morning about 10 o'clock they took me out of the prison car for a parade up the front streets of Vologda, soldiers in formation of four men making a square, with me a center, and we marched around the city. Being identified with the American Embassy, making it headquarters as I would come in and out of the city, this was done, presumably, to show the public what measures Bolsheviks were going to take against foreigners who represented the capitalistic countries.

I was then, that same evening about 6.30, put on a train under special guard of three men. Two of them stayed in my coupé all the time and one in the corridor guarded the door. Just previously to leaving Vologda Iduke arrested my secretary because he had aided the Kerensky régime. They put him on the same train, also under guard, in another coupé. This secretary, I want to tell you, was a man of honor, and a socialist with a constructive point of view. I engaged a socialist as a secretary because of my many dealings with the Bolsheviks, and because I needed a man not antagonistic, who could make some impression upon the Bolshevik officials. This man had done work for, and knew well, Albert Rhys Williams. Being a liberal socialist, for the first two months of the Bolshevik revolution he was quite sympathetic to the soviets. To-day, like all followers of liberalism, he is one of the strongest opponents of the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. This secretary of yours?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. You say he had done work with Albert Rhys Williams?

Mr. SIMMONS. He knew him as a fellow socialist and had worked for him on translations, or something of that sort. On the train we Senator NELSON. Both of you?

Mr. SIMMONS. Both of us. There, after being paraded up front streets, we were thrown in Lubanka prison. In the cell in which I was confined there were 85 men.

Senator NELSON. How big was the cell?

Mr. SIMMONS. About half the size of this room, sir; and there were sleeping accommodations for not over 30. We slept on the concrete floor. After photographing us they took away all bedding—of course, in Russia everybody has to carry bedding—all our food, our luggage and clothing, and even toilet articles. They took away everything except the clothes on my back, including all my notes and documents, and all money.

Senator STERLING. Of what nationality were the men in that cell?

Mr. SIMMONS. If you please, Senator, I am coming to that in a second. I am giving you first this personal experience. I stayed in Lubanka prison three days. The third day about 4 o'clock they called my name. I walked forward, and the guards ordered me to follow the escort of soldiers, who put me into an automobile ambulance, what we call a Black Maria. This vehicle hurried us through space, and after about 20 minutes' ride I got out in front of a large handsome building which was Beturka prison in Moscow. There, after going through a long way of winding corridors, I was put into a cell with 25 men. There were sleeping accommodations for 23 in the cell. Again I had to take the floor, but only for one night. The next day two from the cell were shot and one released. I stayed in Beturka five days, making my imprisonment a matter of 11 days, but, like in the first prison, I used almost every minute trying to think of some way of establishing contact with the American officials or officials of some of the other governments, principally the neutral nations, met from time to time during my stay in Russia. None of the letters that I wrote were delivered, and no declarations addressed to Bolshevik ministers brought results. I wrote to the Red Cross, telling them I needed medicine; to the Y. M. C. A., telling them I needed food, because I had had none. I did not write, of course, to individuals, because that would have connected them with me in prison and resulted in their immediate arrest. I wrote also to the Swedish consul general, to the Norwegian minister, to the American consul general, to Commercial Attaché Dr. Huntington, all, of course, officially; but none of these letters were ever delivered.

It happened that one of the guards in this part of the prison was a Lettish soldier who had been to America. He had lived in Lawrence, Kans. Having been there myself upon one occasion, I would jolly him as he passed to and fro, and got to be on rather good terms. I decided that I was going to try to bribe this man, as the only means of escape, for I was faced with the conditions that I either had to starve to death, or be shot in execution or if caught bribing, the penalty for which was death.

In this cell of Beturka prison with me were five English sailors, who were so weak from starvation that they could not walk across the room. They and every one in that cell warned me against attempting to bribe. They said it would mean my own death, and likewise the death of the prison guard. I could see no other way. Coincidentally, the day I wrote the letter to the Swedish consul general—thinking all he American officials were in prison some place—one of the prisoners in my cell received 80 rubles baked in a loaf of bread sent in from his family. I borrowed this, and for the other 20 used a few rubles that my secretary had hid in his sock, which they did not find when they searched him, and 10 rubles additional I got from one of the English sailors.

This letter I wrote to the Swedish consul general told him that I was in prison; that I had, as he knew, a diplomatic passport; that I was conscious of no wrong; that my mission to Russia was entirely a peaceful one; that I had taken no part in politics; and I asked him for every assistance. This letter I took to this guard and said, "Inclosed in this envelope, together with a letter, is 100 rubles. I am not offering it to you as a bribe. You do not have to take any money from me. Deliver this letter and 100 rubles will be given you and more." Of course, this was a bribe. I said it was not, to him, being my crude diplomacy. He refused to take it, explaining the instance of one of the guards being shot for the same offense about two weeks before in this very same prison. The man who offered the bribe was also shot. But I replied that I was unjustly being held; that I had done everything in my power by correspondence to get my case brought to trial, knowing my documents alone would be sufficient to exonerate me, and that I thought he and every Russian was sufficiently interested in having foreigners of diplomatic status taken care of while in Russia. He refused the aid I sought. I went back to my cell very disconsolate.

There was in the door of our cell the usual little peephole covered with a blind, such as is the door of every cell in a Russian prison. About two hours afterwards he opened the blind of the hole, calling my name. This guard said, "Simmons, if you have that letter with you and can put it through to me immediately, I will try," and he no more than said it before that letter addressed to the Swedish Consul General was through the hole, and down it went into his boot. I saw that through the peephole. During 36 hours elapsing after that I was one nervous man. But at the expiration of that time a calling card bearing Dr. Huntington's name, with a package having a loaf of bread and a few toilet articles, was given me, veritably a godsend, and on the back of the card was written, "Hold your nerve. We will have you soon."

Four hours after that the Swedish consul general, accompanied by the acting American consul general, came in an automobile to the prison and effected my release.

Now, to come back to my point, I in this prison came in contact with a great many people. It gave me a very excellent opportunity, gentlemen, to see the kind of men that were in there, and to learn their opinions, and to hear about the causes causing their arrest. In Lubanka prison, where I had 85 fellow prisoners, the personnel surprised me. I expected to find princes and men of all titles, and capitalists, and men of the caliber classed with these. There were a few of these, but the majority I would term the middle class, mechanics, printers, peasants—many peasants—small manufacturers, soldiers, priests, workmen, officers (army and navy), and professional men, students, etc.

Senator STERLING. Merchants?

Mr. SIMMONS. Merchants; many small merchants. This situation interested me so much that I felt that it was my duty to use the opportunity. There was a forester among the prisoners, and there were sawmill owners. I got considerable information along the line of my investigation in the parts of the country where these men were located. Not only were many of these prisoners not of the upper classes, but I know that I will surprise you when I tell you that 80 per cent did not know the cause of their arrest—not 80 per cent.

Senator STERLING. Did you say that 80 per cent did not know why they had been arrested?

Mr. SIMMONS. Eighty per cent did not know why they were arrested. Arrests generally were being made without giving the charge. On the second day in this prison there was a lawyer by the name of Velenken, a very cultured fellow, a high-type Jew. He had been the legal counsel for the British consulate in Moscow. He was about 34 years of age. He was a real patriot, actuated by high motives. He had many opportunities to leave Russia, but he would not do it, because he said in revolution was the time that the intelligence of Russia ought to stand by the country. After his arrest the special council gave him one short hearing, and they sentenced him to be shot. He came to me at 2 o'clock in the morning and aroused me from sleep off the floor, and he said, "Simmons, will you come and talk with me? I die at 6. Tell me about Siberia." He had never been there. "Tell me about America. Tell me anything to keep my mind off my awful fate." I got up and went over and sat on the side of his bunk. He had unfortunately been in prison a great while and could occupy a bunk. I talked, trying to cheer him, for over an hour and a quarter. He then wrote a letter to his sister, which he gave me to deliver. I afterwards delivered it. He sent a verbal message of esteem and good-by to Ambassador Francis. Soldiers came about half an hour afterwards. They led Mr. Velenken out in the usual formation that all prisoners realized meant to be shot. He never returned. His brother later told me he had been shot, and the officials refused to surrender his body.

That same day they led out a young prince. He rebelled, in contrast to the nerve and resignation of Velenken.

Senator STERLING. What was he charged with? Do you know?

Mr. SIMMONS. Velenken had been charged with counter-revolution. But he had done, he told me, nothing to overthrow the Bolshevik government. During his hearing they said, "If we let you off, will you promise to help us and do all you can to extend our cause?" He replied, "No; I can not." And he walked to death with resignation. That was the most pitiful sight that I ever saw. The sad duty fell to me of relating the details to his brothers in London, as I came through.

The prince, whose name I thought I had, was led out for execution without trial. There was not a day passed that the same soldier formation did not take men out of that cell, and many of them went to death without accusation or trial.

Now, this is not hearsay. You have heard of these terrors, but I was present and saw them.

Senator OVERMAN. Expecting every minute to be shot yourself?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not know. They told me I was to be tried. No one knew his fate. When they called out my name that day when I was moved from one prison to another, they tell me I turned very white.

Senator STERLING. So far as a trial was concerned, do you know anything about their form of trial?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; only what I was told. The lawyer who was shot said it was a perfect farce. The head of this council, a young man by the name of Peters, had been in England and, I believe, there was convicted of crime. Of that I am not positive.

Senator WOLCOTT. Some one has described him here as a man of pleasant manners, this particular lord high executioner.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; he was a man of rather pleasant appearance and very youthful looking. At the same time he was a man without principle and with no compunctions about ordering death penalties. The consul general, I think it was, of Italy, told me at the consulate of an experience happening at the time they were aiding me to get my effects away from the Bolsheviks after my liberation. He saw Peters sign an order for the execution of 71 officers, and never even read the names. While Peters was talking to him he picked up his pen and wrote perfunctorily his name, ordering every one of those men to death.

Senator NELSON. Those were officers of the old army?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Now, one day while I was there they took out 21 with the same formation, only more soldiers. I heard that those men all went to their doom because outside they had 26 who had just been arrested, and they had to make room. I can not testify to the actual execution of these men, but they went out under similar formalities, which the prisoners considered prima facie evidence.

Senator NELSON. And never came back?

Mr. SIMMONS. Never came back.

Senator STERLING. With reference to many of them, they could have had no better excuse?

Mr. SIMMONS. None whatever.

I want to tell you of the sad case of a peasant that I got particularly close to. There were many peasants prisoners, but this man met his doom while I was there. He was shot because he would not give up his food he had raised. I guess he was trying to organize men in his particular village to resist the action of the poor committees. The campaigns of those poor committees, as I explained, were to requisition food and to incite class antagonism among the peasants. He was an illiterate man, but not an ignorant man. You hear about the illiteracy of Russia, especially among the peasants. Their close connection with the soil, in trying to make ends meet on the farm, engenders a judgment, a common sense, which makes them, although illiterate, not ignorant. I am sure that we have in our respective communities men who can not read and write, on farms, who are perfectly qualified to vote. This peasant was that kind, and in them is the hope of Russian democracy.

Another victim was a mechanic, a specialist on compound marine engines. He had worked for the navy under the Czar, under the provisional government, and was returned by the Bolsheviks on the same job. They called on him to become affiliated with the workmen's government, or the Bolsheviki. He refused, saying, "I am not a politician. I am entirely wrapped up in my work. I am happy in work. I do not want to join any organization." But that would not do. They arrested him. He was of as quiet and easy a temperament as any man I ever met. They brought him to prison. When I left he had had a trial and was expecting to be shot.

A high priest of the church was there. He had been preaching sermons publicly denouncing the immorality of the Bolsheviki. They imprisoned him and shot him. This priest told me that he was a great admirer of Dr. Mott, of America.

Senator NELSON. Dr. von Mach?

Mr. SIMMONS. Dr. Mott, of the Y. M. C. A.

Senator WOLCOTT. John R. Mott.

Mr. SIMMONS. He had been in Russia on the Root commission. He told me that he had taken some of Dr. Mott's writings and translated them into Russian. He thought a great deal of him. He also told me about the relationship of the church, which I think it may be well to bring in here. His name was Vestor Goff. He explained that he was a priest—they call them "popes" in Russia—and that it was his duty to denounce immorality, wrong, and injustice wherever he saw it, and he said, "Although I know I will die for this, I am glad I did it." He was a wonderful old man. I became very fond of him. I played chess with him, and came to know him quite well.

Senator STERLING. He was an old man, you say?

Mr. SIMMONS. A man about 64 or 65 years old, but very alert, mentally as well as physically. He told me of an instance in Baku where a priest referred to the Bolshevik movement as "an emanation from hell." For that they arrested him. Over 3,000 men, women, and children stormed that prison and got the priest out and carried him around the streets of Baku on their shoulders. He said that the Bolsheviki could not open their mouths in the Russian Church, and he said that the awful terrorism that the Bolsheviks had been perpetrating, which had existed and did exist, had driven people closer to the church than ever he had seen them before. Now that they found that every other means was taken from them, every possible retreat closed, they were crowding the churches to the doors.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that the church in the end will prove the rallying center for the anti-Bolshevik forces?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it certainly will be one of the principal factors; no doubt of it. That priest took the occasion, knowing that I was an official of the American Government, thinking that it was the last duty he could perhaps perform for Russia, to beg me to go back and tell the American people, "For God's sake, send us help." He was speaking, gentlemen, not for himself, but for the large class of people that he represented.

Senator STERLING. What kind of help did you understand him to mean?

Mr. SIMMONS. Release from this terrible oppression, this tyrannical rule of a small class that represented the depraved elements, largely; people carrying on propaganda to engender class antagonism. They are the ones that constitute the Bolsheviki to-day. I ought to say, partially to correct the statement that I made this morning, that there are among the followers of the Bolsheviki some honest people who have been caught up in the psychology of the theories of Bolshevism, and others who, in their terribly distressed physical condition, believe that in this is the only means left for them to preserve their lives.

Senator NELSON. They rule, then, to a large extent by a reign of terror?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is what I am trying to prove now. Are these instances interesting to you?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can give you many more. I just want to use enough to illustrate the point.

One man was the owner of a sawmill, a very intelligent fellow, and because he would not give over his industry and because the employees of his industry begged him not to give it over—for he knew that his product was needed in the city to meet local needs, his being the only mill that was running at that time—they threw him into the prison. His case had not come to trial when I left.

Another man was a small merchant who had some goods to sell that he had saved and stored. There was not a large amount. I can not say exactly how much, but there was relatively a small quantity of textile goods. Because he offered them for sale at a time when all of these particular goods were supposed to have been confiscated—they had taken over all warehouses and deposits with big stocks in the country—they arrested him and threw him into prison for speculation.

Now, gentlemen, when these men went to prison, what do you think became of their families? They had no money that they could get their hands on, and they felt compelled to be there to protect their homes, because at this time lives were more or less in danger every hour of the day. To be away from their homes produced a terrible worry in the minds of conscientious men, and the psychology of that cell was the most depressing experience that I ever expect to have. Those men could hardly be made to talk, eat, or sleep. They walked the floors like caged lions, wondering why they were there, what all this meant, and what was going to be their end.

Senator STERLING. And wondering about their families?

Mr. SIMMONS. And wondering about their families at home.

Now, I will go just a minute to the other prison and give you an idea what was in that prison. I told you about the five English sailors that came on H. M. S. Attentive to the White Sea. This was before any formal landing at Archangel; a party of five sailors and an officer were out on duty of reconnoissance. They were in a motor boat. Overtaken by a large armed boat—Bolshevik cruiser—they were forced to get aboard after being fired on and made to stop. They were sent down to Moscow prison as prisoners of war. Those men had not the strength, after 28 days, to walk across that cell.

Our food, gentlemen, which is the same in all prisons, was two servings of weak soup, made out of dried fish, and if you ever tasted anything more bitter and unpalatable, I would be surprised. In addition to that they allowed us at first three-quarters of a pound of bread, and then one-eighth of a pound. At 6 o'clock in the morning we ate bread with hot water, not tea. It is impossible for anybody to exist long on such a frugal allowance.

Another man, and this I want to refer to, was a rich man, with the title of count. They gave him his release on payment of 50,000 rubles. According to their announced policy, having a title this man should have been executed. It shows that where there was something to be gained, something to be collected, where officials evidently could be benefited materially, they had neither policy nor scruples. They would let many men off on the payment of big sums of money, but this certainly did not make them immune from arrest soon again, as instances I heard about plainly demonstrated.

Senator STERLING. Now, to whom did that money go, do you suppose; to the prison authorities or to somebody higher up?

Mr. SIMMONS. To somebody higher up, I should say. I do not think it went to the prison authorities. Every time he was taken out of the cell—he made a dozen trips in connection with it—he always would be taken away from prison in an automobile, evidently to some tribunal, some place where his case was handled.

Now, that is the situation, which shows you what terrorism in Russia exists, and I want to try to impress it upon your minds that it was terrible. Wherever one went you heard the wails of the people. It was general, on the trains, on the steamboats, on which I would ride and where I would talk with people. Absolutely universal in Russia is the condemnation of the Bolsheviks. Of course, everything said in protest is said in a whisper, because if any man opens his mouth on the street or elsewhere in public he is gone. You ask, "Why do they not spread an organized movement against Bolshevism?" It is because they are alert and know the advantage of making an example of everybody they can in that line.

Now, the Russian people can not be overlooked. We are indebted to the Russians. It was said—I do not know whether it has been officially proved—that they gave 7,000,000 men to the war. Anyhow, according to English statistics, they have the largest casualty list.

Senator STERLING. Russia has?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator. They have been our allies, and much of the fighting they did helped the war, and this leaves us a debtor to aid them now in the very throes of distress and despair. It is even said that some of the peasants themselves are on their knees praying to the American President for relief.

Senator STERLING. Would they welcome any assistance that would relieve them from the terrors of Bolshevism?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are praying for it.

Senator STERLING. That involved armed assistance?

Mr. SIMMONS. It can not be done in any other way.

Senator STERLING. Why?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because arms are ruling and subjecting.

Now, I am down to the question of government. There is no cohesion in the Bolshevik government. For instance, I found that at the time they held the Fifth All-Russian Soviet in Moscow in July, in different villages the peasants hardly knew that there was such a thing. They had not sent anybody to represent them nor had they any say as to who was to go to Moscow. This idea that the Bolsheviks have a government that extends over Bolshevik or central Russia is not a fact. Of course, there were peasants in that soviet assembly, but they were a few carefully selected by the heads so as to know that they were thoroughly in sympathy and in accord with them, and who came from what they call the proletariat class of the peasants.

Senator NELSON. The landless peasants?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

(Thereupon, at 3.45 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee took a recess until 4 o'clock p. m., at which time the subcommittee went into executive session. The following testimony was taken, the name of the witness not being disclosed, because he feared the results of its being made known who gave this testimony:)

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ———.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Maj. HUMES. When did you return from Russia?

Mr. ———. I returned from Russia late in the fall of 1917. I left Petrograd November 6, the night the Bolsheviks uprising took place. I left with my wife by the Siberian Express, going through to Harbin, in Manchuria, then south by the Southern Chinese Railroad to Japan.

Maj. HUMES. Will you just state in your own way the economical and industrial condition of affairs in Russia and the general condition that existed with reference to the government?

Senator OVERMAN. He was not there during the Bolshevik régime.

Maj. HUMES. He was there when it started, and is familiar with things that have developed so far as his own plant is concerned and his own business.

Mr. ———. Of course, I saw the events which led up to the Bolshevik uprisings, which had been forming for several months before I left. Of course, I should be glad to tell you what I know about it. I had lived in Russia, up until the time of my leaving, about 23 years, and naturally am familiar with the country, which I have traveled over extensively, and the people of all classes, and their main characteristics to some extent, and their psychology.

Senator NELSON. You speak the language?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Have you been carrying on a manufacturing establishment over there?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir; we had a large factory.

Senator NELSON. That is in European Russia?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. What is the state of industry there now, since this Bolshevik revolution, to your knowledge?

Mr. ———. As I said just now, the production of our plant fell to such an unreasonable figure that along in—I think it was—August, 1917, we found that with the high wages—the wages had been increasing by leaps and bounds, and by August of 1917 they had probably reached a figure of perhaps six or seven times what they had been prior to the revolution—we found we were losing about half a million rubles a month on our operations, so I made a proposition to the Kerensky government, which was in power then, that if they wished to continue the manufacture of munitions we would gladly turn our plant over to them on terms which would be mutually satisfactory. That proposition was taken up by the Kerensky government, and along about the middle of September we formally turned the plant over to the government, and they continued the manufacture of munitions. Things were going so badly, both in the manufacturing branch of our business and also in the selling department, that I had made up my mind that it was necessary for me to come over to New York and consult with our principal stockholders as to what our future policy should be, and I had made all arrangements several weeks ahead of the date I actually left with that in view, knowing that it was very difficult at that time to get transportation, so my leaving on the night the Bolshevik rising broke out was quite incidental.

Our trip through Siberia was extremely disagreeable, because at every large station where the train stopped there was a meeting of these returning soldiers that were deserting the army in large numbers even at that early date, and they had meetings to decide what they should do with the bourgeois who were traveling on the express trains—whether they would throw them out and take possession themselves and put us on freight cars or whether they would allow us to go through; but, fortunately for us, the sense of each of those meetings was that we should be allowed to continue, which we did, reaching ———, which was our first destination, about 65 hours later.

We have been informed by the State Department that last summer our office building had been confiscated by the Bolsheviks on account of the nonpayment of a levy of some 87,000 rubles.

Maj. HUMES. What do you know about manufacturing there? Is your factory running?

Mr. ———. We have been informed by a man who came out of Russia in August that our factory is now closed down, simply because there was no work for the men to do, no raw material to be gotten. Our boilers were fired by oil, which we used to get from the——

Senator NELSON. What is the system of taxation there? Is the real estate taxed in Russia?

Mr. ———. It was under the old government. There was a real estate tax, and then a property tax, and also an income tax.

Senator NELSON. You had three taxes, then?

Mr. ———. There were other small taxes, less important taxes. For instance, a trading tax and a tax for the privilege of carrying on business. Then our agents had to pay an individual tax in order to carry on their business; of course, in the towns and cities there were also municipal taxes.

Senator NELSON. The levy on your building could not be the taxes for a year, then?

Mr. ———. No.

Senator NELSON. That must have been simply blackmail.

Mr. ———. Blackmail and an arbitrary levy because, I suppose, they happened to want 87,000 rubles, so they told us we would have to get it, but which our man evidently refused, which he did rightly, and the consequence was that the building was confiscated.

Along in the summer of 1917 the peasants living on our property up in ——— seized our property up there.

Senator NELSON. Seized your property?

Mr. ———. Yes; seized our property. That was along in the summer of 1917, before the Bolsheviks usurped the powers of the government.

Senator NELSON. That was under the Kerensky government?

Mr. ———. That was under the Kerensky government. They chased away the superintendent and all our men, taking charge themselves.

With regard to the industrial conditions before the Bolsheviks rising started, with the revolution of March, 1917, we found that there were quite a number of so-called Americans who had returned to Russia almost immediately after the revolution, commencing, probably, to arrive in April of 1917.

Senator NELSON. What sort of people were they? They were people who had been here, were they not?

Mr. ———. People who had been in this country.

Senator NELSON. Were they Hebrews?

Mr. ———. A large number of them were—that is, Hebrew by race, non-Slavs—and we were continually meeting these men on all sorts of labor conditions, to regulate the hours of labor and the rates of remuneration, and quite a number of them spoke English.

Senator NELSON. They had lived in this country for a number of years?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. But had not taken out their citizenship papers?

Mr. ———. I can not answer for that, because it did not occur to me to ask.

Senator NELSON. And they assumed control of this labor organization?

Mr. ———. Yes; they were the moving spirit in all these labor unions and arbitration and conciliation committees that were formed there.

Senator NELSON. You had to deal with them?

Mr. ———. We had to deal with them.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know whether they were I. W. W.'s or not?

Mr. ———. Well, they acted like they were. I do not know whether they were or not.

Senator NELSON. They were socialists.

Mr. ———. Yes; all socialists, avowed socialists, but whether they were I. W. W.'s formally, I do not know. I have here a cutting from the New York Times, the illustrated supplement of last Sunday, containing a group embracing most of the important Bolshevik leaders in Russia at the present time. I think the picture speaks for itself, without any comment.

Senator OVERMAN. Are any of these Americans, so called, men who had come from America holding any positions?

Mr. ———. That I can not tell you, Senator. None of these men are known to me except I know the names of some of them, having heard of them after I left Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not recognize the face of anyone here?

Mr. ———. There is one on the extreme side, as you are looking at the picture, which looks a little like Maxim Gorky to me, but I do not know whether it is or not. Tchitcherin is there, the man with the black beard and a bald head, in the middle of the group. Tchitcherin is the so-called foreign minister.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is Lenine here?

Mr. ———. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Is Tchitcherin a Russian?

Mr. ———. Yes; he is the son of a professor at one of the Moscow universities.

Senator STERLING. He is the present minister for foreign affairs.

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. A moment ago you said something about the cooperative organization that had grown up throughout Russia. What is that?

Mr. ———. The zemstvo.

Maj. HUMES. What are they?

Mr. ———. The zemstvo is not a cooperative organization at all. They are the local councils.

Senator NELSON. The local village government, are they not?

Mr. ———. Not the village government; no, sir. Each so-called government of Russia, which would be equivalent to our State, is divided up into provinces. Each province has its own central zemstvo, and in a province, if it is a large one, there may be two or three branches of the zemstvo, and in each town government, for instance, the government of Moscow, there are 13 of what I call counties, each of which has its local zemstvo, and in the city of Moscow there is a main zemstvo which controls to a certain extent the activities of all the local zemstvos of that particular government.

Senator NELSON. Then among the peasants who are settled in the villages they have village governments, what they call the mirs?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is a sort of local peasant government?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator STERLING. What are the functions or jurisdictions of the zemstvo; just exactly what are they?

Mr. ———. The zemstvo has the power of taxation, local taxation, and with the proceeds of the taxation they maintain highways throughout the district, the hospitals, and the village schools.

Senator NELSON. The nearest that would come to it would be our system of county government in the West? They are like our county commissioners?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir; I think that is a good parallel.

Senator OVERMAN. I notice on the map here that one portion is called Greater Russia, and then a little below that is Little Russia, and then again Great Russia. Can you explain that?

Mr. ———. No; I have not noticed that on the map.

Senator NELSON. Those names come from away back in the history of Russia. The center of the Slavic race that came from the Danube and settled in Little Russia, with Kiev as its capitol, is Little Russia, and then, as they advanced north, taking Moscow and Novgorod on Lake Ilmer, they called themselves as they occupied it, Greater Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. But you notice that Greater Russia is away down here.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but here is where it began, from the Danube and the mouth of the Black Sea, and went up.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you will allow me to make a suggestion there, I think that is the territory at present occupied by Great Russia, whereas the Little Russians occupy the portion there which is the Ukraine.

Senator NELSON. Yes; the western part of the Ukraine.

Senator OVERMAN. There are some Little Russians there very close to the Cossacks.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think you will find a greater number of the Little Russians there than in the other different divisions.

Senator STERLING. You were talking about the zemstvos. How do the zemstvos, in their functions of government, differ from the soviets?

Mr. ———. The members of the zemstvo were elected by popular vote in which the different classes took part, the landowners, the merchant class, and the peasants, so it differs fundamentally from the soviet government in that the soviet government is a government composed only of laborers. The other class is not allowed to take part in their elections, although it may theoretically, so the various soviets throughout Russia are merely packed assemblies.

Senator NELSON. Of the proletariat?

Mr. ———. Of the proletariat, but not necessarily, and probably not generally, the people living in that particular place. They are emissaries sent out from the central soviet government in Moscow or Petrograd when the city government was there.

Senator NELSON. Are you familiar with the land system of Russia?

Mr. ———. Yes; more or less.

Senator NELSON. After the serfs were emancipated, I understand the land was assigned to them in communities.

Mr. ———. That is so; yes.

Senator NELSON. In those village communities or mirs the land was assigned to the community in its entirety, and these communities allotted the land to the peasants for use, but did not give them the fee title.

Mr. ———. Yes; that is correct, sir.

Senator NELSON. Is that right?

Mr. ———. That was right when it started, but there was a sort of revolution in the land, in the sense that a man did not get his section of land in perpetuity, but every few years there was another meeting and a new allotment of the same land. Of course, that gave rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction among the better classes, the more industrious peasants who had improved their allotment and were making a good thing out of it, because the shiftless fellow who had done nothing with his land, but had let it lie fallow, might in the course of time be assigned the improved land, and the man who had improved the land might be assigned to the land of the shiftless fellow.

Senator NELSON. Then I suppose there were some of the peasants that became landowners?

Mr. ———. Yes; when ——— was premier of Russia, a man who was afterwards assassinated at Kiev some years ago, he introduced a new system by which the peasants could purchase their land, and a number of them took advantage of that and did so.

Senator NELSON. Then, they have had a share of the land that was owned by the state? Some of those lands were assigned to them?

Mr. ———. Yes; some of the state lands.

Senator NELSON. And they acquired by purchase some of the land of the big estates, of the big landowners?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And the peasants became the owners of those in time, in small parcels?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir; but a great deal of the farm lands, and also the forest land was in the hands of the large landed proprietors, and a great deal in the hands of the state, and also a very large quantity belonged to the royal family.

Senator NELSON. The lands in the Ukraine, in the prairie country, in what they call the black belt, are largely in large estates; are they now owned by large landowners?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Have you been down there toward Odessa and the Crimea?

Mr. ———. I have never been to Odessa, but all through the Crimea, through the black earth district up to Kiev, and east of that.

Senator NELSON. My understanding is, and I got it from a man who was the agent of the McCormick Co., for many years at Odessa, that it is a country of big estates, big farms, where they use a good deal of American agricultural machinery.

Mr. ———. Yes; there is considerable used over there. I know one man, who may be living, but I do not know, a Prince ———, who owned 18 very large estates in the south of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Do you know what the soviets have done, or the Bolshevik government has done, with these big estates, or attempted to do?

Mr. ———. The question of land has always been a burning question for the peasants in Russia. They have been promised more land, although they never took full advantage of the land they had, in the sense that we understand taking advantage of it, in that there were no intensive methods of agriculture instituted.

Senator NELSON. And no intensive efforts to get title in fee, as we understand it?

Mr. ———. No.

Senator NELSON. How is it through Siberia? Are they not settled in villages there, too?

Mr. ———. Yes; very largely. That is the Russian system. You will not find that a peasant proprietor will live on his land, but he will always live in a village.

Senator NELSON. They live in villages, too?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do they have that same system of communal ownership: that is, the mir's owning the lands, and allotting the use of it to the peasants?

Mr. ———. In Siberia?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ———. Yes; to a great extent.

Senator NELSON. There are Cossack colonies there in Siberia, are there not?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They are on a different footing?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They own their land, do they not?

Mr. ———. They own their land; yes.

Senator NELSON. And the Cossacks are exempt, or nearly exempt from taxation, with certain obligations, on the lower Don?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And on the Volga?

Mr. ———. On the Volga; yes.

Senator NELSON. And they own their land?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They get a sort of immunity from taxation, but they are liable to military service?

Mr. ———. Yes; they are liable to military service, and when they are called they have to provide their own horse and riding equipment, but their arms were provided for by the government.

Senator NELSON. And that same rule prevails among them in Siberia, too?

Mr. ———. Precisely the same.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know anything about the conditions over there now since the Bolsheviki got charge of the government?

Mr. ———. In Siberia, sir?

Senator OVERMAN. No; in the whole of Russia.

Mr. ———. The only evidence which I have which I could consider first class is the evidence brought out by friends of mine that have left comparatively recently.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know anything from your own observation or from what you have heard here, about Bolsheviki propaganda in this country?

Mr. ———. I have the idea that the whole Bolsheviki situation taking Russia is quite incidental that it is in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You think it came from this country over there?

Mr. ———. No; I do not think it came—in part, yes; but for years there has always been a revolutionary Russian colony in Geneva, and there has also been a revolutionary colony of Russians in London and Paris and also in this country, in Chicago, New York, and very likely in other cities.

Senator STERLING. But those in Switzerland and Paris and London, other than what might be termed social revolutionists, were they what you would call Bolsheviki, with Bolshevist principles such as we see now manifested?

Mr. ———. Well, there were a number of political exiles, honest, upright people, having theories of their own which were repugnant to the Czar's government. They left the country.

Senator NELSON. A large share of them were the remnants of the old nihilists, were they not?

Mr. ———. Yes. Take a man like Tchaikowski, who is now the president of the northern government in Russia. He is a man——

Senator STERLING. He is not a Bolshevik?

Mr. ———. No; he is opposed to them. Take a man like Kuropatkin, who used to be an anarchist. He was a tame kind of an anarchist.

Senator STERLING. Theoretical?

Mr. ———. Theoretical. But almost as soon as the revolution broke out it was put through; it was an accomplished fact that the prisons were opened and the exiles returned from Siberia.

Senator NELSON. That was one of the great mistakes of the Krensky government.

Mr. ———. That was the Lvoff government.

Senator NELSON. They opened the doors so that all the criminals could come back from Siberia.

Mr. ———. Yes; and the large number of the Bolshevik leaders are not only the people who have returned from America, but people who have returned from the slums of Whitechapel in England and from the Latin quarter in Paris and the byways and back streets of Geneva.

These men came back from those countries and their numbers were supplemented by swarms of Russian criminals who were released from Siberia and also from the Russian prisons in European Russia. Now, about the first thing these criminals did when they got out at large was to destroy all the police stations and all the police records, and after that they could pose without very much fear of being shot as political martyrs, when in reality they were cutthroats, murderers, and forgers and professional criminals.

Senator NELSON. And had been sent to Siberia as criminals?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They were distinguished from that other class of people who were sent to Siberia for political reasons?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They were sent there to live there and be confined there, but not in prison?

Mr. ———. A certain number of those prisoners in Siberia were political, but the greater number were just ordinary everyday criminals. Now, all of those fellows are posing as having suffered for the cause of freedom, and they have got themselves into high positions in Bolshevik circles.

Senator NELSON. And their forces there in Petrograd are recruited from these criminal classes?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Now, may I ask, were the ordinary criminals sent to Siberia and allowed to live there without being imprisoned, or were they put in prison in Siberia, and the exiles, those who had been guilty of political offenses, sent there without being imprisoned?

Mr. ———. No; I have seen myself prisoners going from Russia to Siberia, criminals and political prisoners mixed indiscriminately, and when they got to Siberia they were all confined in jails for a certain length of time, and then, if their behavior was good, they were let out on ticket of leave, and were allowed to carry on any business they could within certain well-defined limits.

Senator NELSON. The criminals were sent to work in the mines?

Mr. ———. The criminals were sent to work in the mines, but if a criminal and murderer after being put in jail, after a certain length of time, gave reason to believe that he was going to lead a decent life he would be given certain privileges.

Senator NELSON. He would get a ticket of leave?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Lenine?

Mr. ———. Never met Lenine.

Senator STERLING. Or Trotzky?

Mr. ———. Never met Trotzky. Trotzky, as you know, had lived for some years in New York, and I remember it struck me as being rather comical that when Kerensky was in power he asked the American Government to give passports to Trotzky, because he thought he would be able to help him out. And he did help him out.

Senator NELSON. They were both of Hebrew descent?

Mr. ———. No; Lenine is not.

Senator NELSON. I mean Kerensky and Trotzky?

Mr. ———. Well, I can not say absolutely or definitely about Kerensky, but I have heard on several occasions from different people in Russia that Kerensky's mother was a Jewess and his father was a Slav or non-Jew. The name Kerensky is more Polish than it is Russian.

Senator STERLING. Did you know any of the leaders of the Duma about the time of the breaking out of the revolution in March, 1917?

Mr. ———. I knew Rodzianko, and I knew him well; and I knew Miliukov.

Senator STERLING. What would you say as to the ability and patriotism of these men?

Mr. ———. I think their patriotism was beyond any question, and the Duma was really the deciding factor of the revolution. If Rodzianko and the other members of the Duma at the critical moment had said, "No; we are opposed to the revolution," it would have fizzled out, but by getting back of the Duma and the news spreading over the country, the people were glad to take up the side of the revolutionists.

Senator STERLING. The attitude of the Czar and those who were influencing him, like Razputin, the monk, etc., turned the leaders of the Duma, did they not, against the government?

Mr. ———. Yes; the thing got to be an open scandal, and the people could not stand it any longer. But Razputin, if you remember, was killed, not by socialists, but by members of the aristocracy, by a nobleman, the young Prince Usupoff. He was married to one of the cousins of the Czar.

Senator STERLING. That was because they were determined to rid the Government of that evil influence?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Did you observe while you were there the operations of the Germans and the German propaganda in Russia?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us about it?

Mr. ———. I do not think I can tell you anything that I can say is absolutely unquestioned. Of course, the Germans had a greater hold on Russia before the war than any other nationality.

Senator NELSON. Economically and commercially?

Mr. ———. Economically and commercially, and also in their influence at the court. The Czarina was a German, and although they say that when a woman marries a foreign husband she becomes a foreigner herself, that is not so. The leopard can not very well change his spots. Though they may be covered up, they are still there.

Senator NELSON. Even the mother of the Czar, although she came from Denmark, was really a German?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. The influence of the court was German?

Mr. ———. Almost entirely.

Senator NELSON. And some of their officers and generals were of German descent and had German names?

Mr. ———. Yes; had German names. The minister of the court was Baron Friedericks. He was a German.

One of the most prominent generals was Gen. Rennenkampf, a German. And there were many others.

Senator STERLING. How was the prime minister—Stürmer?

Mr. ———. Pro-German.

Senator STERLING. And the minister of the interior?

Mr. ———. Protopopoff? He was a Slav.

Senator STERLING. He was a Slav?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. But pro-German?

Mr. ———. He was a timeserver. He was like a weathercock on a building. He would turn whichever direction the wind blew, and sometimes he would turn before it actually started to blow.

Senator NELSON. Stürmer was a dangerous pro-German?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. What was the belief among the well-informed people there concerning the report that the grand duke was removed from his command by pro-German sympathizers, because he was too Slavic?

Mr. ———. I have talked with a great many people in Russia about that, and the feeling throughout the country, both among the civilians and the army men, was one of great disappointment when the grand duke was banished.

Senator OVERMAN. He was considered a great soldier, was he not?

Mr. ———. Yes; he had the confidence of everybody.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was it their belief that the German influences removed him?

Mr. ———. Yes; the minister of war, Gen. Soukhomlinoff. He was pro-German.

Senator NELSON. And is it true as it was claimed in the papers that they failed to provide the army with munitions and military supplies as they ought to?

Mr. ———. Yes; that is quite true. How much of it was due to general shiftlessness, lack of foresight, and how much was due to pro-German influence it is rather hard to differentiate, but the fact is that when the war broke out there was a great insufficiency of all weapons of war, and men, many of my own men that worked for me in the factory came back, and told me that they had been sent into action with bare hands, waiting to pick up the weapon of some one who had fallen before they could fire a shot. Other men have said that they went into action with clubs. But in spite of those enormous drawbacks, in spite of the insuperable obstacles, the Russians in the first part of the war did heroic service, not only for Russia but for the allies, and it is my belief that had Russia not made that first excursion into Prussia, Paris would have fallen.

Senator NELSON. I think that was a great help to the allies in 1914. That was under Rennenkampf.

Mr. ———. Yes. But that was the time that Col. Massoyerdoff sold out to the Germans. That was the prime reason of the defeat at Tannenberg.

Senator NELSON. That was at the time of the defeat in the battle of the Masurian Lakes?

Mr. ———. Yes; and this fellow Massoyerdoff was related by marriage to the minister of war, Gen Soukhomlinoff. It was a nasty German intrigue. Massoyerdoff was hanged, but that was too late.

Senator NELSON. I think there was some treachery in that disaster at Tannenberg.

Mr. ———. I think that is very well established.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why was this such a victory for von Hindenberg if there was so much rottenness on the other side?

Mr. ———. One of the men that was in that campaign told me that he ran for about 20 miles stark naked because he wanted to get back. The neck of the bottle was closing in so quickly that they abandoned everything, even their clothing, and ran.

Now, with regard to the Bolshevik leaders. One of the witnesses this afternoon mentioned the name Peters.

Now, I have been very credibly informed that this Peters is a Russian anarchist, or probably a Lett, who had been living in London, and you gentlemen will no doubt recall some years ago an incident in White Chapel, I think it was on Sydney Street, where a band of dangerous anarchists were besieged in a house. Winston Churchill took charge of the operations, I believe. This Peters was one of this crowd, and this is the man now that is exercising the power of life and death over the decent element in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Evidently he has taken a post graduate course to fit him for that job.

Mr. ———. Yes. Then the feeling toward this country—I would like to speak about that. During the war and after the revolution up to the time I left. The feeling toward this country after the war was a very friendly one. People thought that this country was disinterested in its friendship to Russia, for I recall it is one of the Russian traditions that years ago at the time of the famine this country sent over ships with grain to help the people, and that had been passed down as a tradition. But after the revolution, when so many of these men that had been living in New York and Chicago came back to Russia, one of their first acts was to spread the reports around that America was not friendly to Russia, that it was a capitalistic country, and that all they wanted was gain and to get money. All these returned Russians coming back to that country had been working in the sweatshops where they had been sweated by men of their own race, the Jewish race, and some of them may have spread these reports in good faith, had not known a better life in this country, had been sweated and had been exploited, their living conditions had been bad, and the cost of living was high, and they spread these reports over there that America was not that heaven on earth which some people had said, but was a miserable, grinding, capitalistic country. That began to have an effect upon the wide masses of population over there.

Senator NELSON. Now, what is your idea of the food supply in Russia? If they had means of transportation and distribution, do you think they have enough grain in Russia if it were distributed, if they had means of distribution, to supply their own people?

Mr. ———. I can not give you an answer out of my own knowledge, but from people who have returned from Russia—Americans—and there are a large number of them now in New York that I know quite well, I believe that the stock of provisions in Russia is quite ample to feed the entire population, if they could only be distributed.

Senator NELSON. Now, my recollection is that in normal times Russia had upward of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat for export—from 100,000,000 up to 200,000,000.

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They always had a few Provinces in the southeast of Russia that were in the arid belt, where crops frequently failed. That has been a frequent occurrence in the past, has it not?

Mr. ———. That has been a very frequent occurrence. I can remember in the years that I have been in Russia, probably three or four occasions that there were popular subscriptions to help the people who were starving.

Senator NELSON. Those were the provinces on the Lower Volga and the Don?

Mr. ———. The last one was lower, as far as Orenburg, down through there. I remember our men in the factory took up very liberal subscriptions.

Senator NELSON. If they had transportation facilities so that they could distribute their food, they no doubt would have ample supply for their uses?

Mr. ———. I think so. The manager of our company was over here in New York recently. We cabled him last fall to come over and let us know what was going on in his territory. His headquarters are at Irkutsk. It is about halfway across Siberia, near Lake Baikal. He arrived in New York the latter end of November, and is probably back in Vladivostok now. He told me, with regard to the food supply, that all through Siberia there were large supplies, but that they were unavailable on account of the breakdown of the transportation system. Siberia has been a great butter country.

Senator STERLING. Does this factor enter into the distribution of the food supply—the reluctance or the refusal of the peasants to give up their wheat, to sell it?

Mr. ———. Yes; that is also a very important factor. I do know that even before I left Russia in our district, while it was not an agricultural district, that it was not comparable with the black-earth belt, is very much less productive, but in the outlying villages the peasants had dug holes in the ground—pits—in which to put their surplus grain. Then they had felled small trees and laid the trunks across and covered the trunks with earth, and covered them over so that nobody could find it.

Senator NELSON. That was to keep it from the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ———. There was not a Bolshevik government at that time; but the food situation was getting to be so serious, and parties were going out looking for food and taking it by force. This was a means which the peasants took to avoid that.

Senator NELSON. I suppose that the peasants would not be unwilling to sell at a fair price?

Mr. ———. Money began to lose its value, and they did not want the money. I know of one case of a rolling mill near Moscow where the wages of the men had risen to such an extent that at the homes they were keeping this paper money in bundles, and one woman brought a bundle to the office and asked to have it changed, because the mice had eaten the corners off of it.

Senator WOLCOTT. If a man wanted to buy a suit of clothes, he would have to haul the money down in a cart?

Mr. ———. A suit of clothes when I left cost 1,000 rubles.

Senator NELSON. They had in Russia a species of cooperative company, did they not?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us briefly what their plan of operation was?

Mr. ———. The cooperative idea had taken firm root throughout Russia and over through to Siberia.

Senator NELSON. Is it among the peasants and the traders?

Mr. ———. It is among almost everybody. There were all sorts of cooperative societies. There would be one cooperative society among the peasants for the buying of seeds and the buying of agricultural implements.

Senator NELSON. Are these cooperative societies buying societies or are they for both buying and selling?

Mr. ———. Both buying and selling; buying and distributing.

Senator NELSON. That is, they operate in their buying through these societies—these corporations?

Mr. ———. Buying and selling equally.

Senator NELSON. How has it worked; how has it succeeded?

Mr. ———. If a few people wanted to start a cooperative society, they first draft by-laws, take them to the authorities and have them confirmed, then each one puts in a certain amount of money. It is a sort of stock system.

Senator NELSON. What I mean is this, not just how they form them, but I mean what has been the result of the actual operation? Have they proved useful?

Mr. ———. I should say that they have proved distinctly useful, and they have increased very much since the revolution.

Senator NELSON. And are they carrying on those cooperative societies now?

Mr. ———. Yes; I believe they are, and the operations of them are much larger than before, from the point of view of the money turned over, but, of course, that is explained very largely by the depreciation of the ruble.

Senator NELSON. Do they carry on banking in that way, too, through cooperative societies?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And creamery business?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Siberia is a great butter country, is it not?

Mr. ———. It is a great butter country.

Senator NELSON. Is their butter made in creameries?

Mr. ———. Yes; in creameries, and they are largely in cooperative creameries. Our man that I spoke of, our Siberian manager, tells me that there are thousands of tons of butter in Siberia now, and that in view of the lack of proper lubricants for railroad cars and wagons and trucks, they are using butter.

Senator NELSON. It is a pity that we have not some of that here. Is it really good butter?

Mr. ———. Splendid. I spoke awhile ago about the feeling in Russia toward the United States, that up to the time of the revolution it was friendly. But when these fellows came back and spread these reports about this country, the feeling changed. There was at that time a little Bolshevik newspaper that has now become one of their chief organs, called the ———, which means The Truth, in which they had some very insulting articles directed against Minister Francis of the United States. This country went into the war after the revolution. Up to that time when any new country had declared war on the central powers, they had rejoicings and street processions and speeches. But when this country came into it there was nothing of the sort. The thing fell absolutely flat.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you there when the Root commission came over?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the feeling about that?

Mr. ———. I do not think there was any feeling; that is, no serious feeling. It did not touch the great bulk of the people of Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You said that they circulated the report that this commission represented the capitalists?

Mr. ———. Yes; although on the commission, as you know, almost every section of society was represented.

Senator STERLING. Do you think the cold reception which they gave our entry into the war was due to propaganda that was going on over there poisoning their minds?

Mr. ———. That was probably the primary factor.

Maj. HUMES. Is it, or is it not, a fact that Lenine declared that there was a state of war existing between Russia and the United States?

Mr. ———. He is said to have done so.

Maj. HUMES. In a public utterance?

Mr. ———. In a speech before the central soviet in Moscow, and then Tchitcherin qualified that by a long rigamarole which said they were not at war with the working classes of the United States, but that they were at war with the capitalists.

Senator NELSON. From what you know about Russia, how do you look upon the situation? Do you think the bulk of the Russian people, the biggest share of them, are substantially anti-Bolshevik?

Mr. ———. I have no doubt of it.

Senator NELSON. And they would be glad to have us give them a helping hand?

Mr. ———. They are praying for it.

Senator NELSON. And what they need really more than anything else is ammunition and guns—military supplies?

Mr. ———. Yes; I am of the opinion that it would require a very small American or allied force to bring about order in Russia, and it might not even be necessary for these fellows to fight, but to give moral support, and to act as a guard to the munitions which they would bring in with them.

Senator NELSON. I understand—see if I am correct, and I gather this from what I have seen in the newspapers—that practically the anti-Bolshevik forces, those that are opposed to Lenine and Trotzky, have control of the whole Siberian line clear up as far west as Perm. Is that correct?

Mr. ———. That is my understanding.

Senator NELSON. And that the Bolshevik government has no power in that country?

Mr. ———. No. Here is a map of Siberia and the greater portion of European Russia.

[A map was shown and described to the members of the committee.]

According to newspaper reports the other day, the Omsk government has made arrangements with Japan to provide men, munitions, and money in return for iron and coal concessions along here [indicating]. This is very rich.

Senator OVERMAN. What province is that?

Mr. ———. The pre-Amur, "pre" meaning at or adjoining the Amur River.

Senator STERLING. Well, what would you say with regard to the feeling in Russia generally as to Japan and Japanese intervention? Is there a prejudice against Japan, or a fear of Japan?

Mr. ———. There is a certain fear of Japan, more particularly in Siberia, it being nearer. But in Russia, at the time I left, they were getting so pessimistic, and that was before the Bolshevik uprising, that they would have welcomed the devil himself if he had come to help them. There has been a very general feeling in that country and also in some of the European countries that one of the contributory causes of the revolution was the very bad labor conditions in Russia. I would like to go on record as saying that I do not consider that the labor conditions, as a whole, were bad.

Senator NELSON. Wages were low, compared with our wages, and the hours of labor were long?

Mr. ———. In our factory, and we are not an exception to the general rule, we worked exactly the same hours that we do in our factories in the United States.

Senator NELSON. Eight hours?

Mr. ———. Nine hours. We are working eight hours now. That is the basic day.

Senator NELSON. How do your wages compare with ours?

Mr. ———. About half, but the cost of living was about half. That is to say for all practical purposes the ruble may be considered as a dollar. No matter which way you take it, whether buying or selling. There are very large cotton mills on the line running from Moscow to Nijni Novogorod, and these mills are among the best in the world, magnificent buildings, well ventilated, with sanitary arrangements, excellent sanitary arrangements, and dormitories, both for the married employees and also for the unmarried.

Senator NELSON. Have they any woolen factories there?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. How are the flour mills?

Mr. ———. Very good.

Senator NELSON. But I understand that their warehouse and elevator facilities are very poor down in the black belt?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is, that they do not handle grain as we do in this country?

Mr. ———. Not to the same extent, although down on the Black Sea, at Novorosiisk, for instance, there is probably one of the largest grain elevators in the world, not far from Odessa, along the shores of the Black Sea.

Senator STERLING. What kind of wheat do they grow there, both winter and spring wheat, according to latitude?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And is the spring wheat grown farther to the north a hard wheat?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Will it compare with our hard wheat, such as is grown in the State of Minnesota, or the Dakotas?

Mr. ———. I am not an agriculturist and know very little about it, but from what I have heard I imagine it will compare very favorably with Minnesota wheat.

Senator NELSON. We have some of our varieties from there. They raise a good deal of rye in Russia, do they not?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. They do not raise much corn?

Mr. ———. No; not a great deal of corn.

Senator OVERMAN. How far is that from Moscow, where the allies are?

Senator NELSON. I think it is about 100 miles. This Kola line [indicating on the map] runs up to the Murman coast. The Russians built that after the war commenced.

Mr. ———. Incidentally, the Chinese coolies that were working on that line now form the nucleus of the Bolshevik army.

Senator NELSON. That road must be 700 or 800 miles long.

Mr. ———. This military situation in the north looks to me, going back to history to find a parallel, like the abandonment of Gen. Gordon in Khartum in 1885. Mr. Gladstone was so much occupied with parliamentary reform that he did not take action until his colleagues in the ministry threatened to resign, and then he grudgingly sent a small force, but it arrived too late.

Senator NELSON. I think that if we had 20,000 men at Archangel, good soldiers, fighting men, and plenty of ammunition, and guns, to supply the Russians, it would end the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Of the two alternatives, the withdrawal of the allied forces in northern Russia or reenforcing those allies, which would be the better, do you think?

Mr. ———. To my mind, reenforcements.

Senator NELSON. But we must remember now that this winter we can not get any ships into Archangel nor can any ships get out of there. That is the situation. The only way we can get relief is to send ships by the Murman coast and have them come down that way [indicating]. We could not get anything into Archangel now nor could the Archangel troops get out.

Mr. ———. I do not know whether this road [indicating] is in working order or not. But even as it is there will be a long march across country.

Senator NELSON. And they would have to control the railroad.

Mr. ———. But they not only would have to control the road that runs to Kola, but they would have to go across a tract of country some 300 or 400 miles.

Senator NELSON. They would have to go down as far as St. Petersburg.

Mr. ———. Yes; they would have to cut south of Lake Onega and cut across here [indicating].

One of the witnesses the other day, I saw in the New York Times report, gave the assumed names and the real names of a lot of Bolshevik officials. I have had in my possession quite a while a much shorter list and as the names in my list are included in the other one I do not think it is of any use.

Senator NELSON. Does it include any names not on the other list?

Mr. ———. It includes two or three. This is a list of the members of the executive committee of the Petrograd Council of Workers' Deputies, constituted in 1917.

Senator NELSON. Let us have them.

(The list referred to is here printed in the record, as follows:)

Members of the Executive Committee of the Petrograd Council of Workers' Deputies as constituted in 1917:

Known as:	Real Name:	Known as:	Real Name:
Soukhanoff	Himmel	Goreff	Goldman
Kamenoff	Rosenfeld	Meshkovsky	Goldenberg
Stekloff	Nakamkes	Larin	Lourier
Zinovieff	Apfelbaum	Bogandoff	Silberstein
Martoff	Cederbaum	Skobeleff	} All Grusinians. Their names are their real names.
Pargoul	Helfand	Cheidse
Zagodsky	Krokman	Tseretelli
Trotsky	Bronstein

Mr. ———. There is one other thing, if I may take a few minutes of your time. There was a certain Col. William B. Thompson, who was out in Russia for the American Red Cross. He returned to this country before I did, or about the same time, and this little pamphlet that I have in my hand contains a speech of Hon. William M. Calder, of the United States Senate, January 31, 1918, embodying an address by Col. William B. Thompson at the Rocky Mountain Club, New York City. Col. Thompson's statement is very much of a brief for the Bolsheviks, and I consider it is the most insidious sort of propaganda that has been put out. There are statements here that time has proved to be entirely false. He said [reading]:

At the time I reached Petrograd that noble Russian patriot, Alexander Kerensky—and I am deliberate in calling him a noble man—was attempting a coalition government, a government representing the rich and the poor. The rich, however, were not satisfied to work with the poor.

That is not so.

And again [reading]:

The terrorism under which the limited property-owning class is living in Russia is slight compared with the terrorism in which the workingman and the peasant lives in contemplating a return of the power of the old regime.

Nonsense.

He says [reading]:

I will say right here that if at any time during my travels I was a witness of deeds of wanton destruction and violence, it was not in Russia. If at any time I was subjected to any discourtesy or incivility, it was not in Russia. If at any time I was in danger, it was not in Russia.

And again [reading]:

When I say that they want peace, I do not say that they want a separate peace. Democratic Russia, in my opinion, will never make a separate peace with autocratic Germany. The present government has not ordered the soldiers away from the trenches. On the contrary, it is filling the places of deserters with new soldiers recruited from the red guard.

And others of like language.

Senator NELSON. When was that printed?

Mr. ———. This was printed in 1918. It was printed in the Government Printing Office in Washington.

Maj. HUMES. When was the speech delivered?

Mr. ———. In the Senate the 31st of January, 1918.

Senator NELSON. Delivered here in the Senate?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; I remember Senator Calder put it in. I remember when he put it in.

Mr. ———. The point I would like to emphasize about this thing is not so much the statements here but the propaganda possibilities, because I have a niece who is a teacher in the New York public schools, and these things were distributed among the teachers to give to the children. That is what I call Bolshevik propaganda of an insidious kind.

Senator NELSON. Did you know him when he was in Russia?

Mr. ———. I never met him.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know whether he assisted the Bolsheviks there?

Mr. ———. There were rumors to that effect, but I do not know whether he did or not. I can not say.

Senator NELSON. He is reported to be a very wealthy man, is he not?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. A millionaire?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. How did he acquire his millions?

Mr. ———. By the sale, I believe, of copper stock.

Capt. LESTER. I would like to ask Mr. ——— a question or two about the work of the Creel bureau in Petrograd, the Bureau of Public Information. Did you observe any of the activities of that bureau there?

Mr. ———. I think all I can say about that is this. When our very efficient and very faithful consul, Mr. Summers, was in Moscow and sacrificed his life for his country's service, he asked me one day whether, in view of the ramifications of our organization throughout Russia, we would consent to distribute material, and I told him I would be glad to do so, and I furnished the list of names of our office managers throughout the country, and he said he would undertake to send them this material, but I can not say whether it was done or not. It was shortly before I left the country that he asked me about it.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there anything else that you wish to state?

Mr. ———. No, I think not, sir; but I can only express my own personal gratification of the highest kind that you gentlemen have undertaken this inquiry. I have been back in this country for more than a year, and I felt like a prophet in the wilderness. Nobody seemed to care what I had to say about Russia. But you understand that what I have said in criticism of the Russian people applies only to the Bolsheviks, and there are no doubt large numbers of people calling themselves Bolsheviks simply because the only way to get something to eat is to profess Bolshevik doctrine.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you think that Bolshevism is a menace here now?

Mr. ———. I think it is a very severe menace, and as I think I said when I began to give my testimony, the fact of this taking place in Russia is merely incidental; that if this country had presented the same conditions as Russia did when these fellows started their active campaign, it would have been this country, or it might have been France, or Portugal, or it might have been Brazil. They, with intense cunning, selected their ground, the ground that promised the best fruits, and I think they made the best selection they could possibly have made, but I do think it is a severe menace not only for this country but for the rest of the world.

Senator NELSON. The documents in this country show that they are now engaged in a propaganda of the most vicious kind. I have documents in my room that came right from Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, where I live, a city about the size of Washington, and I am surprised at the number of Bolsheviks they have out there.

(Thereupon, at 5.45 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Monday, February 17, 1919, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Simmons, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROGER E. SIMMONS—Resumed.

Mr. SIMMONS. We were speaking, at the close of my testimony on Saturday, of the acts of brutality and other terrorism which I saw while I was in prison.

There are a few things that I want to tell you about, which I noticed when I got out of prison. The first is that by force of arms men and women were compelled to labor; not at any labor that they chose, but at any labor that the Bolsheviki assigned to them. Much of this labor was of a character for which they were totally unfit—even physically unfit. For instance, men who had been making a living by their brains—lawyers, merchants, clerks, school-teachers, etc.—many of whom had reached an age when it was hard for them to buckle down to physical labor, were compelled, with machine guns behind them, to go into the ditch, to street cleaning, to unloading railroad cars of wood, coal, flour, and other heavy freight, and to haul cumbersome materials on wagons, such as stone, brick, and lumber. Further—although I did not see it, still I have heard of it many times—that many such people were compelled to dig the graves in which their own class and others were soon to be buried.

I remember one instance of a lady. I was walking from the Europe Hotel to the American Embassy.

Senator NELSON. In Petrograd?

Mr. SIMMONS. In Petrograd; yes, sir. There was a gang cleaning the streets with picks and shovels by loosening the snow which, of course, by being driven over for days, had become very packed, almost ice. To remove it required the use of picks. Among this force was a young lady of, I should say, perhaps the age of 22 or 23 years, dressed in a sealskin coat, and whose general appearance showed that she belonged to the upper classes. Her manipulation of the pick was one of the most amusing instances I saw. She was barely able physically even to raise the pick. She toiled with great labor. I walked over to her and said that apparently she was incapable of doing such work. Her reply was that she was compelled to, for the little money that her father had left her mother and herself had been lost when the banks were confiscated, and that she could not buy any food without money. Food was at a very high price, therefore it was necessary for her to work, and that the only work they would assign her to do was this using the pick and shovel.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do I understand that they would not permit her to work at something else if she could have found it?

Mr. SIMMONS. There was little else available except what officials would assign.

Senator WOLCOTT. They had the reins so in their hands that they could—

Mr. SIMMONS. They directed all labor; yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. They were the task masters, so to speak, of the nation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. And put the people to work in whatever way they wanted?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Regardless of the aptitude or condition of the particular citizens?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. And to show you the character of this woman. I offered her—of course, I pitied her—a small sum of money. She refused, and turned her back and walked away, saying that she could not stand the strain of this labor, but she refused the money. Virtually, she implied by so doing that she did not want charity; she wanted work.

Another instance. I was carrying from the American consulate a heavy package—fairly heavy, because the distance was long—and I guess I showed I was laboring under it a little. A very neat-looking girl of the middle class came up to me and asked permission to carry the package. When I looked at her frail stature I told her that she could not do it. She replied that she had to make money, and she wanted to do any work possible. I offered her a little money; she also refused to accept it.

As for the men, it was a very frequent sight to see them, as I told you, laboring with horses and carts, shoveling material off the carts, etc., and many of them you could see were neither experienced nor capable of such work. Many of them also were sent to dig trenches at the various fronts, I remember hearing.

Senator OVERMAN. Could you tell from the faces of those people whether they were hunger-pinched or starved?

Mr. SIMMONS. As to these particular ones I can not say that I noticed that, sir; but I very frequently noticed people whose faces indicated hunger, many people unable to get on their feet as the result of hunger, and some dead, who they said died of hunger. As to these particular ones, I did not notice it.

Senator WOLCOTT. When you use the expression "get on their feet," do you use it metaphorically, or is that literally true?

Mr. SIMMONS. In a literal sense. Perhaps you do not know that hunger affects people in that manner. The first thing, they sit down, and then they fall over as if from exhaustion, and then they say death comes slowly. There were many of them, very refined looking and very substantial people, whom you could see sitting on doorsteps, on curbs, and places of that kind, who would tell you, begging, that they were in dire need of food.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear, Mr. Simmons, of the case where old men were made to dig the graves of their sons condemned to death and who were shot?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of their sons?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think I ever heard that phase of it, sir; but I heard many, many times that they were compelled to dig the graves of friends and people of their own class, and often their own graves.

Senator OVERMAN. Even to dig their own graves?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and I would hear that they would be arrested soon afterwards because they would protest, or on some pretext, and as a result would be thrown in prison, and die there or be executed; but, as I say, they were rumors, and I did not see the occurrences.

The men were not only compelled to labor, but they were compelled to go into the army. Alexander Schultz was a friend of mine. When the war broke out he was in Switzerland, where he had a home—work of some kind—and he had small means, inherited from his father. He sold his property at the outbreak of the war and went back home and put his funds into bonds, because he wanted to help in the prosecution of the war.

Senator WOLCOTT. Put it in Russian bonds?

Mr. SIMMONS. Russian liberty bonds. He went back to Russia, enlisted in the army, and worked himself up. When I saw him—just after the army was demobilized—he was a lieutenant. Bolsheviks compelled Mr. Schultz to go into service to help the organization and disciplining of the Red Guard Army, and he told me that they compelled him by force to do it. He said he loathed it and that he would do anything in his power if he could only get away to go up north and join the allies. He spoke of many other officers among his acquaintances who would do likewise if this duress of arms was not behind them, and if they were allowed to leave the country.

One of the guards of my prison was a Lett. He spoke English, having been in England. I said to him, "Why are you a Bolshevik?" He came right back and said, "I am not a Bolshevik." He said, "I would get out of here in a minute if I could, but I can not leave even the city without permission. If I do not stay and do my duty as a guard and as a soldier, I will be shot, as others have been."

I was saying that men were compelled to serve in the army, and that by the policy of force the Red Guard organization had been largely built up. It started, as you know, with the Lettish troops, who were brought into Russia with promises of big pay and plenty of food and grain from other sources, I presume as the result of plunder. Letts, with contingents of Chinese, and German prisoners, were the nucleus of the Red Army. The Bolsheviks had great trouble in getting numbers of Russians to join and help them. It was after the leaders saw the protests of the people rising universally that they resorted to the force of arms, the machine gun and the bayonet, to mobilize the Red Army. Conscription was from the age of 16 or 18, I do not know which, to 55 years.

Senator OVERMAN. By means of these Lettish troops they were able to disarm the people and get munitions and guns, were they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Their purpose in disarming the people was in order that they might force or compel this terrorism?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; one of the worst things in regard to the terrorism was the "leveling of intelligence," as was made public in one of the speeches of either Trotsky or Lenine. I am sorry I have not the documentary proofs of this, as I did not have time before I left home to get them, but I think that you will find from witnesses who follow me—and I trust that one of them at least will be able to submit to you documentary proofs—that this aim of the leveling of intelligence was one of the most ghastly aspects of the terrorism. Men who were thought to have more intelligence than was healthy for the cause of the social revolution were arrested and imprisoned, and I am sure I am right when I say many of them on this ground were put to death. This leveling of intelligence followed a declaration in a public speech—I do not think it was a decree—of one of the leaders, and this policy, if grasped, will show you how dangerous this whole international campaign of the Bolsheviki, based on class antagonism, is.

Famine, gentlemen, was widespread, especially in the cities, and by the use of food, as well as by the use of arms—because the Bolsheviki had mobilized the food supplies available for distribution, and they used it as they used arms—they compelled people to bow to their behests.

I remember that this man Alexander Schultz, of whom I spoke, who was a lieutenant, told me of officers who were fighting against the English and the entente and the Americans, as well as the Czechoslovaks, because the authorities said, "We have the food, and if you want to save your family, your wife and your children, from starvation you will have to take up your gun or your sword and go into the army."

Aside from that the prices of foods, as you know, were extortionate; and even if you had the money, it was almost impossible to buy it outside of the community stores; and the food, of course, there would not be sold except on cards, under a rigid system of distribution.

All of this terrorism, gentlemen, the result of Bolshevism, I think was instigated by Germany, for the Bolsheviki had been put in power by Germany. I do not think this story I am going to tell you has ever been printed, and I doubt if more than a few of the Americans formerly in Russia know anything about it, but it makes a strong case. The man who told me this was the man who directly did the work, and when he told it to me I thought it was of sufficient importance to take him to Moscow and make him repeat it before the American consul general under oath.

Senator WOLCOTT. By the way, did he go with you and make his statement under oath?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. When the war broke out this man was teaching in a school in Germany. He was a socialist and a Russian; had been in exile in Siberia under the Czar and had worked for many years to bring about revolution in Russia. He was a socialist, but a socialist of the conservative type that believed in bringing about socialism by evolution and not by revolution. One day a man came to him and said, "The imperial chancellor wants a Russian to go to Switzerland to study the schools of socialism."

Senator NELSON. Who was the imperial chancellor at that time, Stürmer?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; Hollweg.

Senator NELSON. You mean the imperial chancellor of Germany?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I do not remember exactly at that time, but this was just before the Russian revolution—the first revolution, of March, 1917.

Senator NELSON. It was Bethmann-Hollweg, I think.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I thought. They wanted a man to go to Switzerland because that republic was the seat or the headquarters of the different schools of socialism—Russian socialism particularly—and they wanted a study made with a view to finding out the most radical school. He tried to induce the socialists to undertake this, knowing he wanted to bring about revolution in Russia, or, in other words, to overthrow the Czar. • They said the German Government was willing to appropriate 5,000,000 marks if that school, or the men representing that school, would go into Russia and start a propaganda.

This man, my informant, being a Russian intern and knowing that the war was going on, could not exactly figure out how to sum up this proposal. He took it to an American who was interned also, or stayed there. I do not believe we were at war then, but he was staying there because his aged mother, in delicate health, could not be moved. He is well known as a prominent American, and, I believe, to-day is in Hamburg. To him he took the proposal of the imperial chancellor for advice, and after a long discussion the American advised my informant to accept the job, thinking that it might lead to something of importance to the allies. He therefore accepted the work, and went to Switzerland to visit and mix among all of the Socialists. In a 300-page report to the imperial chancellor's office he stated that the school headed by Lenine was decidedly the most radical, but recommended that no connection be made with Lenine, because if his ideas were practiced it would bring about utter chaos in Russia, economical, social, and otherwise.

He was highly commended and well remunerated for this work, and by means of it he was able later to reach a position so as to effect his escape from Germany. When he got back to Russia the first revolution had taken place, and he put all information and his services at the disposal of Kerensky, Kerensky giving him quite an important position for it.

Now, gentlemen, if you will take that story and then the facts as they have been made public subsequently, of Lenine being ushered through Germany into Russia from Switzerland—

Senator NELSON. You mean from Switzerland, through Germany, into Russia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Into Russia when the war was going on, and then take the documents brought out by Mr. Sisson that you have had, I guess, presented to you, that shows that the German Government was giving them money to carry on the Bolshevik government and with the fact of German officers being found in the Red Army, you can see it is a very strong case; that there was collusion between the Germans and the Bolsheviks.

Now, I do not say that Lenine was an out-and-out agent and did the will of the German Government. I should make a guess and say that he said to them something of this order, "If my ideas and my propaganda and my efforts will fit in with your plans, all right; but my plans as I have outlined them," and he had outlined them in his books, and everybody knew them. "will have to fit into German aims." I do not know that Lenine has been the tool of Germany, I do not know that he was the agent and did the will of Germany, and I do not want to leave that idea with you as coming from me.

Senator WOLCOTT. Whether he did as they said or not, he did what they desired?

Mr. SIMMONS. He did what they desired; that is the point. I think Lenine almost acknowledges that there was an understanding, if not an absolute agreement, if I may read this excerpt of this speech he made, which appears in a certain issue of the paper Izvestija, No. 223.

Senator NELSON. A Russian Bolshevik paper?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator. This says, "The capitalists have not yet disappeared (meaning quite disappeared from Russia). Germany has now sent away our representative, pointing to our revolutionary propaganda. We became dangerous only after they were crushed in war." I think that that implies that there was some relationship.

There was a battle between those protesting against Bolshevism and the Bolsheviks in Yaroslavl. I happened to pass through shortly after the battle began, and our train was delayed over 11 hours because the fighting was going on very actively around the station.

Senator NELSON. That is northeast from Moscow, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Northeast from Moscow; almost north. It is on the railroad that goes from Vologda to Moscow. It is about halfway between. After this battle, which was won first by those protesting, or what they call the White Guard, and subsequently by the Red Guard, who, after driving out the White Guard, murdered many non-combatants, including women, there was a photograph taken, which the Bolsheviks had made themselves, of the officers engaged in this battle. Among the officers were German officers in German uniforms.

Senator NELSON. That was of the officers of the Red Guard?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of the Red Guard, and the German officers were wearing iron cross decorations. This picture I saw myself, and it fell into the hands of a friend of mine who showed it even out of Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. You saw it in Russia and then you saw it after you left?

Mr. SIMMONS. I saw it in Russia, but I understand he carried it out. Here is a statement which bears on this.

"I had frequent opportunities," writes this friend of mine, "for visiting Bonch Bruevitch at his home in the ———, as well as visiting an intimate friend of his, ———, the secretary of the famous writer, Tolstoi, and a man of unquestioned sincerity. Stated that ——— told him that the Bolsheviks had already entered into a definite agreement with the Germans to receive help against the English in the north and against the Czecho-Slavs in the east, if that proved necessary. The Germans had agreed to respect the Soviets and not to interfere with the government, but confine themselves strictly to military operations. Already ——— stated that some heavy artillery and some German officers and soldiers had passed around Petrograd on their way north."

Now, Bonch Bruevitch, if you will remember, on Saturday I told you was the private secretary of Lenine. He is in Lenine's office and is intimately connected with him, and has considerable influence over him.

Another story that will interest you in this connection, and I think you should know, is this: If you will remember, I told you that as I was sitting in the office of Iduke, after I was taken prisoner, there was an interruption. That interruption was the entrance of two Kronstadt sailors. They said to Iduke, "We have a train out here of some 400 or more sailors that are going to the White Sea front, but we refuse to go any farther unless you give us more bread. We are only getting a pound and a quarter per day."

Iduke, in his irascible way, very insolently refused, and ordered them to leave his office. They replied in the same spirit in which he refused, that if he would come to Kronstadt he could then learn enough system to be an efficient officer and to ration his units. That so enraged him that he beckoned to his Red Guards who were standing by and said, "Put these men under ground in 20 minutes," and I was told by my guards that took me to Moscow that those men were under ground in 20 minutes.

Senator NELSON. Four hundred of them?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the two that represented the 400, that came into the office. But in about three-quarters of an hour they learned that these men had disappeared, and those 400 men got out of that train and riddled the car in which Iduke had his office—not Kedroff's car, but they riddled his car—so that it looked like a tin can that had been shot at a hundred times, and I tell you their action was quick. To stop that mutiny they brought down a company of Lettish troops that was garrisoned in the town of Vologda. They finally made the Kronstadt sailors go back. In the maneuvers back and forth the Lettish troops came past the window of my prison car, led by two men in civilian clothes whom all three of us—there was another prisoner, you will remember, an Englishman, that was in my cell, and my secretary who was standing outside talking to us through the bars—agreed were Germans. They possessed the facial distinctions.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me ask this as a matter of curiosity. The sailors did not kill Iduke, did they?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. They thought he was in that car, but he was not, I am sorry to say.

Now, you have heard of the Bolshevik government. I want to tell you that in a literal sense it is no government, there being little coordination and no cohesion in the different branches of this government. One branch does not recognize another branch, and often one authority in one town or one province will not do the will or obey the orders from Moscow. I think you have already heard that when the American authorities left Moscow, when they got as far as Petrograd, even though all of us had the visés of Tchitcherin, the minister of war, on our passports, the Petrograd commune refused to recognize that visé; and in many other parts of Russia, as, for instance, in certain towns on the Volga, the authorities in those towns in many cases—not in all cases—where they did not consider it was to their special advantage would not recognize the orders of Moscow.

There are seven or eight principal political parties in Russia, and I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to one very important fact, and that is that these parties represent a relatively small per cent of the populace. The great mass are unorganized—have no party affiliation. They do not know what socialism means or what democracy means. They do know that they do not want czars, monarchy, and they do know that they do not want Bolshevism. But in this revolution the unorganized masses and this vast unorganized body of Russians are the great sufferers.

Senator NELSON. That is, the peasantry?

Mr. SIMMONS. Principally the peasantry, the women, and others connected even with industrial classes.

Senator STERLING. Traders and merchants?

Mr. SIMMONS. And the small shop keepers and many of the people who go to make up the middle classes. The socialists, except unprincipled socialists, are not hand in glove with the Bolsheviki. In two of my prison cells were socialists who were expecting to be led to death; in fact, I saw two led out for execution. I did not see the actual shooting.

The socialists of Scandinavia have made open declarations absolutely opposed to Bolshevism.

The Bolsheviki are enemies of the socialists just as much as they are in favor of shooting monarchists and the clergy. So, therefore, I want to say that the Bolshevik government is a very poor institution and should not be considered as a government at all. It does not represent Russia in any way, form, or manner.

Senator NELSON. I suppose they have different departments there, or pretend to have, at Petrograd, but they each work on their own hook, do they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; considerably so.

Senator NELSON. That is, they have a department of foreign affairs and a treasury department?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and a department of commerce, and of agriculture, etc.

Senator NELSON. But there is no cohesion between those different departments?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the city of Moscow, where they are all together, I think there is, but where there is a representative of the department of foreign affairs in a town, say, like Saratov—departments have representatives in nearly all the principal provinces—there exists little or no cohesion. The government that administers the region around Saratov does not bow to the orders given from Moscow in all cases, just like I showed you the case of the Petrograd commune not recognizing the visés given by the Moscow national government to the Americans leaving Russia.

Another thing in regard to this government I learned from the peasants, and that is that you hear the name soviet as a system that they are following. The soviet bases its representation on a numerical labor-class unit. In other words, for every thousand—I think it is a thousand—iron workers, there is a soviet representative; for every thousand wood workers in a particular line there is a representative; for every thousand textile workers there is a representative. The unit of representation is based upon labor classes, whereas we base ours on geographical limits. Now, when this system of soviets is applied to all classes of labor, men doing work, whether they be professional men, brain workers, or men who aid in production of wealth and are helping the common welfare, which was, as I understood, the original idea of the soviet, it then takes the form of a democratic government. You may be surprised to know that this form of government originated in the brain of an American—Daniel de Leon—so Lenine has told us. The Bolsheviki claim they have adopted the soviet, but the educated peasants say they, by perverting it, have robbed it of its true significance and value, first, because they have infused the class issue. Instead of allowing all classifications of labor and constructive work to be represented, they limit representation to manual laborers. Secondly, at first they allowed all political parties, or nearly all, except monarchists to be represented, but when they saw that the parties opposed to them were in the majority in the all-Russian soviet, then the Bolsheviki used their bayonets and drove out all parties except a part of one party, which stooped to become quite nearly in sympathy with them. This so-called democratic institution or form of government soviet was perverted into a virtual autocracy.

Senator NELSON. They drove out everybody else but manual laborers?

Mr. SIMMONS. Manual laborers. But not all manual laborers are in any sense represented, because many of the manual proletariat do not subscribe, as I tried to tell you on Saturday, to the Bolshevik idea.

Senator OVERMAN. So this Lenine government is really an autocratic government, and not a democratic government?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right, yes; and an autocracy of the worst order. So bad, in fact, that the pendulum has swung from a monarchy to absolute anarchy.

Senator NELSON. Instead of being merely an autocracy at the top, as the Czar's government was, this is a sort of autocracy by step-ladder from down up, and from up down?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator.

Senator NELSON. These local bodies, soviets, are autocracies, and then you come to the larger soviets, which are autocracies, and then the central one is an autocracy, so it is one autocracy built on another?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; precisely.

Senator NELSON. Is not that the situation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; it appears that way.

As one man stated to me in Scandinavia, the Czar's government was Bolshevism of the upper classes, whereas the Bolshevik government is Bolshevism of the demoralized classes, and the point that the peasants made, and I have talked to many of them, is that the true conception of the soviet form of government has all been perverted by limiting representation to a few labor classes and to one political party, so that when the Bolsheviki use this word "soviet," calling the government a soviet government, they are using the word more as a camouflage. To the minds of many it conveys a wrong meaning, and this point is a very good idea to keep in mind.

Senator STERLING. Under the present system the members of any local soviet may be imported from elsewhere?

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely; they can come from any place. And that leads me to the subject of land.

You may not remember that when the Bolsheviks took hold of power, they gave the soldiers peace at once with the Brest-Litovsk treaty, and the peasants land by promulgating an arbitrary confiscation of land, and that rendered impossible any organized land reform.

The soldiers went on those large estates, as did the peasants who were land thirsty, and in the scramble ruined property. They would burn the houses and buildings, kill live stock, destroy implements, and often murder the owner in their greed for possession and the biggest slice. As it stands to-day there has been no equitable distribution. If the revolution was settled to-day, the land question, you would find, would be as imminent as before the revolution.

I told you about the poor committees, and how they incited the landless peasants against what they called the bourgeois peasants. This caused tremendous bloodshed in the little peasant villages. Before the Bolsheviki took possession of the government you may remember that the mir and the zemstvo—I guess you all know what the mir and the zemstvo organizations are—were entirely freed from the influence of royalty and the owners of large estates. The peasants were very well satisfied, and especially when Kerensky promised a sensible, organized land reform as soon as the constituent assembly should meet. They were patient, would have waited for the constituent assembly, and in fact did wait. For this reason the Bolsheviks have had trouble with the peasants and have never gotten them on their side, except the landless peasants, to whom they appealed by promise of gain; and incited class hatred in their minds and hearts. But they have never gotten the rank and file, even 80 per cent of the peasantry, on their side.

I want to talk to you about the nationalization of industry. One of the worst jobs done by the Bolsheviki was in what they undertook in connection with the banks. You have already heard considerable about it. I only intend to mention it. I refer to the nationalization of the banks. Having been employed in a bank myself for three years, I never saw such a chaotic, mixed up state of affairs. They took over all of the banks and tried to consolidate them into one. The details of this work—and you can assume how tremendously voluminous must have been the details of this consolidation, as large as many of the banks were—fell into the hands of people who knew little about the business, principally into the hands of sailors, I noticed, factory hands and workmen who had otherwise made their living by manual work. Men of this caliber undertook this gigantic task, and I remember in one instance where a man told me that his balance before the banks were taken over was, we will say, 10,000 rubles, and after consolidation his balance was 1,000 rubles. A man who had 1,000 rubles to his credit before the taking over of these institutions would very likely have found 10,000 to his credit.

The Department of Commerce wired me $1,000. Nationalization having taken place, it came to one of the branches of the Bolshevik consolidated bank. This branch sent word to the embassy that the remittance was there.

Senator WOLCOTT. You mean the bank sent word to the embassy?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Senator. The embassy clerk who attends to those matters went down to secure this money. After standing in line for maybe five or six hours he was told that the money was not there; they could not locate it.

I went down there the next day and stood in line for six hours. Because of the length of the line, I was never able to get into the bank. The following morning I put my secretary in line at 6.30, and the line then was a block and a half long—people wanting their own money. Finally we got into the bank that afternoon about 1 o'clock. I found that in that big institution, which previously must have had 100 or 150 clerks, two men were carrying on all the business, and one of those, the principal one, had taken to a little office divided off by partitions. It was necessary for every one to go within and talk to him privately. When I got an interview, finally, he said to me, "I am sorry to tell you that we can not find the record that we have received this money," and this notwithstanding the fact that their formal written notice was in my hand and before his eyes. This money was never gotten. Before leaving Petrograd we had to leave word if this remittance turned up to send it back to America. That was in the month of January. In the month of August the money was returned. This shows you the mixed-up situation of the bank. Many people were unable to draw their own money that was formally on deposit, or even small amounts of their deposits, to enable them to live.

Maj. HUMES. Would compensation to the man in charge of the bank affect the method of adjusting your balance?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I do not know about the balance, but I can tell you that a great many men who wanted more money than the law allowed, which was 150 rubles per week, could get it if they made the compensation sufficient.

Maj. HUMES. If they paid the banker?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. If they were generous?

Mr. SIMMONS. If they were generous. When I left Russia the per cent that they were paying was from 15 to 20 of the amount drawn; and more if a man, wanting to leave the country, desired to draw his entire deposit.

Maj. HUMES. That is, he had to give that amount to the banker?

Mr. SIMMONS. Give that amount to the men that were at the head of the banks.

Now, then, transportation in Russia has gone down to about 20 per cent, if not lower, of normal efficiency. They have no way by which they can repair rolling stock. I wish I had brought with me pictures to illustrate this, showing 15 to 20 locomotives in one place, standing on sidings, absolutely cold, useless because they can not be repaired. This, of course, affected the food and raw-material distribution, as well as that of coal.

Senator NELSON. Does that come from lack of material, lack of shops or facilities, or lack of labor?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should say, first, lack of materials, then labor troubles, one or the other requiring the shutting down of shops; and closed shops forcing industrial workers, as the only alternative, into the red army.

The same condition exists with reference to steamboat transportation. Russia has a wonderful system of river transportation. They have developed that to a remarkable extent, and you would be surprised how much territory one can cover by water. They connected, in a number of places, two distinct river systems by means of canals.

Senator NELSON. They have joined the lower Don and the Volga, have they not, where they come close together?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; and by means of the canals and rivers, you may know, they can bring lumber, for instance, from Perm to Petrograd. The steamboats and tugs that ply on those bodies of water have become much out of repair, and, in fact, many are out of commission because of want of materials to repair them, and, like the railroad situation, this has wrought a tremendous hardship upon the people.

Senator NELSON. They had a scheme there for a canal connecting the waters of the Dvina, I mean the western Dvina——

Mr. SIMMONS. The western Dvina; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. The one west of Petrograd, and the head waters of the Dnieper. Has that canal been built?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir. It was started, but has never been completed.

Senator NELSON. That was to have connected the Baltic with the Black Sea?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; and it was to do away with the necessity of exporting lumber material out through Germany, and by this canal to divert it to Russian ports.

Maj. HUMES. Are you familiar with the searching of trains at various points in Russia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Searching trains? You mean people, on trains?

Maj. HUMES. Do you know anything about the searching of people on the trains?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir; I never saw that. I have heard of it. I am very glad you mentioned this, as I intended to state that all terrorism is organized. I do not know that I can say all is the result of organization, but many many of the things of which I have told you have been perpetrated by the order of government authorities and by government forces.

Senator NELSON. Have they an organized police and spy system there?

Mr. SIMMONS. They have; yes, sir; as I was informed, a very good spy system. I can not give you any specific instances of its operations. The police system is not well organized. Almost every able-bodied man they can get hold of is conscripted for the Red Guards.

Where enough Red Guards are available they are used on police duty, but I do not think the Bolsheviki have any distinct police organization, as we understand the term police.

In line with their policy of dispossession they have a systematic robbers' organization, and a number of Americans lost money by pickpockets.

I had an experience of that, for instance, when they released me from prison. When the Bolsheviki put me in prison they took my money, and when they let me out through the efforts of neutral consuls general they returned my papers and money. As I walked away from the prison I went to a bank. I had given that money to my secretary, and I needed more money, inasmuch as I was going to Archangel. I came out of that bank with 14,000 rubles in my pocket, buttoned in the inside pocket of my coat. I never carried amounts of that kind, because it was dangerous, but in instances like this—going from the bank to the consulate—it was necessary. They had that 14,000 rubles before I could get home.

Senator OVERMAN. How did they get it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I took a street car, crowded as all street cars are in Russia, because there are very few cars in operation, due to need of repair. I had an engagement for luncheon at the consulate. Before I had ridden very far I felt a tug at my coat. Looking around, there was a man, partly dressed in uniform, making his way out of the street car through this compact crowd. I followed, running after him over three blocks. He turned into a side street, went through a door, up a pair of steps, and through another door. I was afraid to enter here because of the danger that it would be locked behind me and I would again be imprisoned.

Senator NELSON. That is where your rubles went?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is where my rubles went; I am sorry to say this was Government money. Men like, for instance, the treasurer of the International Harvester Co., were robbed. He was robbed four times in succession at short intervals—a man who handles money like he does—and after each robbery he made special effort, he told me, to be more particular; but the organization of pickpockets was too efficient.

One man connected with the military mission lost money in the same way; Y. M. C. A. officials likewise, and, if I am not mistaken, an officer of the Red Cross. It was very general, this pocket picking and robbing, and it was evident, as many of us agreed, that it was thoroughly organized and connived at by the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON. Systematic propaganda of the Red Guard?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of the Red Guard and others in sympathy with them.

Now, as to the factories in the nationalization of industry. I speak of this particularly because it was in connection with my official work in studying the lumber industry.

The local soviet appoints a committee that looks after the nationalized industry, called a factory committee, and each industry has a managing committee which administers that particular factory. The managing committee, with the consent of the factory committee, has the right to decide upon scale of wages, extent of the working day, and all matters of that kind. Gentlemen, to make it short, out of three industries that I watched very closely, lumber mills widely separated, every one closed down, failed, for capital was difficult to secure from the banks or elsewhere. The managing committee failed to make ends meet, because cost of production was too great and they could not satisfy labor demands. The men did not seem to recognize the authority of the committee in charge. Men who, for instance, floated logs up to the skidder in the millpond would demand the same wage as the skilled laborer who handled the saw. If it was not granted they said, "That man, the sawyer, is bourgeois." This class issue has run away with the Bolsheviks. They have instilled it so thoroughly into the minds of the common people that they find it hurled back at them in instances like that I have just related.

Senator NELSON. In other words, they believe in the same level of wages for all hands?

Mr. SIMMONS. For all hands.

Senator NELSON. Regardless of the character of the work performed?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but that is not the intention of the Bolsheviks. The Bolsheviks aim to classify industrial workers. But I say the men who are less fortunate in having the meanest work, on the idea that there is to be no class distinction, require that they be given the same wage as those above them. It ended in the mills stopping. And then workmen, not satisfied, because no means of livelihood was in sight, in their desperation plundered the sawmills. I have seen mills dismantled. Brass cups, belting, and portable parts that could be taken were carried away and sold. The stocks of lumber in the yards, deals and planks, were also appropriated at will to be used for firewood and other private uses.

Another very significant illustration was that of the International Harvester Co.'s plant near Moscow. Laborers of this company were thoroughly satisfied. I was told by one of the managers of the International Harvester how the Bolshevik laborers of a competing factory making harvesting machinery or implements came over and tried to prevail upon the laborers of the International Harvester to take over this factory as the government had suggested. They replied that they would not, because they were getting along well and had every consideration that they could expect. Several different times, similarly approached, they refused. In the argument they were told, "We are getting at our nationalized plant 60 rubles a day. You, with the International Harvester, are only getting 35 rubles a day." It was not many weeks after that the competing concern had to close, and the laborers of the International Harvester, seeing a few of the workmen of the failed industry, said, "You were getting 60 rubles a day and we were only getting 35, but we to-day have work, and our 35 rubles, while you have neither your 60 rubles nor any wage because you have no work, your plant having failed."

Industry generally is absolutely closed; absolutely closed!

A very amusing incident in regard to this class issue, showing how it has run away, is in regard to the hospital in Moscow. The people who are doing the more lowly part of the work—orderlies, menial attendants in positions of that sort—struck, demanding, "Unless you pay us as much as you pay the doctors and nurses we will not stay in our places"; and, gentlemen, they accepted the terms; they gave these people the same pay that they gave the doctors and the nurses.

In an English factory, a textile mill, they had gotten along excellently since the revolution, and their employees opposed having their institution taken over by the decree of nationalization. One day they had a meeting of employees to protest against the Bolsheviks trying to compel them to have this institution put in the hands of the workmen. While they were in that meeting the Red Guards came and dispersed it and killed two or three of the leaders, the prime movers; and these were the employees, the workmen, of that institution.

Then they went after the manager and the assistant managers, whom they arrested. One of the assistants escaped, taking refuge in the American consulate, where he told his pitiful tale. He was aided to get out of the country before they could arrest him.

Another particularly interesting point in regard to this industrial problem is that Germany, after the industries began to fail, started to buy some of them. They bought 13 sawmills, some of the best-equipped sawmills. I kept very close watch on this. I saw that if the Germans were going to take possession of the lumber industry, competition under their administration would be much more formidable than it had been under the Russian. They negotiated for 13, and got them at a very low price as compared with prices before the revolution, but a high price at that time; and I could not understand how they figured to operate these industries, and therefore, I could not see why they were paying those prices.

Senator NELSON. After the Germans had bought those mills and factories that you refer to, did they attempt to operate them or did they leave them alone?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course they were not running when they bought them. Many of them had been partially dismantled by machinery parts being plundered. They had no opportunity nor material to put them in shape for operation; but the fact that they purchased them indicated that they hoped to dominate the industry in Russia eventually.

Senator NELSON. The Germans have a great economic hold on Russia, have they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Germans?

Senator NELSON. Yes; the Germans.

Mr. SIMMONS. They did have, Senator, before the war.

Senator NELSON. That is what I mean.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; they had before the war, and they were strengthening their hold under the Bolshevik régime up to the time of the end of the world's war.

Senator NELSON. And the Bolsheviks are giving them a free hand, are they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Commercially, yes, sir; they were.

One other matter I want to bring in in regard to industry is that all unions do not support the Bolsheviks; and that in organizations that do support them, a great many in the unions have bolted because they could not subscribe to the policies.

Senator NELSON. They have labor unions over there as we have here?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And these unions are not affiliating with the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SIMMONS. A number are not, as I understand; and of those unions that have done so, the better elements have left them. Generally, the unions would most likely have affiliated with the Bolsheviks, but the substantial, better classes of workmen, many of them, on account of Bolshevism have left the unions.

Senator STERLING. It is a fact that the unions, or many of them, have taken formal action identifying themselves with the Bolsheviks, and on account of such formal action, a number of the better elements of the unions have deserted them?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. That is the situation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. To show how the unions act when assistance comes to Russia, after the occupation of Archangel, the North Russian Union Labor Corporation, which is composed of 10,000 woodchoppers—10,000 woodmen—you know what I mean by “woodmen”; the men that cut the logs for all sawmills in that district.

Senator STERLING. Lumbermen?

Mr. SIMMONS. Lumbermen, generally, but we call them timbermen.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The minute that occupation took place they came to offer their services to the allied troops, and they have rendered, I am told, most valuable service.

Senator STERLING. That is up in the neighborhood of Archangel?

Mr. SIMMONS. The headquarters of this union is in Archangel, but the men who compose this union are spread throughout the governments. You understand I mean by governments provinces, as Archangel, Vologda, and Olonetz.

Senator STERLING. They are lumbering in the valley of the Dvina?

Mr. SIMMONS. A part in the valley of the Dvina and some in the Onega.

Now, the most shameful thing, gentlemen, is the nationalization of women. I have two decrees, or translation of a decree, the first issued by the Bolsheviks of Vladimir, and published in the official soviet organ, Izvestija. I read from it as follows:

Every girl who has reached her eighteenth year is guaranteed by the Local Commissary of Surveillance the full inviolability of her person.

Any offender against an eighteen-year-old girl by using insulting language or attempting to ravish her is subject to the full rigours of the Revolutionary Tribunal.

Anyone who has ravished a girl who has not reached her eighteenth year is considered a State criminal and is liable to a sentence of 20 years' hard labour unless he marries the injured one.

The injured, dishonoured girl is given the right not to marry the ravisher if she does not so desire.

A girl having reached her eighteenth year is to be announced as the property of the State.

Any girl having reached her eighteenth year and not having married is obliged, subject to the most severe penalty, to register at the Bureau of Free Love in the Commissariat of Surveillance.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is that commissary?

Mr. SIMMONS. This comes from the Bolsheviks of Vladimir. [Continuing reading:]

Having registered at the Bureau of Free Love, she has the right to choose from among men between the ages of 19 and 50 a cohabitant-husband.

Remarks: (1) The consent of the man in the said choice is unnecessary; (2) the man on whom such a choice falls has no right to make any protest whatsoever against the infringement.

Senator STERLING. One might think that free love is a misnomer, right there.

Mr. SIMMONS (continuing reading):

The right to choose from a number of girls who have reached their eighteenth year is given also to men.

The opportunity to choose a husband or a wife is to be presented once a month.

The Bureau of Love is autonomous.

Men between the ages of 19 and 50 have the right to choose from among the registered women even without the consent of the latter, in the interests of the State.

Children who are the issue of these unions are to become the property of the State.

The decree states further that it has been based on the excellent "example" of similar decrees already issued at Luga, Kolpin, and other places in Russia.

Here is another one, on a rather larger scale, from Saratov, which is a rather large province, and one of the industrial cities along the Volga. [Reading:]

ANARCHIST PROCLAMATION.

This decree is posted in and about Saratov (about March 15th, 1918). Some people with their daughters have been excited into leaving the city altho the power is in the hands of the Bolsheviki and it is very doubtful if the Anarchists can succeed in the enforcement of the proclamation.

DECREE.

This decree is proclaimed by the free association of anarchist in the town of Saratov. In compliance with the decision of the Soviet of Peasant Soldiers and Workmen's Deputies of Kronstadt, the abolition of the private possession of women.

Senator STERLING. They at least give themselves the right name, there.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is that?

Senator STERLING. In speaking of themselves as anarchists.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but do not miss this point, that this is posted by the soldiers' and workmen's deputies of Kronstadt. That is, as you know, the cradle of this revolution.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS (continuing reading):

Social inequalities and legitimate marriages having been a condition in the past which served as an instrument in the hands of the bourgeoisie, thanks to which all the best species of all the beautiful have been the property of the bourgeois, have prevented the proper continuation of the human race. Such ponderous arguments have induced the present organization to edict the present decree:

1. From March 1 the right to possess women having reached the ages 17 to 32 is abolished.

2. The age of women shall be determined by birth certificates or passports or by testimony of witnesses, and, on failure to produce documents, their age shall be determined by the Black Committee, who shall judge them according to appearance.

3. This decree does not affect women having five children.

4. The former owners may retain the right of using their wife without their turn.

5. In case of resistance of the husband he shall forfeit the right of the former paragraph.

6. All women according to this decree are exempted from private ownership and are proclaimed the property of the whole nation.

7. The distribution and the management of the appropriated women in compliance with the decision of the above said organization are transferred to the Anarchist Saratov Club. In three days from the publication of this decree all women given by it to the use of the nation are obliged to present themselves to the given address and give the required information.

8. Before the Black Committee is formed for the realization of this decree, the citizens themselves will be charged with such control.

Remark: Each citizen noticing a woman not submitting herself to the address under this decree is obliged to let it be known to the Anarchists' Club, giving the full address, full name, and father's name of the offending woman.

9. Male citizens have the right to use one woman not oftener than three times a week for three hours, observing the rules specified below.

10. Each man wishing to use a piece of public property should be a bearer of a certificate from the Factories' Committee, Professional Union, or Workman's Soldier's, and Peasant's Council, certifying that he belongs to the working-family class.

11. Every working member is obliged to discount 2 per cent from his earnings to the fund of general public action.

Remark: This committee in charge will put these discounting funds, with the specifications of the names and lists into the State banks and other institutions handing down these funds to the popular generation.

12. Male citizens not belonging to the working class, in order to have the right equally with the proletariat, are obliged to pay 100 rubles monthly into the public funds.

13. The local branch of the State bank is obliged to begin to reserve the payments to the National Generation Fund.

14. All women proclaimed by this decree to be the national property will receive from the funds an allowance of 238 rubles a month.

That is $23.80, in other words, now. [Continuing reading:]

15. All women who become pregnant are released of the direct State duties for four months, up to three months before and one month after childbirth.

16. The children born are given to an institution for training after they are one month old, where they are trained and educated until they are 17 years of age at the cost of the public funds.

17. In case of a birth of twins, the mother is to receive a prize of 200 rubles.

18. All citizens, men and women, are obliged to watch carefully their health and to make each week an examination of the urine and blood.

Remark: The examinations are made daily in the laboratories of the popular Generation Health.

19. Those who are guilty of spreading venereal diseases will be held responsible and severely punished.

20. Women having lost their health may apply to the Soviet for pension.

21. The chief of Anarchists will be in charge of perfecting the temporary arrangements and technical measures concerning the realization of this decree.

22. All those refusing to recognize and support this decree will be proclaimed sabotage, enemies of the people and counter anarchists and will be held to the severest responsibilities.

(Signed)

COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF SARATOV, RUSSIA.

Senator STERLING. How large a city is Saratov, Mr. Simmons, if you know?

Mr. SIMMONS. Over 100,000, sir.

Gentlemen, it requires no comment that Bolshevik propaganda, which is going around in America trying to justify Bolshevism, can not possibly stand before public opinion of this country when facts are known.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you any information about their respect for religion and their belief about religion?

Mr. SIMMONS. Who, the Bolsheviks?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I told you, sir, on Saturday how they opposed religion and the church.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, you know they separated the church from the State, which, of course, I think was a very good move. In fact, I have met priests who do not really object to that. The Bolsheviki have got the church against them, and anybody who has any moral instinct at all is against them.

I think one of the most significant bits of my testimony was that statement of Bonch Bruevitch in which, as I read to you, he said that the Bolsheviki had no moral code—that they had not yet formed a moral code—and until they had formed a moral code, any means to the end was justifiable.

Senator OVERMAN. They have no respect for virtuous women and none for religion?

Mr. SIMMONS. None for religion. They could not have and be back of practices as you have heard given in testimony before you.

And, gentlemen, furthermore, religion is in jeopardy—the Christian religion, the Jewish religion, or any other kind of religion—by permitting this Bolshevik campaign to proceed. I say it does not matter, if Russians want the nationalization of land, all right. If they want the nationalization of industries, all right. If they want the soviet or any other socialistic form of government, all right. Leave all questions, according to the principle of self-determination, to the Russian people. But when they try to institute reforms by force, or a government that in its practices is absolutely in violation of the ordinary usages of right, of the law of morality and of all laws of God, I say that that is a menace to the peace of the world, and it should be put down.

Senator OVERMAN. They have this propaganda going on in this country. Do you think that is all over the world? Do you think it is in France?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not say as to France, Senator. It is in the three Scandinavian countries, where I had almost positive proof of sums of money being sent to Denmark and Sweden. I knew the man at the head of the Bolshevik bureau of publicity in Sweden.

Senator STERLING. Mr. Simmons, concerning the atrocities of the Bolsheviki, you will remember that I asked you a while ago about whether you knew the fact that old men had been required to dig graves for their sons condemned to death. I would like to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to an article that was the foundation of that report, an article by George Kennan in the Outlook of December 5, the article being entitled, "The Struggle of Russian Democracy with Bolshevik Tyranny." I just quote briefly. [Reading:]

The uprisings in Yaroslavl and Murom were temporarily successful; but in most places the half-armed people were mercilessly slaughtered with artillery and machine guns.

This article, by the way, is to refute the Col. Lebedeff pamphlets. [Continuing reading:]

"In one instance," says Col. Lebedeff, "in the village of Semenikha, the Red Guards shot about a hundred young peasants and forced old men to dig graves for their sons, killed in the presence of their families." Murom and Yaroslavl were finally recaptured by the Bolsheviki, after artillery fire had reduced them to ruins and filled their streets with heaps of dead.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; that fits in with all their practices, as you have heard.

Now, I think, after hearing of this nationalization of women, and having heard of all the atrocities, that the primary need in this country and in other countries is to let the people know the truth. The truth in itself will counteract the Bolshevist propaganda. I can not think of any single person, I do not care of what religion or political party he may be, that can uphold the immorality of this movement in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Your remedy in this country is publicity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Publicity.

Senator WOLCOTT. A very excellent remedy would be for these people who like it to be sent over there to live with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. But they would not do that for a minute.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you think about stopping their literature preaching this soviet and Bolshevik doctrine from being sent through the mails?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think when it reaches the point where it is seditious it ought to be suppressed by all means. I am not in favor of going ahead and meting out drastic punishment to each man or woman who seems to have indorsed the theories of this idea, because I think martyrs bring sympathy.

Senator OVERMAN. You think pains and penalties will do more harm than good?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think what you want is to give the public the truth. I do not believe that any man, woman, or child that has been to these hearings and heard the facts as presented can possibly uphold this movement.

Senator NELSON. What do you think of a man like Williams, who has been over there and faced the facts, and then comes over here and pronounces a benediction on it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think Mr. Williams came from Russia before the terrorism took place. A good many have become obsessed with the theories of the Bolsheviki, as I told you on Saturday, but the theories and the doctrines are one thing and the practices another.

I came through Archangel the last place. I left northern Russia on the 3d of November. There was a socialistic form of government in power. The allies were asked to come in to Murmansk last June, I think it was about that time, by the Murmansk soviets. and if you will let me I will make a part of the record of this investigation pictures showing the president of the Murmansk soviet, Urieff, and his assistant, Capt. Vesalago, formerly a commander in the Czar's Navy. These were the Bolshevik representatives at the time that they invited the Americans and the English troops to come in. I happened to be present at one of the meetings afterwards, and took the pictures myself. I am sorry that I have not got them with me, but if you will allow me to send them later and put them in I shall be glad to have you use these pictures in the record.

When the occupation was made in Archangel it was made virtually without the firing of a gun. The revolution had taken place before the allied troops arrived. Tschaikovski was in the saddle even when the English arrived, and the Americans came shortly afterwards. Tschaikowski's government invited them, and the Russians met them with open arms and with great rejoicing, ringing of church bells, blowing of factory whistles, etc. After you come out of the middle of Russia, as I did, having seen the chaotic situation there, the awful distress of famine and economic disintegration, and then go up into Archangel and see how much happier and better off the people are, with food, with schools, churches unmolested, business recovering, a stable currency established and people able to sleep at night, not expecting to be disturbed with bayonets and machine guns, you see the difference at once.

I have told you of that labor union that came at once and offered themselves and assisted the allies upon arrival, and when you read the records of the last few years in history, later on, you will see that some of the greatest deeds of bravery have been done by men in Northern Russia, of any place where there has been fighting participated in by Americans.

Senator NELSON. It is a timbered and swampy country, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. And those men are fighting to protect that country from this very campaign of Bolshevism; that is, the ruthless brigandage we have had outlined here to-day and Saturday. It is unquestionably a humane, justifiable fight, in my mind, quite as much justified as the fight against the militarism of Germany, and I tell you, gentlemen, that from the American soldiers in Archangel that I talked to I found they are imbued with this fact. I was surprised on my return home when I heard of the clamor that is being made for the withdrawal of our forces in northern Russia. Why, every inch that we have had to give to the enemy has resulted in the massacre of every man, woman, and child in the newly retaken district. If all soldiers would withdraw to-day, it would mean the greatest massacre in the Archangel government of any that has ever been known, and the blood would be on the hands of the United States and our allies.

Senator NELSON. Our troops went in there in the first instance to take care of a large quantity of military supplies.

Mr. SIMMONS. And to keep the Germans out; and to keep them from using it as a submarine base.

Senator NELSON. And there were a lot of military supplies there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And shipping?

Mr. SIMMONS. A great deal of it had been taken away by the Bolsheviks. A great deal of it had been sent south. We saw trainload after trainload of American automobiles and trucks and machinery and ammunition and every material possible being brought down to the center of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Taken from there before the English and our troops came there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. You are acquainted with the topography of the country. How far south of there did our troops advance? They went east of the railroad, as I gather, down to the valley of the Dvina River.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can answer you very explicitly, but for military reasons I doubt if I should. But I want to say that those boys up there have done an excellent piece of work.

Senator NELSON. And do you not think that what there are of Russian people there are in sympathy with them and will cooperate with them?

Mr. SIMMONS. They have, certainly. They have organized quite large Russian army units, and the Russians are doing a large part of the fighting. That has been the American policy, as it appeared to me, in Russia where the allies have taken the field. They encourage organization of native troops of those wanting to fight Bolshevism. and help to equip, clothe, feed, and discipline them.

Senator NELSON. Those people there, to a large extent, are lumber men who worked in the saw mills and in the woods?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And fishermen?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. It is not much of an agricultural country, is it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all. It is too far north. There is no tree growth around Archangel. You have to go almost 200 miles up the Dvina.

Senator NELSON. It is not a farming country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not until you get in the neighborhood of Kotlas, a town on the Dvina River.

Senator OVERMAN. Our policy is to let the Russians do the fighting?

Mr. SIMMONS. So it appears to me. We supply them with their needs and the assistance they want. Of course, it is very hard on American boys up there to exist and fight in that cold country. It is very cold. But they are well clothed and well fed, and when I left there, on the 3d of November, they were in very good spirits. I told the people in Michigan that very fact. And one man in the assembly, after he heard the narration of those facts that I gave in a simple story of Russia, said, "Gentlemen, I have been clamoring for the withdrawal of those troops. I have a brother there. But if he is fighting, and fighting against that kind of a movement, I want him to stay."

Senator STERLING. How many American troops are at Archangel?

Senator NELSON. I do not think it would be wise to publish that.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you do not mind, I would rather not say, for military reasons. I should be very glad to tell you in an executive session anything you want that I can tell you.

Senator STERLING. I thought it had been mentioned by somebody on the floor of the Senate, or I would not have asked it.

Senator OVERMAN. You think it would be a great mistake to take them out of there now?

Mr. SIMMONS. You could not take them out, Senator; impossible.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean that we could not take them out on account of physical conditions?

Mr. SIMMONS. You mean the ice? They have ice breakers. They possibly could get out with the use of ice breakers.

Senator NELSON. We do not want to go into that except in executive session.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I meant on account of the massacres which would happen if the allied troops withdrew.

Senator NELSON. You can get out and get in?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean that, and I do not think the Senator did.

Senator OVERMAN. To withdraw would leave those people to be massacred?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Those boys have been there a long time and have done their part. Others could be substituted, and it would be all right. But, surely, we can not leave all these Russian people to starve and to be massacred, as they will be; because we have found it so every place that the enemy have compelled us, or for reasons of strategy we have been compelled, to fall back. In those few instances the Bolshevik troops have massacred the people in the reoccupied territories. People of the Archangel country generally, of all classes—and they are of all classes, as you may assume, in a sawmill industrial center—are quite well satisfied with the protection of the allies, and are praying that we may never move so long as Bolshevism lasts.

Senator STERLING. What can you say, Mr. Simmons, about the cooperation between the allied forces there?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very glad you mentioned that, sir. Thank you. I would say, first, that it is impossible to cooperate. You mean in Archangel?

Senator STERLING. Yes; cooperation between the allied forces there.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, cooperation there?

Senator STERLING. Yes; between the allied forces.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will you please state your question again?

Senator STERLING. What can you say about the cooperation between the allied forces in Archangel and vicinity, as to whether there is cooperation between them or not?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is cooperation; yes, sir; but I do not think we had better go into that.

Senator NELSON. Are there any French there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. In answer to Senator Sterling I began to speak about cooperation of America with the Bolsheviks, cooperation of the American Red Cross and the American Y. M. C. A., two institutions that did excellent work. You have heard how these organizations remained to the last and worked with returned Russian prisoners from Germany, and with civil relief. They helped to distribute medical supplies and food. They did excellent work. Maj. Allen Wardwell led that work, with the support of able assistants, and I saw their operations while in the prisons where I was detained. I heard what prisoners had to say favorably about the American Red Cross. They did excellent work, gentlemen, in the same line. I do not believe that any American Y. M. C. A. institution ever did better work than the Y. M. C. A. in Russia. The very presence of men of that character and caliber was a great thing in itself for Russia at that time, and the people generally were very favorably disposed toward them. But we could not continue cooperation with them, finally. All cooperation became impossible, and both of these institutions—the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A.—had to leave Russia. The Y. M. C. A. had to guard their headquarters with guns. Think of organizations that were doing as good work as these, in the interest of the people, being forced by intolerable conditions to quit their humanitarian efforts and leave the country.

Now, gentleman, talking about cooperation, the neutral countries not in the world's war, that had diplomatic officers in Russia, could not remain and in line of their duty cooperate. They would not, of course, recognize the Bolsheviki. But for the Russian people they could not do anything; and it became impossible for them to live in Russia. I talked with the Swedish consul general, the man who got me out of prison in December, who afterward returned to Stockholm, and also with the Danish minister, and they said that when they left Russia life was absolutely impossible there, and that they had to leave their posts. Now, if organizations like the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. and the diplomatic corps of the neutral countries can not get along in Russia with the Bolsheviks in power, cooperation to my mind seems impossible.

Senator OVERMAN. No neutral countries are represented there?

Mr. SIMMONS. No neutral country is represented.

Senator NELSON. The last legation that went out of there was the Norwegian legation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Danish was the last.

Senator NELSON. No. They helped to get out Mr. Leonard.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Senator OVERMAN. Are there any German representatives there?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; they have not been there, I think, since Mirbach was killed. They removed the embassy across the line into Poland where they could stay in safety and run into and out of Russia as duty required. But whether they still remain, I do not know.

Senator NELSON. Are there many German officers in the Bolshevik army?

Mr. SIMMONS. There were some when we left; but, of course, peace had not then been declared. There may be more now, if I should make a guess.

If there are any questions that I can answer I shall be very glad to do it.

Senator OVERMAN. I think you have done the country a very great service and we are very much obliged to you.

Senator NELSON. I would just like to have a few words with him in secret session here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be at your disposal.

Senator OVERMAN. We are going into executive session to hear another witness now.

(Thereupon, at 4.45 p. m., the subcommittee went into executive session. The following testimony was taken, the name of the witness being withheld at his urgent request.)

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ———.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator WOLCOTT. Is your home in New York City?

Mr. ———. My home is in New York.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. ———. I left Russia on the 28th day of last February, the day after the embassies left. I was not in Russia during the revolution which led up to the abdication of the embassy. I had returned to this country, and was on my way back to Russia when that occurred. I returned by the Siberian line and arrived in Petrograd in the first week in May, 1917, so I lived in Russia from May, 1917, until the end of February, 1918. Therefore I have no particular evidence that is worth while, or any testimony that is worth while, after 1918, except that I have been a careful reader of the newspapers. But I have nothing from observation. Therefore my testimony will be very simple.

I was quite intimately connected with Mr. Francis, and saw a good deal of the workings of the Kerensky government in consequence of it.

My own business was gradually going to pieces during that summer. I returned to find that my whole office force of about 50 clerks was on strike, and they laid down to me conditions which made it impossible to work with them, notwithstanding I tried very hard to compromise. This was before the Bolsheviki came in, but it was the outcome of the revolution and the labor excitement at that time. In spite of all I could do in the way of reasoning with them I was obliged in September to dismiss the whole force and move my whole office, which was at Petrograd, to Moscow, where conditions were considerably quieter. There was not the same revolutionary spirit at that time in Moscow that there was in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Let me see if I get my bearings correct. You came there in May?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That was a month or two after the Kerensky revolution, and the Trotsky-Lenine revolution occurred in November?

Mr. ———. The 7th of November, yes.

Senator NELSON. Now, go on.

Senator STERLING. Was there not an interval before Kerensky came into power, after the March revolution? How long a time intervened there?

Mr. ———. Kerensky, you will remember, was minister of justice in the first cabinet. Kerensky came into power as premier and minister of war about the 15th of May.

Senator STERLING. Did you meet Col. Lebedeff while you were there?

Mr. ———. I met him several times in Petrograd.

Senator STERLING. How are you impressed with him?

Mr. ———. He is an extremely live fellow, very well acquainted, and a very intelligent man.

Senator STERLING. He tried to organize a force, did he not?

Mr. ———. He organized an army and would have accomplished things with that army. If he had had a little more support after the capture of Kazan he would have been able to reach Moscow. Have you read his book?

Senator NELSON. If our Archangel forces could have gotten down there at that time and given them a little help they would have extinguished the Bolshevik government. He makes that plain in his book.

Mr. ———. That seems to have been the original plan, to establish a force at Archangel to connect up with the force at Omsk by way of Perm.

Senator NELSON. Will you please tell us what they had done with the banks when you were there?

Mr. ———. The banks had been entirely nationalized before I left. I lived through that and all the inconvenience of it. Of course, I was very intimately acquainted with the various banks there, and I need only say, in view of what I have heard said here—I do not have to repeat—that this sudden action was taken by the Bolshevik government because they were suspicious of the activities of these banks. They were under the impression, they claimed, that a number of these banks were financing Korniloff, Kaladines, and their forces in the southern part of Russia, and in order to cut off that financial support which they thought was going south, they took all of a sudden, much sooner than they expected to do, all the banks in charge.

Senator NELSON. The gold reserves of the country were kept in the imperial state bank, were they not?

Mr. ———. They had always been kept there; and, as I said, they were all removed in the first fifteen days of the war in 1914, to the various branches of the state bank on the Volga, and that was how it happened that Lebedeff was able to get so much money in Kazan. I think that is probably a true statement. The banks were taken over, and chaos reigned there for about 10 or 15 days, and then they worked out an organization of this sort. All the private banks were put into categories of the state bank, first, second, and third categories, and you could draw money from these banks only to be used in payment for labor. Private citizens having credit there could draw 150 rubles per week, when I left. In order to get that 150 rubles per week it would take you three days of that week to get the necessary visés and permissions in the various parts of the town. I was not put to that inconvenience because at the same time I had a large account in the National City Bank, and special arrangements were made by the Bolshevik government which enabled Americans to draw up to 500 rubles at one time from their account in the National City Bank, and as I had a large balance there, I simply had to send the boy down every noon and get 500 rubles and hold a reserve in my office, as I was afraid we might get short of money, and I left a great many signed checks when I left, to enable them to go on and draw in that way; but the bank closed about a week after I left.

Senator STERLING. In what form was the ruble with which you were paid. Was it in specie or paper?

Mr. ———. There was no specie after the outbreak of the war, and they were using the Kerensky money; that is, the dies which were adopted during the Kerensky régime. The denominations were 1,000-ruble bills, 250-ruble bills, and 40 and 20 ruble bills. These 40-ruble pieces and 20-ruble pieces were about the size of four postage stamps, made out of the margins of the paper that was formerly thrown away in making the imperial money.

Senator STERLING. What was the value of the ruble at that time?

Mr. ———. The value of the ruble when I left varied anywhere from 10 cents to the ruble. I would say that the ruble had from 8 to 10 cents purchasing power, instead of 50 cents.

Senator STERLING. Then the nominal value is 50 cents?

Mr. ———. Fifty cents. This money was taken with great reluctance when I left, a year ago. Mr. Simmons, of course, knows that there was much more opposition later on, but this money was taken with great reluctance, especially these little 40-ruble and 20-ruble pieces. They continued to print the 1-ruble, 3-ruble, and 5-ruble pieces from the old imperial dies. The 10-ruble note and the 100-ruble note of the imperial dies were at a premium, and it was getting more and more difficult to get hold of those pieces of money. They were at a premium because evidently Germany was buying them up, and I think a little experience of mine will show you Germany's activity right there.

When I left the country, you were allowed at that time to take out 500 rubles per person.

Senator STERLING. That is, the Americans were?

Mr. ———. The Americans were. Now, to take out 500 rubles per person, you were supposed to be examined at the frontier. I had my 500 rubles of this money; none of this Kerensky money, but of the old imperial dies of the smaller denominations, 10-ruble pieces and 25-ruble pieces, and to make doubly sure I took the chance of putting under my arm 10,000 rubles of the 500-ruble pieces.

Senator WOLCOTT. Of the Kerensky money?

Mr. ———. No; the imperial, with the face of Peter the Great watermarked in it—a very beautiful bill—and I got through without being searched, and I got that money landed in Stockholm. I was allowed to take, as I said, 500 rubles. I had with me my wife and sister, which allowed me to take 1,500 rubles altogether. When I arrived in Finland the ruble was worth less than the Finnish mark. The Finnish mark was worth 14 cents. I had an indefinite stay in Finland before me, and it was costing me 100 marks per day per person, so you can see how far 6,500 rubles would go. Fortunately, I met an American there who wanted to get his money out of the country, or I should have had a hard time. As a matter of fact I stayed in Finland 25 days, negotiating with the authorities, before we got through, and it cost me 5,000 marks.

When I got to Stockholm with that money I wanted to realize on it, and there was pointed out to me a little money dealer who was buying this money, and I went in with my 500-ruble bills and I realized 26 cents per ruble on them. That aroused my curiosity and I said, "Why such a price for this money here?" Strange to say, I realized 26 cents per ruble for the good bills, but a bill which was slightly worn or a trifle torn I could only get about 23 cents for, per ruble. "Well," they said, "there is a great demand from Germany for this money to put into use in the occupied territories in Russia. The Germans have not been able to get the mark accepted there, and the old imperial ruble is the only money they can use, and therefore they are paying that price for this money." You can see that in that way I benefited innocently from this German manipulation with the Russian money.

The banks, as I say, were all organized in this way. This is merely a little incident that, perhaps, will show you the kind of managers they are. They took the great bank of the Volga, where I had a very large balance and where I had my safe deposit box for the company and myself. That Volga Bank bore to Russia about the same relation that the City National bore to the United States. They put in charge of that bank a fellow who kept the back court of the bank clean. He was a man that I had met when I went in there. I could do nothing at that bank except to talk about the condition of my safe deposit. There was no question of drawing any money there. I had lost all control of the account, and there was nobody who could give me any information about the account. My safe deposit was there. Shortly after assuming control of the banks there was a decree put out that all the holders of these safe deposits must appear and open them and let the contents be examined, and that all specie would be confiscated, and all paper money would be taken and put into the state bank to your credit.

I put off this examination as long as I could, until there came out a decree that those whose boxes which were not opened by such a date would be forced open—blown open—so I took the American consul, who was then Mr. Treadwell, who is now in prison down in Tashkend, over there to make a formal protest, and see what would happen, and we met this almost illiterate commissar, who was in charge of the bank, and Mr. Treadwell protested in the name of his office and the United States that they had no right to interfere with the property of an American citizen or an American firm. This commissar said that he was not taking his instructions from the consul of the United States, and that the instructions he had he would have to carry out. He opened the box and he took hold of the money. Another protest was made then by our consul against the taking of the property of a foreign citizen. The same answer. The result was that this money which I had there was taken. I had always carried quite a good deal of cash in my safe deposit as an emergency fund, not knowing what might happen at any time, and there happened to be 57,000 rubles there at that time, which was counted out in spite of the protest of the consul and my own protest, and a young student who was there, who was able to write, wrote out a receipt saying that this was in the state bank. I have never heard anything about those 57,000 rubles since then.

Senator NELSON. Was it paper?

Mr. ———. It was paper money. I had no specie there. My own personal effects, which were Russian silver, etc., were at that time not disturbed. I do not know what their condition is now. All my personal effects are in Russia still. That shows you the high-handed way in which they treated the property of other people, especially Americans.

Senator NELSON. You have never heard what became of them, since?

Mr. ———. No; that is the last I heard of what became of the 57,000 rubles. That was in the city of Petrograd, in connection with one of the largest private banks of Russia.

Senator STERLING. Did they have any force there to do the business of the bank at that time?

Mr. ———. No.

Senator NELSON. Were they doing any banking business?

Mr. ———. No; they were not doing any banking business. There were only three or four there—that is, the commissar and his assistant and a boy or two—and 30 or 40 soldiers standing around all the time with their bayonets fixed, to take care of any disturbance that might arise among the people who came there to have their business done.

Senator NELSON. The soldiers were supposed to do the banking business?

Mr. ———. The soldiers were supposed to do the banking business. From the time that they closed the Russian banks I could do no business with them, and I simply relied upon the account I had in the National City Bank, where I could draw up to 500 rubles at a time. Strange to say, our business went on and has been going on since then, so far as it has been possible.

I have the conviction that all this Bolshevik money will be repudiated as soon as there is a responsible government in Russia. This money is printed, and has been printed, as I understand, for the last year without date and without number, and without signature also, using those dies, and that makes it pretty bad; so I never expect a responsible government, if there ever is one in Russia, to redeem that money.

Senator NELSON. I understand a great deal of it has been printed at Leipzig, Germany?

Mr. ———. That money, I think, was printed from the old imperial dies, and while I do not know anything about it, I understand that a great deal of the money has been printed in Germany from the old dies. There were times when Russia could not get that money printed, and those dies were kept in Germany when the war broke out.

With reference to the political phases I have not very much to say, except one fact that I have not heard brought out. When the Bolsheviks took control of Petrograd in November, 1917, for sometime thereafter it was quite impossible to get a call on the telephone unless you spoke German. That was a pretty good evidence of German influence in the town at the time.

Senator NELSON. Were there many Germans in the town at that time?

Mr. ———. There were a good many Germans, ever since the war started, who had the run of the place. I never was in a position, and I do not think anybody was in a position, to say that the Germans were there officially. This I do know, and this fact, I think, is significant, that when the Brest-Litovsk treaty was in process of negotiation there came to Petrograd 160—so the papers said—German commercial agents, and the hotel was cleared out, the Russian occupants of this hotel were ejected, and these 160 Germans lived at that hotel, and a gala performance was given them in the Imperial Opera House. Those men stayed for about 15 or 20 days, and as the negotiations proceeded and were not altogether agreeable, these men found that their life in Petrograd was not altogether agreeable and, perhaps, not safe, and so they rather disappeared; but before these particular agents had left town, they declared that while they had read in books about anarchy and disorder, they never knew what those terms meant until they had seen them in operation in Petrograd.

We were shot up practically every night by Red Guards really trying to keep order. The soldiers had broken loose and begun a systematic looting of the wine shops and the drinking up of the liquors, and it took them 20 or 21 days, and each night there was a collision between the irresponsible soldiers who were doing this looting, and the Red Guards, who went out to make a pretense of keeping order.

Senator NELSON. There were two elements, then; there were these looters, this rabble, and then there were the Red Guards?

Mr. ———. The Red Guards. I have a little higher opinion of the Red Guards than some people who have spoken about them. They were, up to the time I left, a rather serious organization. They were made up largely from inexperienced young fellows from the factories who had never had any military experience, and they were turned loose in the town with a rifle on their shoulders, and they tried to keep order. When the Bolshevik overthrow took place, on the 7th of November, the three preceding weeks before that, there had been disorders in Petrograd reported in the newspapers. I do not know how many there were, but I counted in the newspapers 450 cases of robbery, attempts on life, murders, etc.

Senator NELSON. In the Russian newspapers?

Mr. ———. In the Russian newspapers, in the three or four weeks preceding the Bolshevik revolution. That was under the Kerensky régime; showing how thoroughly demoralized the town had become under the Kerensky government.

Now, immediately after the Bolsheviks got control, we looked for a general massacre and throat-cutting, etc., but nothing of the sort happened. We had vastly better order in the town for the next three weeks than we had had for the preceding two months. While they were under the glow of success, and so on, that continued, but at the same time there were upward of 400,000 soldiers and sailors in Petrograd, and they were quite beyond control, and these small Red Guards were quite unable to keep order, and gradually we drifted into chaos.

Before the 1st of January we had gotten into chaos again worse than before the Bolshevik revolution, which continued up until the time I left.

I left Petrograd not necessarily because the town was so uncomfortable to live in, but it was because the Germans, after the failure of the Brest-Litovsk treaty—the first one—were advancing and were within three or four hours of the town. That was the time when the embassies all left, and I left the next day to go to Finland.

I arrived in Finland, and we found civil war in progress there, and conditions vastly worse, and in the beautiful town of Helsingfors the conditions were worse than they were in Petrograd. The reds were hunting out the whites, and there was a man hunt going on, with a great many encounters in different parts of the town, and shooting going on constantly. Our party, of which Mr. Simmons was one, all had diplomatic passports, and therefore we were in a position to get some consideration from the red authorities.

Senator NELSON. They were in control at that time?

Mr. ———. They were in control of southern Finland. There was a battle line thrown across the whole country from east to west.

Senator NELSON. The whites were in the northern country?

Mr. ———. Yes, and the reds were in the south. The whites had control of the largest amount of territory, but the reds had the business end of it and the big estates.

When I came in contact with the authorities and was engaged along the line of trying to get a passport to get through, I went to the chief of staff of the Red army and I came up against a fine young man about 36 years old, who spoke English perfectly, and whose name was August Wesley. That was the way it was spelled in English.

Senator NELSON. He was Swedish, then?

Mr. ———. No, it is a good Finnish name, Oesslei, which comes out Wesley, if you pronounce it fast. Mr. Wesley had been 12 years in Seattle as an organizer in the I. W. W. He showed me every courtesy in the world, and endeavored to make arrangements at the next town farther west for getting through there. He called up police headquarters and there found out that there were horses to be gotten, and a conveyance by way of the Aland Islands to Stockholm.

I went back to my family and made all arrangements, and then as I got about ready to start, I was called up and told that the Germans were at the Aland Islands, and I had better not undertake that trip. I telegraphed to my friend at the north, and the man who received my telegram said that I was overcautious, and that he would undertake it; and he did undertake it, and was captured by the Germans and kept eight months in Germany.

Senator NELSON. He tried to get away by way of the Aland Islands?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir; but I went back and began negotiations with the Minister of War, a gentleman whose name was Sirola; and this Mr. Sirola had been formerly in Illinois as an organizer of strikes among the coal miners.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you find the real names of these people? Were those their real names?

Mr. ———. Those are their real names, and they are real fellows. They showed me no discourtesy. They tried to discuss these things, but I refused to discuss them at all. I simply said to them, "Gentlemen, you do not want us here eating your food, and perhaps if you will let us out, we will be able to get some food for you."

Senator WOLCOTT. They both talked English?

Mr. ———. Very well, and as the food situation there was catastrophic at the time, it was perhaps due to their idea that we could probably send them food that they were so considerate. Wesley, as I said, offered me all facilities for getting horses to go on the ice to the Aland Islands. Sirola put at my disposal two cars to go to the north-western part of the red line, and he allowed us to hold those cars for fully two weeks.

Another very interesting man in this Government of the Reds was a man named Tokol, and I speak of him merely to show what happened subsequently. When the Whites got control and beat back the Reds, they drove out these leaders from Finland, and there was a great massacre, of course, in connection with that victory. Then our friends Wesley, Sirola, and Tokol were driven down into Russia where they had a chance to see Bolshevism in full operation, and after wandering about there for four months, they became convinced that it was not a working program. They drifted then up to Archangel and joined forces with our people in Archangel, where Tukoi, the spokesman and most intelligent of the three—I will not say that either of those other two was not intelligent—writes a very strong letter, a wonderful letter, to Mr. Nuorteva, the Finnish Red publicity man in this country—and by some chance that letter got published in the New York Evening Post—wherein he showed that the Bolshevik program under no conditions can work; that in Russia it attracts to itself only the people who have nothing and the criminal element, and that the only way to work out a socialistic program is through democratic channels, and asking him to please use his influence in America to stop this whole movement. He was the prime minister of Red Finland, writing to his friend in this country.

Maj. HUMES. Have you that letter in your possession?

Mr. ———. I have not that in my possession. That letter was published in the New York Evening Post of October 22.

Maj. HUMES. That would be interesting in connection with this testimony.

Senator NELSON. How did the writer of this letter spell his name?

Mr. ———. Tokol.

Senator NELSON. That is a Finnish name.

Mr. ———. It is a Finnish name.

Senator WOLCOTT. He is right here in Washington and has been attending our hearings.

Senator OVERMAN. Did he speak English?

Mr. ———. I did not meet him. I met only the two, the foreign minister and the chief of staff.

Senator NELSON. How do you spell the foreign minister's name?

Mr. ———. Sirola.

Senator NELSON. That may be either Polish or Finnish.

Mr. ———. Sirola, it was pronounced.

Maj. HUMES. What do you know about the activities of Col. Thompson and Raymond Robins, and the distribution of funds by them?

Mr. ———. I was very intimately connected with those gentlemen for some time. I supposed you might ask me this question. As I told you at the beginning, I was appointed by the allied governments in charge of publicity work in Russia. My appointment was confirmed by the President, but the President, when he confirmed it, said to make no expenditures without special authorization from him. We never got this authorization, and no money ever came to us until Mr. Thompson arrived. The Ambassador, of course, was trying to get these funds. He thoroughly realized how important it was to get the press in order in Russia, but succeeded in getting no money. When this matter was presented to Col. Thompson he became very much interested, and began to use his influence at Washington, through the Red Cross, to get funds.

Senator WOLCOTT. When did Col. Thompson arrive; as of what date; about when?

Mr. ———. I am speaking of the month of August, 1917. He arrived right after the Root commission, about the time that the Root commission left. Col. Thompson became very much interested, and saw how vital this was, the question of straightening out the Russian mind, and he laid out a program with me to spend $3,000,000 per month for eight months, and we wanted a guarantee of three millions per month for eight months.

Maj. HUMES. Do you mean dollars or rubles?

Mr. ———. Dollars. We meant to corner the paper market in Russia and choke off the Bolshevik press. A great many papers were published at the front that we wanted to suppress, to give us a chance to establish a good many papers among the soldiers, and put on their feet a number of struggling papers that were sound in doctrine. This work we proposed to do through a committee known as the Breshkovskaya committee. Madame Breshkovskaya was at the head of it, and there was working with us Tchaikovski and other persons of considerable standing. When Col. Thompson did not succeed in getting any money, he ordered a million dollars of his own money from Washington sent over. That money, I think, all went through my hands, and I know it was spent in support of the Kerensky Government through this Breshkovskaya committee, and the person in charge of that Breshkovskaya committee, the leading person, was Tchaikovski for some time, in addition to the representatives of the northern government. When that was spent, we put about 17 papers on their feet and had a very good press there in Petrograd, but we did not have very much influence with the press at the front, which was the most vital point. No money came from America, and, of course a million dollars does not go very far in supporting 17 newspapers. I do not think that any more money of Col. Thompson's was spent in that way. I have no reason to believe that he spent any money in support of the Bolsheviki.

My recollection is that Col. Thompson, at the time the Bolsheviki overthrew the Kerensky Government, had no interest in them; but he and Col. Robins seemed to think, "Here is the only Government that is left. For two or three weeks they have kept law and order, and we have got to work with somebody, and we had better work with them."

Maj. HUMES. The statement is made by Williams that Col. Thompson contributed $1,000,000 to the Bolsheviki.

Mr. ———. I would like to hear him make that statement under oath. I have no reason to believe that Col. Thompson ever spent any money in support of the Bolsheviki.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know anything about whether he did or not? Have you any facts upon which to base a reasonably reliable opinion?

Mr. ———. I do not think he did, because unless he had some special channels for getting money over there, he could not have gotten it over there. My money was marooned. I had $5,000 due me on the 7th of November. I have never seen that $5,000.

Senator STERLING. Was Col. Thompson there when you came away?

Mr. ———. No; Col. Thompson left about three weeks after the Bolshevik overthrow of the Government. Col. Thompson was——

Senator OVERMAN. What was he doing there?

Mr. ———. After the departure of Dr. Billings, who was in charge of the Red Cross there, he was put in charge as lieutenant colonel.

Senator WOLCOTT. When did Mr. Robins leave?

Mr. ———. Well, Col. Thompson left, and he turned the Red Cross over to Col. Robins. Col. Robins I do not think left until June of 1918. He was there when I left, but not in Petrograd. He was in Moscow when we left.

Senator STERLING. Do you know what his relations were with the Bolshevik Government?

Mr. ———. I think I do. It is all a question of motive. I do not feel myself qualified to speak about his motives. I think Col. Robins's idea was, "Here is the only organization, the only thing that has governmental power, in Russia. Let us do what we can to get something done with them." I do know that he saw a great deal of the officials at the head of the Bolshevik Government, like Lenine and Trotsky and Tchitcherin.

Senator STERLING. Did you come in contact with Trotsky and Lenine?

Mr. ———. Neither one of those at all, except to hear those gentlemen speak when they had the platform, several months before the overthrow. Trotsky was a man who was holding meetings nightly in a big auditorium near my house, and very frequently, after the overthrow of the Government by the Bolsheviks when they felt their power wavering, he was always suggesting the propriety of setting up the guillotine in the Palace Square. Three times I remember his doing that; a piece of work which I never could comprehend, coming from an intelligent man addressed to the people of Russia, whom he must have known as I knew them.

Senator NELSON. You used a phrase there which should be corrected in the notes. You spoke once of the Bolshevik overthrow. It should be the Kerensky overthrow.

Mr. ———. The Kerensky overthrow; yes.

Senator NELSON. By the Bolsheviks.

Mr. ———. Yes; by the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. That is the way it should be put.

Maj. HUMES. Do you know whether the Committee on Public Information spent any money?

Mr. ———. Yes; Mr. Sisson had the first money to spend on publicity and information that the Government spent over there. I did not work with Mr. Sisson. I had had a bit of experience in trying to get something over, a month previous to that, and I had lost all interest in it. Mr. Sisson went to work by himself and got a great deal of matter published, like the President speeches and other matter, and published daily bulletins, and, so far as it was possible to get them in, daily bulletins were published and transmitted to the daily press.

Mr. Sisson, however, found himself soon in opposition to Raymond Robins and those people and worked by himself and acquired through mysterious channels those documents which I by chance read in the original on the 4th day of March. When I read those documents there was not the first shadow of doubt in my mind that they were original.

Senator NELSON. How?

Mr. ———. I was sure that they were all genuine.

Senator NELSON. Your impression was that they were all genuine?

Mr. ———. Yes; that was my impression. I am familiar with the ordinary Russian official documents, as I had been mixed up with them for 18 years previous, and I saw no reason to doubt the genuineness of these documents.

Senator NELSON. What were they?

Mr. ———. They were documents that had passed between different departments of the Bolshevik Government, especially concerned with orders given and taken by the Germans to the Bolsheviks. I am speaking this strictly in confidence. Some of them concerned putting our American Embassy under watch by the Germans. I had seen enough of Germans about there to know what they were to control, and directly opposite our embassy there was a window where a German sat all the time, to see who entered the embassy and who went out. All these documents concerned German activities and German Bolshevik operations.

Senator NELSON. There was cooperation between the Germans and the Bolshevik men, the leaders?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator NELSON. What was Mr. Sisson doing, gathering up those documents?

Mr. ———. He saw the importance of getting that information out of Russia, and it was a very delicate piece of work, getting those documents out, because if he had been caught with those documents on him, he would never have gotten out of Russia; but he got them out, and I have no doubt of their genuineness, as I was able to read all of them in Russia, originally.

Senator NELSON. Then the documents that he got out were genuine?

Mr. ———. I regard it as one of the most remarkable pieces of work that has been done in our Secret Service.

Senator NELSON. Did he bring out the originals or copies?

Mr. ———. He brought out a great many originals, I would not attempt to say how many.

Maj. HUMES. There were 53 originals.

Mr. ———. I will tell you, I think some of them were photographs. We have either the originals or photographs of the originals, so that in reading them you have no doubt, when you read a photograph of an original.

Senator NELSON. And they show conclusively the cooperation between the Germans and the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know a man by the name of Martens?

Capt. LESTER. Richard Martens?

Mr. ———. Who is at the head of Martens & Co. in New York?

Capt. LESTER. Yes.

Mr. ———. I knew him. I never knew him in this country; only in Russia. I would like to say, for Mr. Martens, that I have seen his work, and I would like to say that I think he has got the most remarkable and useful data relating to economic Russia that exist—maps, and so forth.

Senator OVERMAN. He has been over there, has he?

Mr. ———. Yes; he knows his Russia, and I think he is Russian by birth.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether Col. Thompson saw these documents prior to leaving Russia?

Mr. ———. I do not know. I have no reason to believe that he ever did.

Senator NELSON. Did he appear to be in conflict with the Bolshevik Government?

Mr. ———. He was very opposed to the Bolshevik government up to the time of the Kerensky overthrow.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but I mean after that?

Mr. ———. He was the scarest man, for a week, that I ever saw.

Senator NELSON. I did not catch that.

Mr. ———. I say for a week after the Bolshevik overthrow of the Kerensky government, he was the scarest man I ever saw.

Senator NELSON. You mean after the Bolshevik capture of the government?

Mr. ———. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And the overthrow of the Kerensky government?

Mr. ———. Yes, after the overthrow of the Kerensky government. No, I am sure he was tremendously depressed by that, because he really hoped to be able to do something to bolster up Kerensky and make a success of the provisional government.

Senator NELSON. You were there in February, 1918, and they got in control in November. Can you not tell us something about their activities, how many houses they occupied and how many people they killed, or something of that kind?

Mr. ———. Very little, because I was not a newspaper man, and during that whole winter it was unsafe to be on the street at night. I attended to my business in the daytime, and I stayed at home nights. All my friends who went into the streets, almost without exception, were robbed—lost their fur coats, or their money, or boots, or something; they were held up on the streets and robbed; and it was not a question of fighting, so that I did not care to go into it.

Senator NELSON. There was a reign of terror and chaos prevailing?

Mr. ———. When I left, there were 28 of the large houses of Petrograd that had been sequestered. A constant threat was held over the house where I lived, that it would be sequestered.

Senator NELSON. They threatened to take that?

Mr. ———. Yes; and we had it all arranged what to do, if they did.

Senator NELSON. Were they confiscating all kinds of property; I mean, were they taking it over?

Mr. ———. For instance, if you started out with your automobile in the morning—if you had one—the chances were that you would come home on foot. I do not think there was a private automobile in Petrograd left, when I left there; they had all been taken over.

Senator NELSON. Were there factories there?

Mr. ———. Are there factories there?

Senator NELSON. Were there, before the revolution?

Mr. ———. Yes; that was quite a factory center. There were at least 400,000 workmen in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Had they taken possession of those, too?

Mr. ———. I do not know of any factories which were seriously in operation, excepting those connected with munitions. The Poutiloff Works were running when I left.

Senator STERLING. Those were munitions works?

Mr. ———. Those were very large munitions works; the largest in Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. Speaking of Col. Thompson, and the week of fear that he underwent—

Mr. ———. I will tell you, that was natural, because he was a very rich man and he thought that he would be a natural target for looters. He imagined the looting would begin at once; but there was not anything of that kind happened.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is it not a fact that his statements favorable to the Bolshevik were made to appease them, and to protect himself, when he was over there?

Mr. ———. I do not know. Col. Thompson came home and made three extraordinary statements, which were not borne out by the facts. Those statements were these. He had lived there three weeks under the Bolsheviks. He came back and spoke for them, and said, "The Bolsheviks will never make a separate peace with Germany." That fell. That is one statement.

Then he said, "The Bolsheviks will never repudiate the public debt." That fell.

Then he said, "The Bolsheviks are very anxious that a constitutional assembly meet." I saw that constitutional assembly dispersed with bullets. So that those three great statements which he made in regard to Russia were not justified by the facts.

Senator WOLCOTT. Here is a statement which he made. My eye is attracted by this, in view of the fact that you say that he was in such mortal fear during such a period, there. He said: "If at any time I saw danger, it was not in Russia."

Mr. ———. Yes; I saw that statement also, and I wondered what he meant by that.

Senator OVERMAN. How long was that after he gave this money to the Kerensky government?

Mr. ———. That money to the Kerensky government had all been given before that. That was given in the early weeks of September.

Senator OVERMAN. How long did he stay there after the Bolsheviks came in?

Mr. ———. He stayed there until about the 1st of December.

Senator OVERMAN. May he not afterwards have gotten in touch with the Bolshevik government and contributed to them?

Mr. ———. I do not know.

Maj. HUMES. What do you know about the Bolsheviks or any other element turning over to Col. Thompson large amounts of pillaged property which he now has stored in Stockholm?

Mr. ———. I do not think there is anything in that at all. I think—this is only my personal opinion—that there was a great deal of American money unwisely spent in Russia, ostensibly Red Cross money. I think it was not Red Cross money. I had no reason to believe it was. But Mr. Thompson was at one time interested in purchasing some private collections from people who had become practically bankrupt, and who were glad to depart with what they could get for their goods, and left those things. He never interested himself in it at all, and I know he did make purchases.

Senator OVERMAN. How was Raymond Robins's administration of the Red Cross funds?

Mr. ———. I do not think Robins had anything to do with the Red Cross management. I think that was almost exclusively in the hands of Mr. Wardwell and Mr. Thacher, who, so far as I could judge, were honest, conscientious workers.

Maj. HUMES. Was not Wardwell sent to Petrograd to relieve Robins, and had not Robins been in charge up to that time?

Mr. ———. When I left, Robins was still in charge.

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Senator NELSON. How did you finally get out of Finland?

Mr. ———. Well, as I say, the prime minister gave us some cars and we went up to the end of the Red line, about 150 miles northwest of Helsingfors, and there we camped for 11 or 12 days, negotiating with the local guards and headquarters in Helsingfors, and we finally got permission to go through. Meanwhile we had not been able to get in communication with the Whites on the other side, and we took our chances as to the reception we would get.

Senator NELSON. You had to go by way of Haparanda?

Mr. ———. Yes; but I mean going through the line we took our chances. We took our chance on going through the White line, as to the reception we would get.

Meanwhile we had gotten the Reds to agree, and the red flag and a white flag on the ramparts stopped the firing on the other side.

Senator NELSON. The White guards were friendly to you, were they not?

Mr. ———. No more than the Red.

Senator NELSON. No more than the Red?

Mr. ———. No more than the Red; no. We received just as many courtesies from the Reds as from the Whites, and probably more.

Maj. HUMES. You had two Americans to deal with in the Red guard?

Mr. ———. Yes. I will tell you what our trouble was, when we got into the Whites. The officers we met at the lines were very fine fellows, but as we got into the interior we came in contact with yeagers. There were from 3,000 to 5,000 Finnish soldiers who had been in the German army, and who came up there and organized the White army, and those fellows were very anti-Ally, and we were not sure we would get by them.

Senator OVERMAN. You say Helsingfors is a very pretty city?

Mr. ———. Yes; a beautiful city. I expect to be there in a few weeks.

Senator OVERMAN. You say that it has how many people?

Mr. ———. It is a city of 250,000.

Senator NELSON. It has a university with from 800 to 1,000 students.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there anything else, gentlemen?

Senator NELSON. Is there anything else you would like to tell us?

Mr. ———. No; I think not.

Senator NELSON. Anything bearing on this matter?

Mr. ———. No; I think not.

Senator OVERMAN. What was Col. Thompson doing there? What was his business?

Mr. ———. He was in charge of the Red Cross there, to which he had made very heavy contributions.

Senator OVERMAN. Was he appointed in this country?

Mr. ———. He was appointed in this country, and I think he spent a great deal of his own money in the support of the work after he got there; but I know, as a fact—I will state that as a fact because I saw so much of him that he could not have done anything of that sort without my knowing it—that he refused absolutely to meet anybody who came to talk business with him, and he said to me, "I want no interests whatsoever in Russia—no business interests in Russia." That rumor is not founded.

Senator WOLCOTT. You can answer this question or not, as you desire. Were your differences with Col. Thompson on a personal matter over the merits of Bolshevism?

Mr. ———. Just on the merits of Bolshevism.

Senator OVERMAN. You speak Russian, do you?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Did you meet some of the leaders of the first revolution—Miliukoff, and those men?

Mr. ———. Yes, sir; I know those gentlemen well.

Senator STERLING. How did those men impress you?

Mr. ———. Well, they are men rather above the average in brilliancy of intelligence, and, like all Russians, highly educated men, they do not know the first letter of compromise. They can not get together and agree on anything. Every man is cocksure. Miliukoff is one of the most brilliant men that I ever met, but he launched a proposition which he might just as well have kept to himself, about taking over Constantinople, etc., which cost him his position in the cabinet, and lost his influence with the rest of the revolution.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you brought in connection with the Czar at any time?

Mr. ———. Only to see him passing through the streets. Business people did not meet the Czar very often. I have seen him a great many times, and his family.

Senator STERLING. Did you ever see that monk?

Mr. ———. No; I never saw him, I am sorry to say.

Senator NELSON. In a general way, how did you find doing business under the government of the Czar?

Mr. ———. It was extremely easy. Life there was extremely comfortable, and I always found the courts absolutely fair. That is the chief thing. If the courts are fair, it is a good place to do business.

Senator NELSON. The Russian peasants who live in the mirs are a fine, good-natured people, you think?

Mr. ———. They are the softest-natured people in the world, when they are not wild. It is one of the most comfortable countries to live in, from my experience, in Europe. Traveling there was most comfortable, also.

Senator NELSON. And perfectly safe?

Mr. ———. Yes. Collecting your bills was as easy as in the United States.

Senator NELSON. And those peasants were a good, honest set of people?

Mr. ———. Very. I could have told stories about them in the revolution; how they came to the rescue. Fellows who worked for me in the past, when they heard we were short of food in Petrograd, would come in the night time and bring us food.

(Thereupon the executive session was concluded.)

(A letter and inclosure, ordered by the chairman to be inserted in the record, are here printed in full, as follows:)

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE,
31 Union Square West, New York, February 15, 1919.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been following the published reports of the investigation that has been in progress by the committee of which you are the chairman, with relation to Bolshevism. The account of the statements made by Dr. George S. Simons and the form of some of the questions which purport to have been addressed to him are of such a character as to satisfy me that, to say the least, there is a grave misunderstanding as to the attitude of the Jews toward Bolshevism. I have accordingly, as president of the American Jewish Committee, prepared a statement covering various of the features of Dr. Simons's deposition, which corrects the inaccuracies and, what I regard, the unfairness of much that he has said. I should appreciate it if you would make this statement, which appeared in to-day's New York Times and of which I inclose a clipping, a part of the records of the proceedings pending before your committee, in order that the antidote may go with the poison.

There is such a lack of understanding throughout the country with regard to the East Side, and such a misconception of what it is and what it stands for, that it is to be regretted that those who know are never asked to give information, but that a man like Dr. Simons, who has apparently been out of the country for eleven years, is at once looked upon as an expert concerning it and is heralded as such throughout the country.

The residents of the East Side of New York are, as a whole, a reputable, honorable, and patriotic body of people as are to be found in any other part of the country. They are industrious, law-abiding, and intellectual; they perform the duties of citizenship, they pay their taxes, they participate in elections, they have ideals, they educate their children, they understand the spirit of America, and are in every way entitled to fair treatment. There are but few illiterates among them, no paupers, and no intemperance. They are ambitious and are unwilling to be exploited. The records of our public libraries show that they read more books, and better books, than are read in any other part of the city, and, I may add, in the country. I have attended meetings of pushcart peddlers, where they listened with interest and understanding to lectures on philosophy and the higher mathematics. I have visited classes of boys and girls who worked hard for a livelihood, who were engaged in studying Aristotle's ethics and politics. During the past few weeks I have been engaged as one of the arbitrators in conjunction with Prof. William Z. Ripley and Prof. Felix Frankfurter in adjusting the clothing workers' strike, which involved fifty-five thousand East Siders, and I can say to you that America can feel proud of having among its citizens men of the capacity and character of those who were the leaders of the workers and the manufacturers who were concerned in this economic conflict.

It has become fashionable for newspaper men who desire copy to treat the East Side as a bugaboo. By this time the average citizen of other States imagines that the East Side is an inferno and the dwelling place wherein evils of every kind lurk. Consequently, for a stage setting and for dramatic effect, Bolshevism, with gnashing teeth and scraggly beard and dripping dagger, is pictured as stalking through the noisome alleys in the imaginary East Side. The actual picture of the East Side, which would confront a visitor who proceeds with open eyes and open mind, would lead him to wonder how it is possible in this day and generation, to permit prejudice and ignorance to malign an entire community which possesses qualities which will eventually be recognized as constituting one of the most valuable assets in American life. There are to-day prominent in every walk of business, in every profession, in every industry, the products of the East Side, and a sense of sadness possesses me when I consider the injustice which has been inflicted for so long, and which seems never to end, upon these people.

I have studied the East Side for 25 years. During that period I have been a director of the Educational Alliance, of which the late Isidore Strauss, who met death heroically on the Titantic, was the president. I have been privileged to address many meetings in that section of the city and to participate in dozens of activities. I read the Yiddish newspapers and am constantly called into consultation and conference with respect to every imaginable movement that can concern the public which affects the East Side, and I can therefore speak with authority when I say that there never has been a baser slander uttered than to charge by innuendo that the Jews of the East Side are Bolsheviks.

I speak thus feelingly, because I believe that nothing can be more injurious to the welfare of our country than to create artificial divisions between the different portions of our population, than to disseminate false opinions, and to engender hatred and misunderstandings. We are all of us talking too much about differences of nationality and of race. We are accentuating the variations which will always exist where there are human beings. Would it not be better if a real effort were made for mutual understanding to the end that we may constitute a unified people? I am inclosing a report of a meeting in November last at Madison Square Garden, in which I had the honor to participate, which represents what to my mind is the ideal attitude for those who are concerned in the future of this country to adopt.

Very truly, yours;

LOUIS MARSHALL,
President American Jewish Committee.

HON. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

[The New York Times, Saturday, Feb. 15, 1919.]

SAYS MASS OF JEWS OPPOSE BOLSHEVIKI—LOUIS MARSHALL, HEAD OF AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE, REPLIES TO DR. SIMONS—EAST SIDE NOT A HOTBED—STATEMENT CALLS TESTIMONY TO THE CONTRARY BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE "RIDICULOUS."

Louis Marshall, president of the American Jewish Committee, has given out a statement taking issue with the testimony of Dr. George S. Simons last Thursday before the subcommittee on the Judiciary of the Senate, which is investigating Bolshevism. Dr. Simons testified regarding the activity of Jews in the Bolshevik movement in Russia, and said that the present chaotic conditions there are due in large part to the activities of Yiddish agitators from the East Side of New York City, who went to Russia immediately following the overthrow of the Czar. Mr. Marshall's statement reads:

"I do not know Dr. Simons, who has made a sensational statement affecting the Jews before the Overman committee, but the fact that he seems to love the Russia of 1907, the period when Czarism was at its height, would indicate that his association with the Jews has been but limited. He is entirely correct in one statement, that the so-called Bolshevik Jews of Russia are apostles. They are more than that. Like all Bolsheviki, they bitterly hate all religion, and all that is comprehended in the abhorred word bourgeoisie.

"The statements made by Dr. Simons, in other respects, are inaccurate, unreliable, and unfair. The Jews of Russia, as a mass, are the opponents of Bolshevism, both because they belong to the bourgeoisie and because they cherish their religion. The Bundists are an organization of Jewish workingmen, whom the Bolsheviki are seeking to exterminate.

JEWS IN OTHER PARTIES.

"The Jews are also largely represented in the Social Democratic and the Constitutional Democratic Parties, who are the sworn foes of Bolshevism. When Prince Lvoff, who became the premier of Russia at the outbreak of the revolution in March, 1917, was here recently, he stated to me that in his opinion 95 per cent of the Jews of Russia are anti-Bolshevist, that there are some men, however, who were born Jews, like Trotsky, who had become prominent members of the Bolsheviki party and whose sins were seized upon by the anti-Semites for their own illegitimate purposes

"He told me that shortly before he came to this country he had been for a time imprisoned by the Bolsheviks, and while incarcerated he was visited by one Poliakoff, who held an office of some importance under the Bolsheviks. The prince had known him for some time, and expressed his surprise that he should have affiliated himself with that party, 'for,' he said, 'you know that, being a Jew, whatever you do will, as usual, be charged against the Jews as a whole.' To this Poliakoff replied: 'Although I was born a Jew I have no interest whatever in the Jews or in any other religious body. I am an internationalist, and I am not in any way concerned with what becomes of the Jews.'

"At about the same time there had been an outbreak, which resulted in the loss of many Jewish lives, and a committee called on Trotsky to urge upon him the necessity of taking steps for the protecting of their lives. He very coolly answered that he was not interested in the Jews or in what might happen to them, and that he did not regard himself as a Jew in any sense.

CALLS DEDUCTIONS ILLOGICAL.

"The fact that Dr. Simons may be able to prepare a list of Jews who are Bolsheviks means nothing. I could go to Ossining to-morrow and prepare from the records there a list of criminals who may happen to be of English, French, Italian, or Slavonic parentage, or who may belong to the Episcopalian, Methodist, Baptist, or Catholic Churches and seek to deduce from such lists conclusions derogatory of the nationality or of the church to which they belong with as much reason as Dr. Simons has to deduce from his list the conclusion which he is apparently seeking to inculcate. In fact, Lenine, who heads the list, is not a Jew, and Martoff, who appears upon it, is strongly opposed to Bolshevism.

"He says that Jews from the East Side went to Russia immediately after the revolution and are now active Bolsheviks. It is well known that when the news of the revolution came, there were quite a number of Russians, both Jews and non-Jews who returned to their native land. Some of them placed themselves at the disposal of Milukov and Kerensky. Others doubtless joined the Bolsheviks. Their return was encouraged by the Russian Government, which supplied them with the means of transportation. The suggestion that any financial or other assistance came from the East Side is a ridiculous fabrication.

"There is an intimation that there are Jewish Bolsheviks in this country. The term 'Bolshevist,' as now used, means anything or everything to which the speaker may for the moment be opposed. I deny that there is on the East Side any considerable number of those who are opposed to government, or who adhere to or sympathize with the anarchistic conceptions of Lenine and Trotsky. In fact, several of the leading Socialists who knew Trotsky when he was in this country looked upon him as a lunatic, and are unable to conceive how it was possible for a man of his character and mental qualities to attain the station that he now occupies. They deride him to-day as they did when he was a Bronx penny-a-liner.

JEWS LOVE LAW AND ORDER.

"Everything that real Bolshevism stands for is to the Jew detestable. His traditions wed him to law and order, make of him a legalist. The Bolsheviks are the enemies of law and order. The Jew makes the very center of his life and of his existence the home and the family. The Bolsheviks decry marriage and condemn morality. The Jew is justly noted for being thrifty and economical, and with recognizing as necessary the institution of property. The Bolshevik is seeking the destruction of the very concept of property. The great mass of the Jews are faithful to their ancient religion and are ever ready to help their brethren in distress. The club of the Bolshevik knows no brother and he despises religion.

"The innuendo is also thrown out that the Jews are not patriotic. Let their record during this war speak for them. They constitute but 3 per cent of the population of this country, yet more than 5 per cent of their number entered our Army and Navy, and a larger proportion of the number as volunteers. I expect shortly to supply an authentic list of all the men who served under the colors, so as to be able to present to our maligners irrefragable proof that the Jews have furnished in proportion to their numbers a larger quota to our military and naval forces than any other part of our population.

"Let me also refer to the casualty lists to establish the fact that the Jews of this country not only served, but that they were brave and heroic, and were prepared to make the supreme sacrifice for America because they love it. Let me also refer to the list of citations for exceptional heroism, to the men who fought in the Argonne Forest, to those who constituted a part of the lost battalion, and who participated in every movement of our troops. You will find among them East Side Jews in large numbers.

"It is difficult to understand the motive behind this attempt to arouse unworthy passions. Attack Bolshevism as much as you please, and the Jews of America are with you. But what justification is there for charging the Jews with Bolshevism, when in reality there is a smaller percentage of them who can truthfully be so denominated than there is in any other section of the American people? I might illustrate this point by referring to the recently published list of I. W. W.'s who are awaiting deportation, the vast majority of whom are non-Jews."

(A statement in writing submitted by Mr. Simon Wolf, of Washington, D. C., is, by order of the chairman, here printed in the record, as follows:)

STATEMENT OF MR. SIMON WOLF.

As chairman of the board of delegates on civil rights of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and as resident member of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, a national and international organization, I beg leave to briefly state that I am in hearty accord with the statement submitted and filed (and made part of your record) by the Hon. Louis Marshall, of New York City.

I am not at all surprised that the accusations against a certain portion of the human family entitled the Jewish is always made the scapegoat of every movement. It has been so from time immemorial. I am also reminded of the Irishman who beat the Jew and when asked why he did so said that he had killed Christ. When the answer came that that had been done thousands of years ago, the Irishman replied that he had never heard of it until that day.

And, again, when a Jew was walking along the street, a stone was thrown from the opposite side. Naturally the Jew dodged and the stone went crashing into the plate-glass window. The owner sued the Jew for damages and the judge decided that the Jew must pay, for had he not dodged the window would not have been broken. A great judge—but the misfortune is that the Jew throughout all history has been dodging those kind of missiles and subjected to such unjust decisions.

In my book entitled "The American Jew as Soldier, Patriot, and Citizen," I show conclusively that from the founding of the Republic up to the present day the Jewish contingent of our American citizenship have done more than their proportionate share—not more than their duty, but more than their numerical strength would warrant. The same is equally true in the great war that has so far terminated. Again we have shown a greater proportion. But, as I have said time and again, no class of citizens show more readiness to live and to die for our great institutions and to uphold our flag than the Jew, for here is our promised land, and from here goes forth the trumpet call for democracy and liberty.

Senator Vance, of North Carolina, in his famous lecture on "The Scattered Nation," truthfully stated that the Jews are the gulf stream of history.

Do not forget, gentlemen, that whatever the Jew is, the Christian, being in the majority and in control, has made him. If he equals the best, it is because the opportunity to be so has not been denied him. If he stands on an equality with the worst no one is to blame except his surroundings, and whatever he does, whether good or bad, is not done as a Jew but as a human being, and after all the Christian world has not a mortgage on the good or the bad. If crimes and outrages have been committed in Russia they are not due to the Jews but to oppression and persecution which the Jews, in common with the other governed of that country, have had to endure.

I incorporate herein a paragraph sent me by an eminent Russian gentleman, an American citizen born in Russia, but whose judgment I highly value:

"I note this morning that Lloyd George admits that the soviets have accumulated sufficient military strength to require formidable force to conquer them. I note further that George claims that Wilson positively refuses to participate in any armed invasion of Russia, and that the military burden would consequently fall on England and France, and that these two nations lack both the strength and the will to undertake such a task. Hence, I conclude that the Russian revolution will boil itself out and through, the same as did the French Revolution. There will be no foreign invasion or participation. The Russian people will decide and determine their own destiny.

"How much of the 'reign of terror' Russia has already gone through is hard to say. Thanks to a strict censorship, we know nothing authentic of doings in the interior of Russia. One thing is sure—the Russian people, and mark, please, that I do not mean the grand ducal families, mostly educated in France, but the actual Russian peasantry, is not bloodthirsty. No guillotine has yet been set up or worshiped. There may be a Robespierre, or several Robespierres, but I am sure there is no Marat. Of course, we have Girondines in plenty. Since there is to be no foreign invasion, Russia has no further need for a Dante. So that, on the whole, I say that for the present, there is nothing else to be done or said, except to leave the Russian revolution to boil itself out."

I also quote the following extract from the Outlook of last week, entitled "The valor of the east side," which speaks for itself:

"A recent letter home from a staff officer in France glories in the splendid mettle and loyal Americanism of the men drafted from the motley foreign-born population of New York's east side. An editorial in the New York Times recently devoted a column to one of them, Abraham Krotoshinsky (said to have been a barber), cited by Gen. Pershing for his heroic exploit in aiding in the rescue of "the lost battalion" in the Argonne Forest.

"The following paragraphs in the above-mentioned letter are of more than local and private interest:

"This division is made up of the puny east siders, who a New York dude thought could never hold their own with the sturdy sons of the West. We have got something to be justly proud of in this, the great melting pot of New York typified and glorified. Our burial lists show the names of the Jew, the Italian, the Russian, the Polack, the Irishman, the German, fighting for the free Government which has aided and protected each. They have offered their lives for their country, and in so doing have become real Americans—no matter where they came from and how they spell their names, as good Americans as those of us whose ancestors fought in all our wars. (The writer is one of these.)

"War is the great equalizer, the real melting pot. It has welded for us a great people united by the common bond of sacrifice and devotion, courage and suffering in a common cause. It is our regeneration, our rebirth, a revolution such as we have never experienced in all our history. This will not be realized till after the business has been finished up."

And in this connection I wish to state that when the Spanish War broke out over 600 Jews volunteered from the east side, most of whom had come from Russia, who had fled from persecution and serving in the Russian Army, and yet had volunteered to fight for liberty. There is no danger in this country in the direction of Jewish influence or action, and it gives me great pleasure to state that the danger to our institutions does not come from those who are illiterate or from those who come with brain and brawn, but from those who speak seven languages and are patriotic in none. Watch the mouthing, ranting anarchists and the scheming politicians, who cater to their accursed plotting, and all danger will be averted. The Jew as a man and a citizen will aid you to bring about that perfect accord in the affairs of Government without which the Republic would be a mere "scrap of paper."

SIMON WOLF.

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, in Room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Maj. Humes, who is the next witness?

Maj. HUMES. The next witness is Mr. Herman Bernstein.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HERMAN BERNSTEIN.

The witness was sworn by the chairman.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Bernstein, where do you live?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I live in New York; 2761 Briggs Avenue.

Maj. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I am a journalist and correspondent, representing many American newspapers.

Maj. HUMES. In connection with your newspaper work, have you been in Russia during the last few years at various times?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I was in Russia three times since the Russian revolution. I was there in 1917, and then I was there in 1918, and I have just returned from Siberia, two weeks ago.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Bernstein, you are representing the New York Herald, I believe?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; the New York Herald, and about 40 other newspapers affiliated with the New York Herald.

Maj. HUMES. Will you give to the committee the result of your observations in Europe or Russia, on these various trips, of the operations of the revolutionary government.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Gentlemen, first of all, permit me to correct a wrong impression that has been produced with regard to the Jewish people by the testimony of certain witnesses at these hearings. Dr. Simons, who lived for a number of years in Russia, practically branded Bolshevism in Russia as a movement of Jewish origin, even though he endeavored to soften the impression by calling the Bolshevik leaders apostate Jews. He made public a list of names of Jewish Bolshevik leaders. Some of the names in that list are not Jewish, and some are not Bolsheviks. He also stated that the great majority of the Bolsheviki in Russia came from the East Side of New York.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not think he said exactly that, Mr. Bernstein. I do not think he said the majority of the Bolsheviks came from New York.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. If I remember correctly, I think he mentioned—

Senator WOLCOTT. He said a great number.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think he mentioned a very large number.

Senator OVERMAN. He said many. He did not say a majority of them or any considerable number.

Maj. HUMES. He referred to one soviet in which—

Mr. BERNSTEIN. There were about nine-tenths, I think he said.

Maj. HUMES. The officers of one soviet, the majority of whom were apostate Jews.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, I think that such statements are as unjust as they are inaccurate. It would, of course, be quite as absurd and unjust to call Bolshevism a Christian movement because its father and founder, Nicholas Lenine, is a Christian, or because the most active and most influential Bolshevik leaders, such as Commissar for Foreign Affairs Tchitcherin, the commander in chief who demoralized the Russian Army, Ensign Krylenko, Commissars Dubenko, Kollontay, Lunacharsky, Bonch-Bruyevitch, and Maxim Gorky who first aided the Bolshevik movement, then denounced it, and now supports it again, are all Christians.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean Christians as distinguished from Jews?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not mean they acknowledge the Christian religion, because it has been testified here that they are against that religion.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That is, so-called Christians. Nor would it be fair to call the Bolshevik movement in this country a Christian movement because the leading apologists, defenders, and agents of the Bolsheviki, such as Albert Rhys Williams, John Reed, Raymond Robins, Col. Thompson, and Louise Bryant are Christians.

Bolshevism is not a question of religion or race. Nor does the East Side of New York deserve the blame for all the wrongs and horrors committed in Russia under the Bolshevik tyranny.

Senator NELSON. Did not Trotsky come from the East Side?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, Trotsky was two months on the East Side of New York and was very unpopular there.

Senator NELSON. Did he not stay there almost all the time he was in America?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Trotsky was two months on the East Side in the beginning of 1917, just before the outbreak of the revolution, and returned to Russia.

Senator NELSON. And now he is one of the head men over there?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. When the autocracy of the Romanoffs was overthrown, the provisional government threw the doors of Russia wide open to all political exiles. The provisional government was composed of such conservatives and liberals as Prince Lvoff and Paul Milikoff. There was only one Socialist in the first cabinet, Alexander Kerensky, then minister of justice. And from all corners of the earth all sorts of political exiles hurried to Russia. Some came from America, some from England, others from France, Italy, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries. Among the political exiles there were many ordinary criminals who suddenly styled themselves also political exiles, and these hosts of discontented preachers of unrest have played an important part in paralyzing Russia.

Bolshevism, as a faction of the Social Democratic Party, was born about 15 years ago. Several Russians kept it alive quietly but energetically. Lenine was the founder of the movement. In 1909 a Bolshevist school was established in Capri, Italy, on funds secured by Maxim Gorky. That school was organized by the following men: Lenine, Maxim Gorky, Lunacharsky, Alexinsky, Bogdanov, and Milhallov. None of these are Jews. The Bolsheviki had representatives in the Russian Duma under the Czar's régime, and their leader was Malinovsky, an intimate friend of Lenine's. Shortly after the outbreak of the war it was established that while being a member of the executive committee of the Bolsheviki Malinovsky was also an agent provocateur in the pay of the Tsar's government. When this was revealed, Lenine tried to defend and whitewash him. During the war Malinovsky was in Germany conducting Bolshevist propaganda for the German Government among the Russian prisoners of war.

The Bolshevism of Lenine, Trotsky, and Tchitcherin is the natural offspring of the monarchistic Bolshevism of Nicholas II and Wilhelm II. Reactionary Bolshevism breeds anarchistic Bolshevism. The Prussian militaristic government of the Kaiser helped to create the Bolshevist movement that has now transformed Russia into a huge graveyard, into a tyranny over the people by a small but daring set of fanatics and unscrupulous charlatans.

It is true there are a number of Jews among the leaders of the Bolsheviki in Russia. They disclaim their Judaism. They say they are neither Jews nor Russians, but internationalists. Besides, it should be remembered that despite the educational restrictions the Jews had a proportionately larger percentage of intellectuals than the Russians; that the despotism of the autocracy was directed chiefly against the Jews; that all governmental departments were closed to the Jews, no matter how capable they were. The government of the Tsar preferred to employ Germans in the various departments, so that Russia was Prussianized long before the outbreak of the war. While the Bolshevist movement is directed also against the intellectuals, the Bolsheviki could not help choosing a number of Jews among the leaders. But the great mass of the Jewish people in Russia is strongly opposed to the Bolsheviki, for there is no element of the Russian population that has been hit harder by Bolshevism than the Jews. One of the worst Jewish pogroms was made by the Bolsheviki. The entire Jewish population of the town of Glukhov was massacred by the Red Guards last year.

Under such circumstances it is both absurd and unjust to charge the Jewish people with the responsibility for the Bolshevist movement.

Senator NELSON. What is it composed of? Russians?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. This social revolutionary party is the party of Kerensky and the saner elements in Russia who want a democratic Russia.

Senator NELSON. That was before the Bolsheviki came in?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; while the Bolsheviki were in power.

Senator NELSON. I thought it was under the Kerensky administration.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; I say the socialist revolutionary party is the party—

Senator NELSON. Who wanted this revolution?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; this was in April, 1918; this was six months after Lenine and Trotzky had already come into power.

Senator NELSON. They came in in November, 1917?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They came in in November, 1917.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is the socialist revolutionary party in Russia a typical socialist party, or would it be more properly described in this country as a party advocating a democracy or a people's government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The socialist revolutionary party is the party that is advocating a democratic form of government for Russia—a democratic representative form of government.

Senator NELSON. The term "social" in that party does not mean necessarily socialism, as we understand it in its various forms in this country?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. It is socialism, but it is the saner form of socialism. They believe the doctrine of socialism can not be introduced in Russia for many, many years to come.

Senator NELSON. Is not this the distinction that we make in this country, that they believe in what you call state socialism—we have the term that we use, and Bismarck was an advocate of it, "state socialism"—in other words, have the state carry on as many governmental activities as possible, instead of private parties.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That is it, exactly.

Senator NELSON. And they are distinguished from these other radical socialists who believe in upheavals and the seizure by violence of the property of what they call the capitalists, and taking it in that way and operating it, in that they believe in having it done by legislative and peaceful means?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Exactly.

Senator NELSON. Is not that the distinction?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. This socialist revolutionary party has been advocating all along a constituent assembly.

Senator OVERMAN. A representative assembly?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. A representative, national, constituent assembly; and the Bolsheviki overthrew Kerensky on the ground that they said they also advocated a constituent assembly, and that Kerensky was postponing it too long. But the moment the constituent assembly was called they dispersed it because that constituent assembly happened to be against the Bolsheviki, two-thirds of it.

Senator WOLCOTT. The difference seems to have been, then, in its practical manifestations, that Kerensky advocated a constituent assembly that was representative of the people, whereas the Bolsheviki wanted a constituent assembly that was representative of them.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That is it exactly; that is very true. That is a very important point.

Senator OVERMAN. Proceed.

MR. BERNSTEIN. I am glad that our Senate has at last started an investigation into this movement whose purpose is to dynamite the world. I have called attention to its dangers in 1917 and throughout 1918. I have seen it at close range. I have visited Russia three times since the revolution. I was there when Prince Lvoff and Kerensky were the premiers; I have seen Russia under Lenine and Trotsky in 1918; and I have just returned from Siberia, which was liberated from Bolshevik rule by the brave Czecho-Slovaks.

I have no fear of telling the truth about Russia. I have published the facts in the columns of the New York Herald, the Washington Post, and other important newspapers in various parts of this country. For many years before the revolution I described in the New York Times and Sun the cruelties of the Russian autocracy, but at the same time I familiarized American readers with the better side of Russia, with Russian genius, with Russian literature, and Russian art. I was not afraid to tell the truth about the tyranny of the Tsar, and I am not afraid to tell the truth about the tyranny of Lenine and Trotsky. Those who believe in democracy, in social justice, in "government of the people, by the people, for the people," in freedom of the press, in freedom of speech, in the rule of the majority, denounced the tyranny of the Tsar, and now denounce the tyranny of the Bolsheviki. For they have no democracy, no social justice, no government of the people, no freedom of press, no freedom of speech—they have a dictatorship over the people including the proletariat.

I believe that the only way of disarming Bolshevism is to tell the truth about what it is doing. The Bolsheviki know this too, and that is why they have strangled the free press in Russia, and allow no news to leave Russia.

There are four types of people who have seen Russia under Bolshevist rule and who nevertheless praise it, advocating its cause, seeking to spread it in this country, and but a short while ago urged the recognition of the Bolsheviki by our Government under the disguise of soviets. These are the Bolshevik emissaries, propagandists, and agents who are paid by the Bolsheviki.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean these agents in this country are paid by the Bolsheviki?

MR. BERNSTEIN. I mean some of them have been employed by them in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not know whether any money has been sent to this country or not?

MR. BERNSTEIN. I do not know about money being sent to this country.

Senator NELSON. You believe they have sent agents to this country?

MR. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Second, parlor socialists, reformers, and faddists of all kinds who do not know Russia, who could not speak to the Russian people, who could not read the Russian newspapers, and who get their information from the Bolshevik leaders just as ambassadors in bygone days received their information about the Tsar's government from the Tsar and his bureaucrats.

Third, the Bolsheviki—or would-be Bolsheviki—the extremists of all kinds, wherever they are.

Fourth, those who were pro-German and who concealed their pro-German leanings under the cloak of Bolshevism, for it must not be forgotten that Russian Bolshevism was nourished in this war by Prussian militarism.

Senator NELSON. Let me see if I understand you. You believe that Bolshevism in Russia was launched and nourished and put forth by Germany?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. By Germany. The fact that the Bolsheviki handed Russia over to the Prussian militarists at Brest-Litovsk can not be denied. Lenine, who arrived in Petrograd from Switzerland—not from the East Side of New York—by way of Germany one month after the revolution, with a trainload of his followers, commenced to dynamite Russia by his false promises and spurious theories, demoralizing the Russian Army and the working people. It was this destructive work that culminated in the betrayal at Brest-Litovsk.

Those who are inclined to praise the Bolsheviki on the ground that they brought about a revolution in Germany do not face the facts squarely. The German revolution came not because of the Bolsheviki but in spite of them. In fact, they retarded the German revolution.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say the Bolsheviki retarded the German revolution?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. How so?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, the socialist elements in Germany saw the horrible example of the destruction of Russia by the so-called socialists, and that, of course, has intensified the reactionary movement in Germany and has weakened the more liberal elements. They always pointed to what revolution means to a country, and in that way they have retarded the revolutionary movement in Germany.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then your idea is that the Bolsheviki of Russia retarded the German revolution, not deliberately, and intentionally, but in an indirect way?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. By showing to Germany by horrible example what the thing is in action?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And creating a revulsion against it in Germany?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

To summarize what the Bolsheviki have achieved as destroyers of Russia is to recount the tragedy of the Russian people, who are now suffering untold agonies under the new slavery that has been imposed upon them with the aid of Prussian bayonets and machine guns. They demoralized the Russian Army, they demobilized it, they unchained the mob spirit, they incited civil war, they signed the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty which dismembered Russia, they paralyzed the industries, they increased the hosts of unemployed, they intensified starvation and suffering, they encouraged looting, murder, and terror, they strangled the press, they abolished courts of justice, they dispersed the constituent assembly, the representatives of the people, they murdered leading members of the constituent assembly, they shot down working people who made a demonstration against the closing of the constituent assembly, they did exactly what the Tsar did on that terrible bloody Sunday in 1905, and then they established a dictatorship over the people of Russia, supported by well-paid red guards, and they hounded the champions of Russian liberty, branding them as enemies of the people.

While professing socialism they intensified reaction everywhere by their horrible example, they brutalized the Russian masses, they profaned the ideals and symbols of liberty, and they discredited the idea of representative government, and retarded all sane movements for the betterment of mankind. They saved the imperialistic government of Germany in October, 1917, just when Austria was ready to break away from Germany. The Bolsheviki overthrew the Kerensky government with the aid of German officers and prisoners of war. They enabled Germany to remove millions of her troops to the western front, transforming Russia into a German colony. In the meantime they wrecked Russia, they conducted a systematic campaign against the allies and the friends of Russia, particularly against the President of the United States, who on all occasions manifested the deepest sympathy for the Russian people, they attacked England, France, and the United States, they published secret treaties found in the Foreign Office, but shielded the central powers—particularly the Kaiser.

They did whatever the Prussian militarists ordered them to do, and when the German ambassador, Count von Mirbach, was assassinated by Russian patriots who could not endure the new yoke of Kaiserism imposed upon Russia through the Bolsheviki, the wretched tools of the Kaiser put to death a large number of Russian revolutionists. But when Shingaryov and Kokoshkin were murdered in a hospital during their sleep by Red Guards and sailors, Lenine did not punish the murderers, even though all Russia knew who they were. For Shingaryov and Kokoshkin were not German officials, they were only great Russian patriots and reformers who devoted their lives to the betterment of the condition of the Russian people—and they were opposed to the Bolsheviki.

The Bolsheviki pillaged and looted and robbed the Russian people of the conquests of their revolution, of their liberty. They were corrupt, they were merciless and cynical in their grafting. There was nothing that one could not get by bribing a commissar, beginning with a passport and ending with a battleship.

On August 14, 1917, I cabled an interview with Kerensky in which he made the following plea at the time the Bolshevik wave was ebbing:

I wish the great American democracy, especially at this moment, would come to our assistance energetically, for only in the hour of need we can best test our friends. A deep, strong source of moral power is insufficient just now. It is necessary to add material support.

On my return from Russia, in September, 1917, I wrote the following lines in my note book concerning the Bolsheviki:

Those who feared or hated the new freedom in Russia did not remain idle. There were three elements that sought its destruction. The agents of the secret police department and the gendarmerie of the old régime, together with leaders of the Black Hundred, painting themselves red, posing as revolutionists, spread disorder, race hatred, and provocation against the new revolutionary government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Just to get it in the record, will you tell us what is meant by the phrase "Black Hundred"?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The Black Hundred was the reactionary organization in Russia which had for its program the spreading of Jewish massacres.

Senator NELSON. Was it not the leavings of the old nihilists?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No: I think that was an entirely different movement. That was a movement supported by the reactionary elements under the Tsar, and it was the purpose of that organization to create race hatred and to set one oppressed nationality against another.

Senator NELSON. You think this was a movement in favor of the Tsar's government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. I see.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I say this was one of the elements that was naturally opposed to the revolution.

Then came the Bolsheviki—radical social democrats, irresponsible demagogues, apostles of dissension, of permanent revolution, and unrest—who boldly attempted to overthrow the new freedom. The third element, which was responsible for the activities of the others in a large measure, is the German military clique which conspired against new Russia and attempted to violate her freedom.

All these elements worked in the same direction. They cunningly circulated among the ignorant Russian masses incendiary propaganda and appeals to demand all radical reforms immediately, to divide the land immediately, to disregard authority, to attack the capitalists, to shout for immediate peace, to distrust the new revolutionary leaders of the people. The vilest slanders against revolutionary heroes were spread throughout the land, in the army and the navy, in large cities and little villages. The seeds of discord sown diabolically soon commenced to bring forth fruits of demoralization. Anarchy, chaos, general suspicion, and violence broke into the festivities of Russia's young liberty.

I have seen Russia in convulsions, torn by partisan conflicts, quaking feverishly from amateurish experiments of every kind, from quack remedies made in Germany and applied by impractical dreamers of internationalism, by charlatans, by escaped criminal convicts posing as revolutionists, by agents provocateurs. The most fantastic falsehoods were injected into the unthinking gray masses; dangerous slogans were circulated, inciting anarchy.

I have seen the Bolsheviki, the Leninites, in action. Their destructive propaganda, which was carried on by irresponsible theorists, hand in hand with escaped murderers, and German provocateurs; their attempts to reap the fruits of their dastardly work during the first months of the revolution: their efforts to impose the dictatorship of the mailed fist upon the majority of the Russian people.

I have seen heroes and traitors, saints, martyrs, and cowards, all passing with kaleidoscopic rapidity upon the historic screen of the Russian revolution. I have seen people who gave their all—their energies, their dreams, their lives—to save Russia, and I have seen the great mass of the people who do not know, because they were never permitted to know before, what real love of country means. Having been kept in darkness and oppression the Russian people were dazed by the great flood of the sudden light of liberty. They, who suffered under the reign of the knout and the bayonet, suddenly set free, mistook license for liberty.

I went to Russia again in February, 1918. Upon my return from Bolshevik-ridden Russia, in May, 1918, I wrote the following notes in my summary of the Russian situation:

After the betrayal at Brest-Litovsk, the official organs of the Soldiers' and Workmen's Council boasted with cynical bravado and clumsily defended the action of the Lenine government, endeavoring to prove to the masses that the peace procured by their delegates at Brest-Litovsk gave Russia a breathing spell during which the proletariat could gather new strength to continue the social revolution throughout the world.

While the government was hurrying away from Petrograd the lines of human beings waiting for food kept growing longer and longer; the people seeking permits to leave the city kept increasing rapidly; confusion and panic were spreading as the rumors and legends became wilder from hour to hour.

But when the government had moved away, when it was announced that the commissars had actually arrived in Moscow, Petrograd heaved a sigh of relief. The people did not know exactly why, but instinctively they felt relieved. Little by little the looting in the streets decreased. It was as though the epidemic of Bolshevism, which had broken out first in Petrograd, was subsiding in that city first. There appeared a perceptible tendency toward order at once. Fewer people were shot in the streets. If the cost of living was higher in Petrograd than anywhere else in the world, the cost of human life was lower there than anywhere else. The holding up of men and women in the streets, often even in broad daylight, was a matter of common occurrence. Such episodes no longer attracted attention. No one interfered, because it was dangerous to interfere.

Men in uniform would stop prosperous-looking passersby, rob them, and sometimes kill them. There was no police or militia to defend them, and the people in the streets, pedestrians or izovschiks, hurried on, glancing back furtively to see whether anyone was following them. Men in uniform arrested people in their homes, broke into hotels, searching and robbing them. The pretext was that they were searching for firearms, for counter revolutionists and speculators. Red Guards would often lead their victims away "somewhere." Many never returned home alive. They were shot on the way. The usual excuse for such executions was that the prisoners attempted to escape and had to be shot. The newspapers contained daily records of innocent persons shot on the way to prison because they attempted to run away. As a rule the victims were found with bullets in their chests. Some succeeded in bribing their way to safety by large sums of money divided among the uniformed gnnmen.

Senator STERLING. Who was the Secretary of War at that time, do you know? That was before Trotsky, was it not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That was before Trotsky. When Trotsky was named Secretary of War, at that time Krylenko was Secretary of War.

Senator OVERMAN. You used the word there, and I notice it has been used frequently by witnesses, "speculators." What do you mean by that?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That is a term used by them for profiteers. They have a special office——

Senator WOLCOTT. Is that a fair description in English? A "profiteer," as we understand the term in this country, is a man who makes an unreasonable, or what might be called an unconscionable, profit out of the Government. Is not a profiteer, or speculator, as they think of him, a man who buys and sells for a fair profit? Would he not be a speculator?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They established an office in Petrograd, a commissariat, on counter-revolution and speculation, and anyone who was opposed to the Bolsheviks could be classified as either a counter-revolutionist or a speculator and dealt with according to their pleasure. Many people were taken there and charged with being either a counter-revolutionist or speculator, and they were later shot in the yard at that commissar's office. The head of it was Uritsky, who was later assassinated.

Senator NELSON. At all events, they did not belong to the proletariat?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No.

Senator NELSON. They were not supposed to belong to them?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No. Anyone who was opposed to them was easily classified by them as either a counter-revolutionist or a speculator. It did not matter whether he was even a workman.

Senator STERLING. So it was really a reign of terror there, and by force, murder, and assassination they sought to impose the rule of the Bolsheviks on the people?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Absolutely.

On the day the Brest-Litovsk peace was being ratified by the Soldiers and Workmen's Council in Moscow, I interviewed Leon Trotsky at the Smolny Institute, in Petrograd. He told me that neither Germany nor the Bolsheviks considered that peace was of long duration, and added that he had just been appointed head of the revolutionary committee to organize the Red army. He defended himself and other Bolshevik leaders against the charge that they were German agents by saying that the allied ambassadors in Russia had made many mistakes which aided the German Government in Russia. He made various sensational assertions on that occasion.

One of them was that he knew that there was a secret treaty between Japan and Germany during the war, and he said that Germany was to get a part of European Russia and Japan was to get a part of Siberia.

He did not go to Moscow at the time, for he had become extremely unpopular on account of his attitude at Brest-Litovsk. Trotsky made way for Lenine, who took the center of the stage. The Lenin view on separate peace prevailed.

The eyes of the working people are opening. They are beginning to realize how cruelly they have been deceived. Discontent is brewing everywhere in Russia among the working people.

Here is a characteristic resolution adopted in May, 1918, by the workmen of the Petrograd arsenal:

The only measure which could lead Russia out of her terrible plight is the immediate convening of the constituent assembly and the unification of the democratic forces. Instead of the agreement with Germany there should be an agreement with all the democratic parties in Russia. We demand the free import of products and the increase of the bread rations. There shall be no special privileges for the Red Army or any other organization. All organs supervising the department of provisions shall be reformed and new elections held.

This resolution was adopted in Petrograd by 1,500 workmen against 2. There were hundreds of such resolutions recently adopted in various parts of Russia, indicating that the Bolshevik epidemic is nearing its end.

Russia is paralyzed by bolshevism, but the world must know the facts. The industries, labor, and commerce are at a standstill; the schools are practically closed; the railroads are crippled; unemployment is spreading rapidly; anarchy is struggling to take the place of anarchistic socialism for a while; the press is absolutely muzzled; the Russian liberals and sane revolutionary leaders are men without a country. Only the presses turning out paper money without end are working uninterruptedly. Graft and corruption have reached the depths of depravity.

The small imitators of the French revolutionists, instead of defending their country, as the French did, are wrecking it, and though they call themselves the advance agents of the social revolution throughout the world, they strike at the proletariat as well as at the rest of society, not only for the present but for generations to come; they give new strength to the forces of darkness and reaction in every land; they undermine the work and achievements of the real reformers. As a famous Russian economist has aptly described the effect of bolshevism to me, the Bolsheviks have made Russia their laboratory and the Russian people their rabbits and guinea pigs upon which they are experimenting. And they are producing the strongest antidote to socialism for the whole world—

Senator STERLING. Did not Mr. Trotsky tell you in one of your interviews, and did he not tell a number of other persons to whom he spoke, that the Bolshevik movement which culminated in a treaty with Germany, had for its object ultimately the destruction of the allied governments, including the United States?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, that is the program of Bolshevism—to destroy all other forms of government, to overthrow all other forms of government, and impose the dictatorship of the proletariat throughout the world.

Senator STERLING. Did he not state that by Russia withdrawing, it would weaken the allied forces so that Germany would have greater strength against the United States and the allied governments?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; he did not make that statement. I mean, the effect of what they have done is known throughout all the world. The things they have done helped Germany more than anything else at any time.

Senator STERLING. Did he denounce the United States as a tyrannous form of government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; he praised Germany for her being practical in dealing in realities, and ridiculed the United States and allies for dealing in ideals.

Senator NELSON. He must have known, Mr. Bernstein, that the effect of their propaganda was to help Germany against the allies.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes; there is not any doubt that they knew that.

Senator NELSON. They must have known that, and they must have intended it by their acts.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes; there is not any doubt that it was intended to help the central powers against the allies.

Enslaved under Czarism, accustomed to obeying the master's voice and knout, the people suddenly heard another master's voice—that of the Bolsheviki—and they obeyed by force of habit. They followed blindly the new leaders, who were not blind but who blinded the masses by false doctrines and insincere promises.

If Lenine and Trotsky were sincere when they came to Russia, if they really imagined Russia ripe for the great experiment of social revolution, if they actually believed that the illiterate Russian people, backward in education, commerce, industry, and agriculture, were ripe enough to serve as the model for their Utopian reform—if Lenine and Trotsky were sincere and naive enough to believe this when they came to Russia, they are surely insincere now when they see the results of their destructive schemes, when they see how their childish diplomacy has handed Russia over to German imperialism, how their promises of peace have brought civil war to the Russian people, intensified by the yoke of Kaiserism. They can not be sincere and remain at the helm of the despotism which they call government.

They can not be considered anything else than adventurers or madmen, charlatans and gamblers, with Russia as their stake and world destruction as their diabolical purpose.

Senator STERLING. Mr. Bernstein, is it not a fact that the Lenine-Trotsky régime executed a large number of men who wanted to continue the fighting with the allies against the central powers?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They executed a large number of men who disagreed with them on any point.

Senator STERLING. Well, were there not a good many Russians who, after the shameful betrayal of Russia and the allies by Lenine and Trotsky, wanted to continue in the contest, having Russia as a belligerent with the allies against the central powers, and made such representations to Lenine and Trotsky; and Lenine and Trotsky and the Bolsheviks murdered those men?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, they executed a number of people who defended the government of Kerensky, which wanted to continue the struggle against Germany with the allies; and then, of course, when they came to power they began to demobilize the army, and anyone who showed any resistance was either executed or thrown into prison.

Senator NELSON. They executed many Russian officers, did they not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes: large numbers of Russian officers were executed. Many of them were executed during the first few days of the revolution when the soldiers were given absolute freedom and they lost control of themselves; but many of them were shot when the Bolsheviki came to power, simply because they were regarded as counter revolutionists.

Senator WOLCOTT. The term "counter revolutionist" as applied by the Bolsheviki means what?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Anyone who wants to make a revolution against them.

Senator WOLCOTT. Against them?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. They have been called counter revolutionists by all democratic Russia, and they are regarded so to-day.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is the point I wanted to get at. A man might have been a violent and sincere advocate of revolution against the Tsar and the old régime, but if he was not in favor of the Bolsheviki they called him a counter revolutionist?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. A counter revolutionist and an enemy of the people.

Senator STERLING. Even though he is a proletariat?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; and that applies to all the best men and women of Russia simply because they are opposed to the Bolsheviki.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was that when you say these officers were shot and murdered?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I mean they simply called them——

Senator WOLCOTT (interposing). Because they claimed they were counter revolutionists does not mean that they were in favor of the old Tsaristic régime?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; that does not mean that.

Senator WOLCOTT. It simply means that they were opposed to the Bolsheviki?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Did you find any substantial sentiment anywhere in Russia for the return of the monarchy; at any rate before the Lenine-Trotsky saturnalia of crime and murder?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think the Tsar and his régime were so thoroughly discredited in their last days, especially in the course of the speeches that were made in the Duma, that there was no sentiment for it; but there was a great desire on the part of the people in Russia for the return of peace and order, of any orderly Government, and the danger was that if the Bolsheviki remained too long in power the Russian people might welcome Tsarism in preference to Bolshevism.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was the thought underlying the idea, that the Bolsheviki were themselves counter revolutionists, was it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And that by their excesses they might drive the people back to their old régime.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Exactly that. The democratic forces in Russia believed that the Bolsheviki movement was a counter revolutionary movement and that by its extremities it would drive the people into the arms of the other extreme.

Senator STERLING. And all of those brave and courageous men and women who have been fighting against Czarism and autocracy for many, many years, whom they did not murder, they drove from Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; most of them are either exiled now or in hiding. Some of them have been executed—those that I have mentioned.

Senator STERLING. They could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be claimed to be reactionaries or supporters of the Tsar's régime?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, they are known by their past lives and by their work as champions of Russian liberty. They have suffered for it; they have been imprisoned for it; they worked for it; and now all these men and women have been classed by the Bolsheviki as enemies of the Russian people.

Senator STERLING. The money probably came from Germany.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. At first they helped them. When they secured the printing presses themselves they needed no outside help.

Senator STERLING. Were you able to learn how much money Germany furnished Lenine when he came into Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; I do not know that; but at the time I was in Russia in 1917, when the July riots took place and the first attempt was made by the Bolsheviki to overthrow Kerensky, the minister of justice at that time made public a certain number of documents showing that large sums were transmitted to the Bolshevik leaders from Germany by way of Stockholm.

Senator STERLING. Did they conceal the fact that Germany was financing them?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I do not think the Bolsheviki concealed this. Their answer is, or has been, that they would have taken money for their purposes from anybody; but the fact is that they did take it from Germany.

Senator NELSON. When did you return from Siberia; last month?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; on the 20th of January.

Senator NELSON. By way of Vladivostok?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. By way of Vladivostok. I went as far as it was possible to go—to the Czecho-Slovak front in the Ural Mountains, at Ekaterinburg, the headquarters of the Czecho-Slovaks.

I traveled as far as the capital of the Ural, Ekaterinburg, the headquarters of the Czecho-Slovaks. I have written a report embodying my observations and impressions concerning the expected readjustment of Siberia with allied aid. Perhaps my conclusions with regard to the present situation may be of interest in connection with this investigation.

It seems to me that the time has come when the allies in Siberia should take an absolutely definite attitude. They should either leave Russia entirely and let the Russians fight their own battles while Russia is working out her own salvation, absolutely without interference on the part of any foreign power, or the allies should, first of all, come to a clear understanding and definite agreement with regard to Russia, and really help her to establish order and organize a democratic representative government through a national constituent assembly.

If the allies leave Russia to herself just now, there is hardly any doubt in the minds of those who know conditions in Russia that the world will witness in that country a series of unprecedented wholesale massacres, followed by years of intense strife and bloodshed, by years of terrible civil war, and by the spread of Bolshevism far beyond the boundaries of Russia.

If the allies determine upon a policy of active and effective aid they must create a situation under which the people of Russia could express themselves through a representative national assembly. Should the Russian people at such an assembly express themselves in favor of Bolshevik rule or in favor of monarchy, then there would be nothing else left to do but to let Russia have the government she wants—the government she deserves. But knowing Russia, having studied the temper of the Russian people, especially during my three visits to Russia since the revolution, I feel certain that the Russian people would not choose either of these extremes. I believe that the Russian people want true democracy, and the allies should assist them to establish such a democracy for the good of Russia and the other nations as well. The longer our uncertainty and inactivity in Russia continues, the nearer the restoration of a monarchy—and in Russia this means a reactionary, mediaeval tyranny—and the greater also the danger of Bolshevism, the fiercer the international bonfire which the Russian so-called communists have set ablaze.

Bolshevism in Russia is the natural child of Tsarism and Kaiserism. Just as Kaiserism and Tsarism destroyed themselves, so will Bolshevism destroy itself in the end; but meanwhile we have a situation in Russia where most dangerous and daring criminals, even murderers, surround themselves with the halo of heroism and idealism, calling themselves the saviors of the working classes, the benefactors and reformers of the world, while they commit savage crimes upon a huge scale.

Like Kaiserism, Bolshevism now seeks to dominate the world. Kaiserism and Bolshevism should have been fought simultaneously and ended in this war. If Bolshevism is not checked now intelligently, wisely and energetically, this great war will have served merely as the prelude to the next war, that of the Bolsheviki, of Spartacus, against the world.

The war for democracy has been fought and won, but so long as Russia is not readjusted the war is not over, no matter what the peace conference may decide. As long as Russia remains a storm center, the scene of bitter strife and civil war, the breeding place of a grave international menace, as long as 180,000,000 people are writhing in the agony of anarchistic and monarchistic Bolshevism, the war for the safety of the world and enduring peace is not yet concluded. For Bolshevism may gather strength, and, mobilizing the forces of hate, bitterness, and dissatisfaction, overrun the world if proper measures are not now adopted without delay to disarm it in time by a wise policy of social justice and equitable peace.

Unfortunately the interests of those who have sought to aid Russia were not identical. Some were interested in seeing Siberia weak and disorganized, and these financed and encouraged in various ways the conflicts of several factions against one another. Others, interested in a strong Russia, unfortunately employed the wrong methods to solidify and reorganize Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Bernstein, in the course of your statement you mentioned the fact that many of the people who had been in comfortable circumstances in the past were forced to work on the street, carry bundles, act as porters, and so on, whereas the Bolsheviki leaders were living in palaces, riding around in automobiles, and generally enjoying that kind of life which the very rich in the rest of the world are able to enjoy. Now, I read an article in the "Good Housekeeping Magazine," of February, this year, by one Harold Kellock, entitled "Aunt Emmy wants to know who is a Bolshevik, and why?" The editor states that he selected this author to write this article from a list of, I think, nine persons suggested to him by the Author's League of America, and that this author—

Senator NELSON (interposing). This league.

Senator WOLCOTT. No, this author, who was one of nine suggested by the Author's League to write on Bolshevism, got his information from Col. Raymond Robins, head of the American Red Cross mission in Russia; the report of Maj. Thomas D. Thatch, and Col. William B. Thompson, also of the mission; talked with Mr. Gregory Yarros, the Associated Press correspondent in Russia, recently returned, and various other correspondents; and numerous documents, official and semiofficial, that have come from Russia.

There are two paragraphs here which created upon my mind the impression that the leaders of Bolshevism are living in a very modest way, a very plain and simple way, and are not grasping the opportunity to give themselves all the luxuries and the comforts that the so-called capitalists have been able to enjoy. I want to read you these two paragraphs and see what you have to say as to their accuracy in describing the manner of life of these men:

Some remarkable personalities have been included among these commissars. They work for workmen's salaries 600 rubles (about $90) a month, with an extra allowance of 100 rubles for each dependent. Thus, Lenine, whose wife is employed in the department of education, gets 600 rubles; and Trotzky, who has a wife and three children, gets 900 rubles. Both Lenine, and Tchitcherin, the commissars for foreign affairs, come of old and well-to-do Russian families. Trotzky is the son of a prosperous Jewish merchant. In Petrograd Trotzky and his family lived in a little garret room in Smolny Institute, the Soviet headquarters.

Tchitcherin served as a diplomat under the Czar before he became a Revolutionary Socialist. While commissar of foreign affairs, in Petrograd, he lived in a shabby little lodging house in the working quarter, and members of the American Red Cross mission, who had occasion to call upon him at his office, would find him transacting affairs of state clad in a soiled sweater and baggy old trousers.

Your statement of the Bolshevik leaders riding around in automobiles and living in palaces arrested my attention, because of these paragraphs I have read from this district.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, I have seen the manner in which they ride about in Petrograd and Moscow; I saw the house in which Trotsky lived in Moscow, when he moved from Petrograd to Moscow. It was a very fine, luxurious house. I traveled in the train from Moscow where the commissaries were my fellow passengers. They spoke Russian and they spoke of the fact that only the day before, on our trip, they had to confiscate $1\frac{1}{2}$ poods—that is, 60 pounds—of chocolate for Commissar Trotsky.

Senator NELSON. Commissar who?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Trotsky.

Senator WOLCOTT. Sixty pounds of chocolate for Mr. Trotsky.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The fact that they have been using cars used by the royal family before is well known.

Senator WOLCOTT. And the automobiles.

Senator OVERMAN. And private cars on the railroad?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Private cars on the railroads, and automobiles.

Senator WOLCOTT. They confiscated these things?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. For themselves.

Senator WOLCOTT (continuing). These luxurious things, for the state. Taking them over for the people—for the state—in its essence amounted to taking them over for themselves?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. For themselves, when the children of Russia could not get any food.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, this article I have read, so far as it tends to create the impression that these are very plain, simple-living people running this Bolshevik thing over there, you would say is not correct at all?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, I would say that the statements are not correct; that they were probably given to him by people who were prejudiced in favor of the Bolsheviki.

It was impossible to draw any more than perhaps 150 rubles a month from a bank; that is, from the accounts that people had there before the banks were nationalized. It was necessary but to give from 15 to 20 per cent to the commissar in charge of those banks, and they could get any sum they wanted, and I was told that in one instance they got a larger sum than they had there by giving the commissar one-half of it.

Senator WOLCOTT. You could overdraw your account if you would divide the loot with the commissar?

Senator NELSON. When did you first go to Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. When did I first go to Russia? I came from Russia 25 years ago to America.

Senator NELSON. I mean since the war began.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Since the war I was in Russia. I went to Russia in May, 1917, when the Brest-Litovsk treaty was being consummated.

Senator NELSON. When Mr. Kerensky was in power?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. When Kerensky was in power. I came back in November and went again in February when the Lenine-Trotsky government—so-called government—was established.

Senator OVERMAN. You were born and raised in Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I was born and raised in Russia.

Senator NELSON. What part of Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. In the part called "White Russia" on the Dnieper and Dniester. I was educated there.

Senator NELSON. In your visits to Russia what points did you visit over there?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. During the Kerensky régime I was in Moscow and Petrograd and neighboring places there, and Finland, and I visited these places also during the Bolshevik régime.

Senator NELSON. Did you go anywhere into south Russia—in the Ukraine?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Not this time. I was in the Ukraine before the war. Now it is almost impossible to travel there. It is very difficult, I mean. Going from Petrograd to Moscow is achieving a great feat, because one takes his life into his hands just now.

Senator NELSON. Now, you came back on the Siberian Railroad in November or December last?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. I went to Siberia in the early part of September and left Vladivostok on the 24th of December.

Senator NELSON. How far west did you go on the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I crossed as far as the capital of the Urals, as far as it was possible to go.

Senator NELSON. As far as Moscow?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, I could not go to Moscow.

Senator NELSON. Did you go to Perm?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No. Perm was at that time in the hands of the Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. Coming back on the Siberian railroad, who were in possession of that railroad then, who controlled it from the Ural Mountains to Vladivostock?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Practically, the Czecho-Slovaks are in control of this railroad up to Irkutsk; and then the Japanese; and further down, the Americans.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Bernstein, have you observed, since your return, any propaganda in this country by the Bolsheviki, and the extent of it? Please give to us, in your own way, what you have on that.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; I have noticed that. There have appeared in a large number of newspapers and magazines statements of facts with regard to Russia, misrepresentations as to the beauty of the Bolsheviki régime, by men who were in Russia at about the same time I was; so that I know these things are not true, because I have seen. I was in Russia about the same time. I could speak to the people without the aid of an interpreter; I could read the press without the aid of an interpreter; I could speak to all representatives in various shades of the political parties, representatives of the political parties, so that I could get my information at first hand; and I find that there is a systematic campaign of misrepresentation in this country with regard to the Bolsheviki.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you ever interview Lenine?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; it was impossible to do that. He was hiding at the time—he was afraid to see representatives of the press.

Senator NELSON. Did you interview Trotsky?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I interviewed Trotsky on the day they ratified the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty.

Senator NELSON. By that treaty, among other things, they surrendered a lot of gold to Germany, did they not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. $200,000,000?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. More than that.

Senator NELSON. More than that?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Of the gold that belonged to Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And by the terms of the armistice that was to be given back?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And then they surrendered a lot of provinces?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes; they surrendered——

Senator NELSON. Finland and Esthonia and Livonia and the Ukraine, and nearly all of the Baltic shore except Petrograd, did they not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; they practically signed away the greater part of Russia.

Senator NELSON. Yes; and a part of the country down around the Caucasus?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. It was evident to you that that treaty was a complete give-away to Germany, was it not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. On the opening of the peace conference at Brest-Litovsk I wrote that the Kaiser was offering himself peace through the Bolsheviks. Later I found that that was so.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of any money coming to this country from the Bolsheviks for propaganda?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I do not.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Bernstein, what can you tell us about the specific acts of violence and terrorism?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, one of the acts that attracted perhaps more attention than the others, although acts of violence no longer attract attention in Russia, because they are common, everyday occurrences, was, first of all, the murder of two of the greatest revolutionary leaders, both of them members of the constituent assembly, both of them members of the constitutional democratic party, people who had devoted all their lives to the betterment of conditions in Russia, especially the betterment of the conditions of the peasantry, and the poor. These men were members of the Kerensky government. One was minister of finance, Shingaryov, a well-known physician, and he was first thrown into the prison of Peter and Paul, and then when he took sick he and his friend and associate, Kokoshik, also a member of the constituent assembly, were removed to the hospital. Shortly after they were removed to the hospital, Red Guards and sailors entered the hospital at night and while they were asleep they murdered them both, and took some of their clothing away. The press of the country that was still not suppressed began to protest, and people began to arrange demonstrations and protests. Lenin issued a statement that he wanted the thing investigated—this murder—and he wanted reports sent to him every day as to the progress of the case.

The fact is that in Moscow and Petrograd everybody knows who the murderers were; that they were soldiers and sailors who said that they did only what their leaders had ordered them to do; that they executed and put to death the enemies of the people because they were opposed to the Bolsheviks. Now, although everybody knows the names of the murderers, Lenin or Trotsky have not punished them in any way.

The second case that attracted attention all through Russia was this: There were six young men who were on the eve of leaving Russia to go to France to join the French Army to fight for the allies, and before their departure a banquet was given to these six men. They were to leave on the following day. At that banquet about 30 Red Guards broke into the house, and under the charge that they were counter revolutionists they took the six men out that night. The woman who was the mother of the girl that arranged this banquet, and who was a well-known Red Cross worker, said that she would go with them. She wanted to know what would happen to them. They allowed her to go to Smolny Institute, the headquarters of the Bolsheviki Government. Then they sent her away and the six men without any trial were executed—shot. Three of them were the sons of a French professor who had lived in Petrograd for 30 years, and was a teacher at one of the Petrograd universities, and his three sons were going to France to fight for France.

Senator NELSON. Another one of the acts of the Kerensky government was to pardon all criminals and all political exiles?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Not all criminals, but all political exiles.

Senator NELSON. And a lot of the criminals, too?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. You see at that time it was very difficult to say who were exiled for political reasons, so that a number of criminals found it to their advantage to claim to be political exiles, therefore many who had no connection with the revolutionary movement returned to Russia, and in many instances the consulates of the old Russian Government that still had no faith in the revolution, helped anybody to come there and sent them to Russia, hoping that they would disrupt Russia, and in that way the old Government would be able to return to power.

Senator NELSON. And this element that returned under this pardoning power became an element from which the Bolsheviki recruited their forces, became a part of the Red Army?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Now, the Red Army is perhaps the best paying proposition in Russia to-day. They pay so well to any one joining the Army and they pay each one for any city or any town that they would take, I mean they make an offer of a prize for acts of brutality and acts of courage of that kind, and many of the unemployed have joined the Army because that pays better than anything else in Russia just now.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that it was one of the mistakes of the Kerensky Government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The Red Army was not organized—

Senator NELSON. No; I mean opening the door to all of those people and bringing those elements back. Do you not think that was one of the things that undermined the Kerensky government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, there were many mistakes. Kerensky was a great idealist, and he could not believe that people who called themselves political exiles or revolutionists or socialists would come and overthrow the freedom which Russia had secured. But he was not prime minister at the time this happened. He was minister of justice, and as minister of justice he issued the first decree liberating the political exiles and prisoners in Siberia, and it was this decree that liberated Madame Breshkovskaya, who testified here, and others of that type, and he looked upon all as upon Madame Breshkovskaya.

Senator NELSON. He let out a lot of the criminals?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. He let out a lot of the criminals, but just as political offenders. You see, for instance, Trotsky was in this country and returned after the revolution to Russia. He was detained by the British authorities at Halifax. They suspected him; that is they believed that they had proof that he was going there to preach a separate peace. They detained him there for several weeks. Then there was a great movement in Russia asking for his liberation. They appealed to the minister of foreign affairs in Russia, who at that time was Miliukov, a constitutional democrat, a very conservative liberal, and it was he who asked the British Government to release Trotsky. I mean that Kerensky had no connection with this because he was minister of justice, while Miliukov was minister of foreign affairs.

Senator NELSON. But the outcome of liberating all those classes furnished some of the means that undermined the Kerensky government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; I think if all these political exiles had been allowed to return a year or two after the revolution, after the government had stabilized itself, Russia would be now a democratic and well-organized government.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know what has become of Kerensky?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I understand that he is in London now.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know what became of Gen. Nicholas, the grand duke?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Grand Duke Nicholas?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I understand he is somewhere in the South of Russia—in Crimea.

Senator NELSON. Down in the Caucasus?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Crimea.

Senator NELSON. Well, now, Mr. Bernstein, you are well posted about this, and I would like to hear your views as to what you think we ought to do in this country—you have stated it partly—what we ought to do both in respect to Russia and in respect to protecting our own people?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, of course, these are very difficult problems at the present moment. It would have been so easy, it seems to me, to adjust the problem of Russia about eight or nine months ago. So many mistakes have been made, not only by Kerensky, but by others, at the time Kerensky was in power.

But now I think the only way to adjust Russia is to create a situation by which Russia can express herself as a representative Government.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that it is the duty of the allies to help them to organize a constitutional government there?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think it is.

Senator NELSON. And do you not think that if we do not help them, chaos will reign for many years?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Absolutely.

Senator NELSON. And do you not think further, Mr. Bernstein, that unless something is done, Russia will be a sort of ground on which Germany can carry on her commercial and political propaganda? It will leave the door open for Germany to exploit Russia, unless we help them to restore a stable government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Absolutely. I think it is in the interest of the whole world that a representative and democratic form of government be established in Russia.

Senator NELSON. While Germany inspired this Bolshevik propaganda in Russia, and fed it in the first instance, it is now proving to Germany herself to be a kicking gun, is it not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. She is getting some of the benefit of the Bolshevik system?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. I said in 1917 at the Jersey Teachers' Convention, at Atlantic City, that Kaiser Wilhelm the Second was the greatest Bolshevik in history, and would be remembered as Kaiser Wilhelm the Last; that he was helping the organization of a movement that would eventually destroy him. Although, as I pointed out, I think that the horrible example they have set in Russia, by ruining Russia, has retarded in that way the revolution in Germany, and has also made it impossible for the extremists to get control of the Government there.

Senator NELSON. Now, Mr. Bernstein, as I understand it, about 75 or 80 per cent of the population of Russia are peasants—what you call peasants?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And their disposition on the whole is not friendly to the Bolshevik government, is it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; they are opposed to the Bolshevik government, but they are not actively and energetically opposed to it thus far for the reason that the Bolshevik government has not been able to collect any taxes from the peasants and therefore the peasants have not been actively opposing them. In one instance, in one of the Russian village, an attempt was made by Red Guards to collect a large sum from a community, and they held a meeting there and proposed to tax the peasants, but the peasants declined to give them the sum they wanted. Then the Red Guards were going to use force. The result was that the 30 men who came to collect the taxes never returned from that village. They were buried in the square.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that when the Bolshevik attempt to commandeer or requisition the grain and the provisions of the peasants, they will be against it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes. I mean that they can not continue very long. I think that if the Bolsheviks had known that there was a definite policy among all the civilized Governments of the allies that there should be a representative and democratic government in Russia, they would have collapsed long ago, but because they noticed a certain hesitation, and perhaps a lack of unity in the policy of the allies, they have gained strength in that way; and they have also gained strength by the fact that in Siberia, for instance, the government that was perhaps the most representative since the revolution, the government known as the all-Russian government, headed by a directorate of five, headed by the president, Avxentieff, who was also the president of the all-Russian council of peasants before that government, was overthrown by the dictator Kolchak.

Senator NELSON. He is an admiral?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Admiral Kolchak; yes. And the bolsheviks used that as an excuse for fighting Siberia and that element, by saying that they were fighting counter-revolutionary monarchistic elements. They say that the dictatorship of Kolchak is a monarchistic dictatorship, and therefore they have been able to gain strength among their followers by saying they are fighting for the revolution against monarchists.

Senator NELSON. What is the attitude of the Cossacks as a class?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The Cossacks were loyal to the all-Russian representative government. I am speaking now of Siberia. But recently because a dictator was chosen, this Admiral Kolchak, and because it was brought about in so clumsy and so unjust a way, the other Cossack leaders are eager to be dictators themselves in different territories which they control.

Senator NELSON. They are not friendly to the Bolsheviki government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, no; they are not.

Senator NELSON. That is what I mean. They are not inclined to join them?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; they are not.

Senator OVERMAN. Why is it, Mr. Bernstein, history shows always that in such conditions of tragedy and chaos there has always arisen some great leader who could rally around him enough of the patriots to overturn such a government. Why can not that be done by the Grand Duke, or some other man?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, you see Russia was oppressed for many centuries and there has been no room for real popular leadership, and when Kerensky came to power he was, perhaps, the most popular—he was the most popular—man at the time; but many blunders were made then even by the friends of Russia. Many people did not realize that the Bolsheviki would be in position to overthrow the provisional government. He did not realize it himself. At the time he was prime minister Trotsky was in prison, and he released him on 3,000 rubles bail, which is $300, about. And, of course, the Bolsheviki overthrew the Kerensky government on the eve of the trial of the Bolsheviki, at which all the documents were to be brought out connecting them with the German Imperial Government.

Senator OVERMAN. And feeling the sadness and recklessness among the people, they have about given up and surrendered to this Bolsheviki movement?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think, as far as I could judge, there is great bitterness against them; but the Russian people are exhausted and disorganized.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not suppose they have any arms?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. And the Bolsheviki groups had the assistance of experts in arms. They were helped by German officers to overthrow the Government, and they have succeeded since then in getting control of most of the firearms, machine guns, and so forth, and that is how they have been able to gain the control of Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. They have practically taken all the arms from the people?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. All the arms and ammunition are under the control of the Bolsheviki, are they?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes.

Senator NELSON. What is the feeling there—is there much feeling—against the Japanese in the country, and is there feeling against their troops coming into the country?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. There was a feeling of fear. That feeling has been there ever since the Russo-Japanese War, and they feared that the Japanese intentions were to establish themselves in Siberia. But, of course, that has been changed, especially since the armistice has been signed. I notice that if there were any other intentions on the part of Japan, Japan has changed her attitude toward Russia, and she has withdrawn.

Senator NELSON. And they have been withdrawing their troops?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They have been withdrawing their troops.

Senator NELSON. Back to Vladivostok.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I suppose in agreement with the allied policy.

Senator NELSON. What is the feeling toward our people there, among the people?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Where there is no artificially created hatred against America, such as has been spread by the Bolsheviki, America is the best-loved and most trusted of all countries, of all democracies in the world, in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that if Kerensky had had sense enough to keep Lenine and Trotsky out of the country, his government would have survived?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. It seems that that is so.

Senator OVERMAN. The Bolsheviki, you say, are spreading propaganda of hatred against this country?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. I have here a newspaper that was published by the Bolsheviki, in the German language.

Senator NELSON. Where?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Published in Petrograd, for distribution in the German trenches. It is both in the Russian and the German language. It is the organ of the international soviets of the soldiers' and workmen's and peasants' deputies, and the first page of it contains a vile attack on the President of the United States, especially in connection with his—

Senator NELSON. Have you a translation?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I have a translation which I can read.

Capt. LESTER. What is the date?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. January 16, 1918. On January 16 the Peace of the Nations, the official organ of the soviets of workmen, soldiers', and peasants' deputies, published in German for distribution in the German trenches an attack on President Wilson and his message of January 8—that is, the speech in which the 14 points were mentioned.

The paper first quotes the following from the President's speech:

It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conviction of what is right, of what is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind, and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe.

It then continues:

Thus spoke recently Citizen Woodrow Wilson, the Executive of American capital.

Senator NELSON. Of "American capital"?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. [Reading:]

Mr. Wilson is obliged to admit that the fight of the Russian delegation is undoubtedly animated with the sincere desire to obtain a general peace—

That is, with regard to the Brest-Litovsk peace conference—on the basis of national self-determination, "Not selfish aims, but the common weal of humanity" have the delegates of the soviet government in view, declares the President of the United States.

And he hastens to add that as a result the entire sympathy of the American people is with the "noble Russian revolution."

Of course, we do not for a moment entertain the slightest doubt concerning the true value of the compliments of the representative of the American stock exchange.

We have no faith in the friendship and the noble sentiments of the servitor of American capital, who "in the name of peace" furnished Europe—the allies as well as their enemies—for three years with all the means necessary for war and the annihilation of men.

We know that Wilson is the representative of the American imperialistic dictatorship, which strikes with imprisonment, forced labor, and the death penalty those workers and the poor who are opposed to the war and the ideas of government, Morgan, Rockefeller & Co.

In the words of the most notorious diplomatic rope dancer one finds without trouble the old mottoes of war to the bitter end, of exploitation under the mask of self-determination of nations and disguised demands for indemnities.

There is nothing surprising in this, for Wilson is just Wilson, and seeks to cover up with words his real opinions.

However that be, the admission of Mr. Wilson shows that the American bourse considers it not only necessary to reckon with the power of the Bolsheviks, but also, in any case, to make obeisance to it.

This naturally does not prevent the American ambassador to favor—perhaps even to-morrow—the participation of the agent of the American invasion in the counter-revolutionary conspiracy against the power of the Soviets.

But only if this is done not officially but publicly.

Publicly the American Government not only does not break with revolutionary Russia, the Soviets, but even makes avowals of sentiments of friendship for her and readiness for "a common fight for peace."

This admission has been reached through the fight of the revolutionary power of the Soviets, by that method the Governments have been forced to make public answer concerning their war aims and to count with the attitude of their own people.

At the same time the undoubted fact of the growth and consolidation of the power of the Soviets (the workers' and soldiers' deputies' councils) in Russia must needs deepen the contrast between the interests of the various imperialistic robbers.

There can be no doubt that in no case can America admit the exaggerated exertions (ambitions) of England or of Japan. The stubborn rivalry of America with the young imperialism of the East and the growing conflict with English hegemony appears, therefore, as one of the grounds for Wilson's attitude, which no doubt aims to set limits to the appetites of Japan and Britain.

Senator OVERMAN. You have thrown very much light on this subject and we are obliged to you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Just a moment. Do you know anything of the so-called policy of the nationalization of women by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes, I have heard their project. It was published in one of the newspapers.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is that a publication of what purports to be the official attitude of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That was the plan, but I think it was not adopted. I have seen that published as a project. I had that Saratov newspaper, but I have not seen that they adopted any of those suggestions.

Senator WOLCOTT. The newspaper to which you refer was published by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was an official organ, so to speak, was it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; it was. You see at the present moment no other newspapers are permitted to appear. First of all the Bolsheviks devised a novel way of killing newspapers. They killed them off by prohibiting anybody to advertise in newspapers that were not official organs of the Bolsheviks. Nobody under any circumstances is allowed to insert any advertisements in newspapers that are not official organs of the Bolshevik government. That is first. They have, secondly, been suppressing any organs of the press that appeared without advertisements but that in any way criticized or censured their activities.

Senator NELSON. They have suppressed all papers except Bolshevik papers?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And, practically, you can say that all the papers that are published now are their organs?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They are their own organs or organs that are servile to them.

Senator WOLCOTT. At any rate, they are organs that express views that do not displease the Bolsheviks.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They are organs that are not permitted to tell the truth as to what is happening at the present moment in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What is their position on the subject of religious freedom?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They tried to separate the church from the state, and they did it very crudely and very cruelly by attacking some of the priests during religious services; and later, when they saw there was a strong religious movement growing up in various parts of the country, that is opposed to Bolshevism, they changed their tactics and they ceased to enforce that decree against the church.

Senator NELSON. The Russian church was a state church?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The authorities of that church, the leading men in it, are not friendly to the Bolsheviks, are they?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; the church is absolutely unfriendly to the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that the church will be one of the rallying points in restoring order there?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The church could be one of the rallying points, I think.

Senator NELSON. Take the church and the Cossacks and the peasants.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think that the people, if only given an opportunity to express themselves, will express themselves so that everybody will know that they are opposed to the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Did you observe the operations of the Duma while it was in existence?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. During the Tsar's régime; yes. I interviewed many of the members of the Duma. I interviewed many of the members of the Tsar's cabinet at the time of the Duma in 1908, 1909, and 1911.

Senator NELSON. Did they exhibit any legislative capacity or legislative instinct—any capacity as legislators?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They did. They were, of course, hampered and interfered with at that time. I think that they have the ability to govern themselves. But, unfortunately, a situation has been created where a small group was helped by a great militaristic power to gain control over the majority of the people by armed force.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think that for the Russian people the best form of government would be a limited monarchy, something akin to that of Great Britain or the Scandinavian countries, with a responsible ministry. That is, they are hardly ripe and fit for a representative form of government such as we have, are they?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I think that Russia will readjust herself as a republican state or a republican federation of states, something along the line of the United States.

Senator NELSON. With a president?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. With a president.

Senator NELSON. You think that?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Oh, yes; I think that as soon as——

Senator NELSON. Or something like France?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Or something like France.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Razputin?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I did not know him, but I knew a great deal about him.

Senator NELSON. Was he really in the control of Germany, as is claimed?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, his influence over the Tsar was used by German agents in Russia, and in that way, of course, he exerted that German influence on the court.

Senator NELSON. Stürmer was a friend of the Germans?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. He was.

Senator NELSON. And Protopopov; he was a friend of Germany?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; he was advocating peace with Germany all along.

Senator NELSON. Even before the Kerensky government?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That was, to a great extent, the cause of the revolution.

Senator NELSON. Had not the Germans encamped on the Russian Government under the Tsar before the Kerensky revolution had really got control of it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. For more than half a century the most responsible men in the various government departments were Germans.

Senator NELSON. Germans or of German descent?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. I have read something, it seems to me, about spiritualism—that the people in the court believed in spiritualism.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; they were religious mystics; and the Russian Tsar, especially, believed in fortune-telling and spiritualism, and he had about six or seven who influenced the policies, both internal and foreign, of the government through these fortune-tellers and spiritualists.

Senator OVERMAN. I have read that that prevailed with the Kaiser, too. I do not know.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Perhaps. That is peculiar.

Senator OVERMAN. And it prevailed among many of the crowned heads of Europe.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. You referred to having seen the decree that was published in the Saratov newspaper?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Is the Izvestija, a newspaper published in Petrograd, the official organ of the soviet?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Have you seen the decree on the subject of women that was printed in that paper?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I have not read that.

Maj. HUMES. But that was its official organ?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The Izvestija is the official organ; yes.

Maj. HUMES. But you did not see published there the decree which provided that a girl having reached her eighteenth year is to be announced as the property of the state?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, I read the decree in the Saratov newspaper.

Maj. HUMES. I am speaking of the one in the Izvestija.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I have not seen it. I have not seen it in the original Russian.

Senator WOLCOTT. Referring again to the article in Good House-keeping, which I mentioned awhile ago, I want to call your attention to a photograph of two women who seem to be drinking soup or tea, or something. Are they Russian in their costume and the general makeup of that picture?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes; they look like Russian women.

Maj. HUMES. Did you ever see any cups like that in Russia?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Perhaps in some of the old women's homes they have those costumes, but, of course, I could not tell whether they are Russians or not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know Harold Kellock, who wrote this article?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I do not know him personally.

Senator WOLCOTT. If you will permit me, I just want to call your attention to certain things appearing in here. This committee primarily is interested in the appearance of anything in the nature of propaganda in this country in favor of Bolshevism. This article is headed by this note, which I assume is written by the editor:

We read a lot about Bolshevism in Russia, the mass of whose people we think of as being like these war refugees, but do we really know what it means—and whether we want it here? Mr. Kellock is thoroughly familiar with the subject and tells here just what it means to be a Bolshevik. Are you one—in your heart? Read before you answer.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, judging from the sources where he gathered his information, I would expect that he would advocate Bolshevism, because I understand that Mr. Raymond Robins was looked upon by Bolshevik leaders as the American representative or ambassador in Russia. Some of them have told me that they regarded him as such.

Senator OVERMAN. I wish you would repeat that with regard to Raymond Robins.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They looked upon him as the American ambassador to Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then they did not recognize Mr. Francis?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; they did not recognize Mr. Francis.

Senator WOLCOTT. One of the other sources of information he mentions here is Col. Thompson. Do you know anything about his relations with the Bolsheviki?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, Col. Thompson, I understand, favored at one time the Kerensky régime and was endeavoring to help it in every way possible, but when Kerensky was overthrown he remained in Russia for a short while, and then I understand he met some of the Bolshevik leaders, and he was willing to help them; and then he published a series of interviews here, which I understand were later brought out in pamphlet form translated into Russian, and I can tell you from my knowledge in Russia that the interviews published by Col. Thompson in this country and brought back to Russia have done more harm and have helped more to spread Bolshevism than that which has been done by any American advocating Bolshevism, because they said, "Here is what an American millionaire says about Bolshevism."

Senator WOLCOTT. It is a wonder they would believe a millionaire, he being a capitalist.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, a millionaire who is with them is a good millionaire.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know about Mr. Thacher, another source of his information?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I do not know.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know Mr. Gregory Yarros, the Associated Press correspondent in Russia, who is another source of his information?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I knew Gregory Yarros before he went to Russia. I have not read any of his articles about Russia, and I do not know what his views are, or whether his views are authoritative.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it your opinion that Raymond Robins is in sympathy with the Bolsheviki, from what you have seen and observed?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes, absolutely. I understand he has been advocating here the recognition of the Bolshevik government, under the name of the soviets.

Senator NELSON. Do you know anything of Albert Rhys Williams?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I understand that he says he is a representative of the Bolsheviki in this country.

Senator NELSON. How?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I understand he admits he is a representative of the Bolsheviki in this country.

Senator NELSON. He admits it, does he?

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, he held an official position over there, did he not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Was he employed by the Bolshevik government over there and did he hold a position under them?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. As far as I know, he was a member of their propagandist committee over there.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then, he was the head for a while of the Bureau of International Revolutionary Propaganda?

Senator NELSON. And he used to carry on the propaganda largely in this country, did he not?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you know from what source he gets his revenues?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. No; that I do not know.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are the industries going along and moving and busy in Russia now?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, they were not at the time I was there.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you speaking of last December, when you left?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. If you mean Siberia, or the part controlled by the Bolsheviks, I was in Petrograd and Moscow in May, and I am just coming back from the other part of Russia that has been liberated by the Czecho-Slovaks from the Bolshevik rule.

Senator WOLCOTT. But in the part of Russia under the control of the Bolsheviks, is it fair to say—

Mr. BERNSTEIN. The industries were at a standstill, practically.

Senator WOLCOTT. In this article I have referred to I find this statement, and the author is a bit cautious in the statement, I note. He says:

It is likely that most of the industries in Russia to-day are still under private control, but profits are limited by the government, and committees of workers share in the management.

The material thing I would like to know is whether they are running.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Judging from his sources of information, he could not get any later information than I had, because Col. Raymond Robins left Russia at about the same time that I did.

Senator WOLCOTT. And Col. Thompson had gone before him?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Had gone; yes, sir. So that he is simply making statements that I know are inaccurate.

Senator WOLCOTT. This statement is inaccurate?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, let me read you this paragraph:

The general soviet idea is to make the wealth and productivity of the nation the heritage of all the people instead of a few. Production is organized in the interest of the general needs, instead of for profit. To this end ambitious plans have been projected, such as harnessing the Volga and other rivers to furnish light and power for the cities. Extensive irrigation projects are planned. A systematic control of production has been introduced. Thus, instead of 40 different types of plows produced in Russia under individual enterprise, the number has been reduced to 7 normal types. Government purchase of necessary imports has been designed on a great scale to eliminate speculation. Half a billion rubles were voted last spring to purchase cotton from Turkestan. Similar appropriations have been made for the import of wool, farming implements, and textiles. The number of cooperative stores has increased remarkably. There were over 30,000 last fall.

That is a statement of plans and a statement of some existing facts. With respect to the things that are planned and projected, have any of them materialized, or is it simply all paper stuff?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. They have been publishing and making decrees every day. The newspapers are full of decrees, and the people stopped reading them, even though they could not tell whether some of these decrees affected them directly. They had plans, many of them, daily, but most of them have not been put into effect.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is all just intangible, filmy, imaginative stuff on paper?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes. Then, I know that the cooperative movement in Siberia, counting millions of members, was definitely opposed to the Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. He says here that the number of cooperative stores has increased remarkably and there were over 30,000 last fall. Do you know whether that is true or not—in the Bolshevik part of Russia, I mean?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, I do not know about last fall.

Senator WOLCOTT. Before that?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. It was not true in May, 1918.

Senator WOLCOTT. As a matter of fact, it could hardly be said that the stores were open at all, could it?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Well, the stores were open, but there was nothing in them to sell.

Senator WOLCOTT. They had been looted, had they not, to a very large extent?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Most of the shops and stores in Petrograd were closed, or they had no goods to sell.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me read you this paragraph:

The complete overturn of society in Russia has, beyond doubt, caused tremendous confusion, and much hardship and bitterness among the "nicest" people. By the "nicest" people we mean, of course, the well-to-do people. For many of them there is no immediate place in the new order. Many of them have, no doubt, actually starved because they could find no place. Of course, powerful elements of the old order have resisted the new régime, and there has been fighting and bloodshed. A revolution is always terrible. In our American Revolution some of our most respectable people—Tories—were chased into Canada and their property confiscated under a sort of mob rule. That sort of thing has been going on on a much larger scale in Russia. After the allied invasion began, the so-called Red Terror broke out in many places, as it did during the French Revolution after a similar allied invasion. An infuriated populace in many cases turned on all persons suspected of complicity in bringing in the foreign armies. How far the Soviet leaders were implicated in these outrages is a question.

Is it true that it was only the "nicest"—using the term in the sense of meaning only the well-to-do—people who were caused hardship and bitterness?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. I know this, that anybody who opposed the Bolshevik form of tyranny, whether he was a professor, or a teacher, or a laborer, or a millionaire, was classed among the bourgeoisie, and therefore an enemy of society and of the people; but if anyone was willing to cooperate with them, whether he was a millionaire or a member of the old Tsar's government, an agent provocateur, or a member of the secret police department that had been hounding the revolutionists, he was welcomed and taken into their midst and could work for them.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let us come to this specific question: The statement that this author has made here in this article is, according to your observation, by no means accurate?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. It is not accurate.

Senator WOLCOTT. I notice he draws a parallel here between the manner in which the bolsheviks treat these nicest people in Russia and the manner in which the American patriots of Seventy-six treated the Tories here. Evidently he is attempting to dignify the Bolshevik practices with respect to their opponents in Russia by leading the readers of this magazine in America to believe that that is just what our American patriots of Seventy-six did. Is that a fair comparison?

MR. BERNSTEIN. That is deliberate Bolshevik propaganda.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is what I am trying to get at; that that is Bolshevik propaganda.

MR. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Senator, that is utterly untrue. It was only the men in this country who sided with the British who were forced into Canada.

Senator WOLCOTT. Tories.

Senator NELSON. Yes, Tories; and not any of the American soldiers.

Senator OVERMAN. There were not any of them forced into Canada.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think, myself, that anybody who attempts to compare the practices of the American Revolutionary soldiers with the practices of the Bolsheviks and put them on the same level is a Bolshevik sympathizer.

Now, Mr. Bernstein, when did the so-called Red Terror break out in Russia?

MR. BERNSTEIN. The Red Terror broke out from the day the Bolsheviks seized the reins of government from Kerensky, in November, 1917.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you recall when the allies landed their troops up in the northern part of Russia, and also down at Vladivostok?

MR. BERNSTEIN. I think it was some time in August.

Senator WOLCOTT. Of 1918?

MR. BERNSTEIN. Of 1918.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was my recollection of the facts, but I wanted to check up my memory.

Senator NELSON. Senator, may I interrupt you? I understand this paper you are quoting from is one of the Hearst publications.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not know who publishes it. It is the Good Housekeeping Magazine.

Senator NELSON. It is one of the Hearst publications; is not that so?

MR. BERNSTEIN. I do not know.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not know who publishes it, but I know it sounds kind of Bolshevik to me. I want to quote this sentence here. Bearing in mind the historical sequence of events that I just brought out, from the beginning when the Red Terror broke out, and when the so-called allied intervention in Russia took place, it being in August, I want to read you this sentence:

After the allied invasion began—

I take that to mean after the allies landed their troops, in August, 1918, or thereabouts—the so-called Red Terror broke out in many places, as it did during the French Revolution after a similar allied invasion.

Did it not break out long before that?

MR. BERNSTEIN. Well, the Red Terror broke out immediately the Bolsheviks came into power, in November, 1917. Then it was in—tensified greatly after the assassination of Count von Mirbach, the German ambassador, and the Bolsheviki commenced their real Red Terror in order to avenge the German officials.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was about when?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. That was, I think, in July.

Senator WOLCOTT. 1918?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. June or July, 1918.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, that was still before the so-called allied intervention?

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. The significance of this paragraph—

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Was to connect it with the allied intervention.

Senator WOLCOTT. And, furthermore, to put it on a parallel with the breaking out of the Reign of Terror in France when the Austrians started their invasion of France in the time of the French Revolution under, as I recall it, the Duke of Brunswick, when the foreign armies came into France, in the French Revolution, and the French people rose to meet that foreign army. Then it was, as I recall my history, that the Marseillaise was born, in going to meet that host of foreign invaders. This sentence conveys to my mind the impression that what the Bolsheviki did there in that reign of terror was only parallel to what the Frenchmen did when they went to meet the Austrian invaders under the Duke of Brunswick, whereas the historical sequence of events was just the reverse, in that there was a reign of Red Terror in Russia, and then the allies came in after that in order to protect their supplies, and the invasion of the allies was not what incited the Red Terror at all.

Mr. BERNSTEIN. Not only that, but it was in response to a demand on the part of the better elements of the Russian people for help from the reign of terror which was going on there. The only thing is that perhaps the intervention was not sufficiently coordinated to be as effective as it might have been.

Senator WOLCOTT. I have not any doubt in my mind but what that article was written by a man who sympathizes with the Bolsheviki, and is trying to compare this Bolsheviki business with the great events of history which were real, genuine movements of real patriots—of America in the one case and France in the other.

Senator NELSON. Maj. Humes, what do you know about that paper?

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Moore, who represents the Hearst periodicals, testified that it was one of the magazines owned and controlled by Hearst, one of the Hearst magazines.

(Thereupon, at 12.50 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

(A letter printed in the New York Evening Post, referred to in the testimony of Mr. Bernstein, is here printed in the record, as follows:)

ARCHANGEL, September 10, 1918.

SANTERI NUORTEVA,
Fitchburg, Mass.

DEAR COMRADE: I deem it my duty to appeal to you and to other comrades over in America in order to be able to make clear to you the trend of events here.

The situation here has become particularly critical. We, the Finnish refugees who, after the unfortunate revolution, had to flee from Finland to Russia, find ourselves today in a very tragic situation. A part of the former Red Guardists who fled here have joined the Red Army formed by the Russian Soviet Government, another part has formed itself as a special Finnish legion, allied with the army of the Allied countries, and a third part, which has gone as far as to Siberia, is prowling about there diffused over many sections of the country, and there have been reports that a part of those Finns have joined the ranks of the Czecho-Slovaks. The Finnish masses, thus divided, may therefore at any time get into fighting each other, which indeed would be the greatest of all misfortunes. It is, therefore, necessary to take a clear position, and to make all the Finns to support it, and we hope that you, as well, over in America will support it as much as is in your power.

During these, my wanderings, I have happened to traverse Russia from one end to another, and I have seen the whole misfortune into which Russia now has fallen, and I have become deeply convinced that Russia is not able to rise from this state of chaos and confusion by her own strength and on her own accord. That magnificent economic revolution, which the Bolsheviks in Russia are trying now to bring about, is doomed in Russia to complete failure. The economic conditions in Russia have not even approximately reached a stage to make an economic revolution possible, and the low grade of education, as well as the unsteady character of the Russian people, make it still more impossible.

It is true that magnificent theories and plans have been laid here, but their putting into practice is altogether impossible, principally because of the following reasons: The whole propertied class—which here in Russia, where small property ownership mainly prevails, is very numerous—is opposing and obstructing; the officials and the educated classes are obstructing; technically trained people and specialists necessary in the industries are obstructing; local committees and sub-organs make all systematic action impossible, as they in their respective fields determine things quite autocratically and make everything unsuccessful which should be based on a strong, coherent, and in every respect minutely conceived system—as a social production should be based. But even if all these, in themselves unsurmountable, obstacles could be made away with, there remains still the worst one—and that is the workers themselves.

It is already clear that in the face of such economic conditions the whole social order has been upset. Naturally only a small part of the people will remain backing such an order. The whole propertied class belongs to the opponents of the Government, including the petty bourgeoisie, the craftsmen, the small merchants, and profiteers. The whole intellectual class and a great part of the workers are also opposing the Government. In comparison with the entire population only a small minority supports the Government, and, what is worse, to the supporters of the Government are rallying all the hooligans, robbers, and others, to whom this period of confusion promises a good chance of individual action. It is also clear that such a régime cannot stay but with the help of a stern terror. But, on the other hand, the longer the terror continues, the more disagreeable and hated it becomes. Even a great part of those who from the beginning could stay with the Government and who still are sincere, social democrats, having seen all this chaos, begin to step aside, or to ally themselves with those openly opposing the Government. Naturally, as time goes by, there remains only the worst and the most demoralized element. Terror, arbitrary rule, and open brigandage become more and more usual and the Government is not able at all to prevent it. And the outcome is clearly to be foreseen: the unavoidable failure of all this magnificently planned system.

And what will be the outcome of that?

My conviction is that as soon as possible we should turn toward the other road—the road of united action. I have seen, and I am convinced that the majority of the Russian people is fundamentally democratic and wholeheartedly detests a reinstitution of autocracy, and that therefore all such elements must, without delay, be made to unite. But it is also clear that at first they, even united, will not be able to bring about order in this country on their own accord; I do not believe that at this time there is in Russia any social force which would be able to organize the conditions in the country. For that reason, to my mind, we should, to begin with, frankly and honestly rely on the help of the Allied Powers. Help from Germany can not be considered, as Germany, because of her own interests, is compelled to support the Bolshevik rule as long as possible, as Germany from the Bolshevik rule is pressing more and more political and economic advantages, to such an extent even that all of Russia gradually is becoming practically a colony of Germany. Russia thus would serve to compensate Germany for the colonies lost in South Africa.

A question presents itself at once whether the Allied Powers are better. And it must be answered instantly that neither would they establish in Russia any socialistic society. Yet the democratic traditions of these countries are some surety that the social order established by them will be a democratic one. It is clear as day that the policy of the Allied Powers is also imperialistic, but the geographical and economic position of these countries is such that even their own interest demand that Russia should be able to develop somewhat freely.

The problem has finally evolved into such a state of affairs where Russia must rely on the help either of the Allies or Germany; we must choose, as the saying goes, "between two evils," and things being as badly mixed as they are the lesser evil must be chosen frankly and openly. It does not seem possible to get anywhere by dodging the issue. Russia perhaps would have saved herself some time ago from this unfortunate situation, if she had understood immediately after the February revolution the necessity of a union between the more democratic elements. Bolshevism undoubtedly has brought Russia a big step toward her misfortune, from which she cannot extricate herself on her own accord.

Thus there exists no more any purely Socialist army, and all the fighting forces, and all those who have taken to arms, are fighting for the interests of the one or the other group of the great Powers. The question therefore finally is only this: in the interest of which group one wants to fight. The revolutionary struggles in Russia and in Finland, to my mind, have clearly established that a Socialistic society cannot be brought about by the force of arms and cannot be supported by the force of arms, but that a Socialistic order must be founded on a conscious and living will of an overwhelming majority of the nations, which is able to realize its will without the help of arms.

But now that the nations of the world have actually been thrown into an armed conflict and the war, which in itself is the greatest crime of the world, still is raging, we must stand it. We must, however, destroy the originator and the cause of the war, the militarism, by its own arms, and on its ruins we must build, in harmony and in peace—not by force, as the Russian Bolsheviks want—a new and a better social order under the guardianship of which the people may develop peacefully and securely.

I have been explaining to you my ideas expecting that you will publish them. You over in America are not able to imagine how horrible the life in Russia at the present time is. The period after the French Revolution surely must have been as a life in a paradise compared with this. Hunger, brigandage, arrests, and murders are such everyday events that nobody pays any attention to them. Freedom of assemblage, association, free speech, and free press is a far-away ideal, which is altogether destroyed at the present time. Arbitrary rule and terror is raging everywhere, and, what is worst of all, not only the terror proclaimed by the Government, but individual terror as well.

My greetings to all friends and comrades.

OSKAR TOKOL.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The subcommittee reconvened, pursuant to the taking of the recess, at 2.45 o'clock p. m.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Call your next witness.

Maj. HUMES. The next witness is Mr. Kryshtofovich.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THEODOR KRYSHTOFOVICH.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. What is your name?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. My name is Theodor Kryshtofovich.

Maj. HUMES. Mr. Kryshtofovich, when did you leave Russia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I left Russia on the 15th of December last.

Maj. HUMES. Where were you residing in Russia up to that time?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. In Petrograd.

Maj. HUMES. Have you been in Petrograd during the whole period of the Bolshevik reign?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; I was in Petrograd for the last three years.

Maj. HUMES. In what quarter and among what class of people were you living in Petrograd?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Before the Bolshevik reign I was working in the ministry of agriculture, and since the Bolsheviks took the power in their hands I resigned, because I could not work with them. They invited me to a number of times, but I did not agree with them and quit my work. I always worked among peasants, teaching them agriculture, and mostly introducing American machinery, American methods, American seed, and so on. Of course, my work among these peasants was in the summer time. In the winter time my work was mostly of a literary nature, writing pamphlets on agricultural subjects.

I always was and am still a poor man. One of my friends asked me once: "Do you know, Mr. Kryshtofovich, why you have no money and never will?" I told him it would be very interesting to me to know why, and he told me it was because I was always busy with other people's affairs and neglecting my own in my effort to help them. For the last six years I lived in Petrograd in very modest apartments—three little rooms—almost outside the city limits, on the outskirts, among workmen. This was a large house inhabited exclusively by workmen, so my testimony will be that of a man who knows peasants and who knows workmen.

Senator OVERMAN. You have lived among the workmen and the peasants?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; and, besides, I am a man who does not belong to any political party in Russia. Mr. Simmons told you that we have in Russia seven or eight political parties. Perhaps he counts only the largest of these parties, but we Russians count 25 of them.

Senator OVERMAN. Twenty-five different political parties?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Twenty-five political parties.

Maj. HUMES. Now, will you just relate in your own way what the conditions were in Petrograd at the time you left and for the months preceding your departure, and then tell the committee how you succeeded in getting out of Petrograd?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir. Of course, as an agriculturist, I was mostly interested with the question of land, production of food-stuffs or their distribution, and so on. So perhaps you will permit me to begin with these questions.

The government of Kerensky—the so-called provisional government—began to introduce some land reforms which from the American standpoint were very simple. They said: "You see this land? All this land is yours. If you see a large landowner, do not care that this land belongs to him. Take it, divide it, and own it." But that was under Kerensky.

When the Bolsheviks took possession of the government, they began to enlarge and deepen these maxims. For instance, Lenine said:

"Rob the robber. You peasants, you workmen, were robbed by the wealthy people; now get back everything that you have lost; take everything you see and do not care about what you do." So, I was a witness that workmen have taken the factories and I have read in newspapers and have heard from other people, that peasants have taken the whole land. According to the statistical data, land owners had in their possession about 50,000,000 desyatin of land. That means 150,000,000 acres. As we have about eighty or eighty-two or eighty-five million peasants this land, if divided among them, would give less than two acres to a man. So, when they had divided this land they were not much richer than they were before, and, as the land of the land owners is better than theirs, because the land owners put manure on it, improved it by using better agricultural methods, the peasants did not want their own land, but began to work the land of the land owners, and the result of it was that the grain was not increased, and the crops decreased.

Our best men say that we need in Russia better agricultural methods to help our people. They say that we need an organization of emigration to Siberia; we need to improve our waste lands by drainage and irrigation, and only in this case would our peasants be richer.

As to workmen, after they had taken factories, these factories were not in better condition than they were before, but in a worse condition, because they had very primitive ideas about credits, about the system of buying raw materials and so on. I can cite you an instance of a factory which was given to workmen, or, as they say, "nationalized." The managers asked the workmen to give them money to buy raw materials, and they answered that when the capitalists were running it they had credit, and demanded that they get credit, too. They were told that the capitalists had credit, but they had no credit and would have to pay money; but they did not want to give money; they wanted to run this factory without money.

Senator OVERMAN. What kind of a factory was that of which you speak?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I am speaking about a metal-working factory.

Senator OVERMAN. I see.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. So they had to buy iron, and steel, and coal, and everything.

Senator OVERMAN. What became of that factory? They could not get any money; what became of it?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I will tell you. That is not an exception, but just one among a very large number.

Maj. HUMES. Is that factory running now? Is it closed or running?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. It is closed, like many others.

Maj. HUMES. It is closed?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Because when the Bolsheviks took possession of everything, they offered to turn the factories and everything over to the workmen and allow them to get returns on them. But they had no credit; they had no money; they had no good managers; and the engineers refused to work with them, because the men that were put in as heads of these factories by the Bolshevik government were not specialists. They ordered the engineers to do so-and-so, and the engineers answered that it was impossible. They were specialists and knew how to do it, and told them they could not do it their way. So they quit; they did not want to work with the Bolsheviks. For this action they were put in prison, and so on, and so on. I shall talk about this afterwards, but the facts were these: When the factories could not be run under the new conditions, of course the workmen began to protest, and they said: "We can not sustain such a government as ours." Then the government began to move these factories from Petrograd to other cities; sent machinery there; sent raw materials and workmen, so that the workmen in Petrograd would not be in opposition to them. They wanted to clear this atmosphere of counter-revolutionists, as they say.

Senator STERLING. Are you speaking now of the Kerensky government as doing these things?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No, no, no. I am talking of the Bolshevik government. The Kerensky government was of very short duration, and they began only what the Bolsheviks continued. It is a very interesting fact that while both parties are socialistic parties many socialists now deny that Bolsheviks are socialists. They say Bolsheviks are not socialists, they are communists. While they branded themselves as communists they were socialists and they continued only what Kerensky began.

Senator STERLING. Then, Kerensky began the work of establishing the factories outside of Petrograd?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No, no, no.

Senator STERLING. I understood you to say that a while ago.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No; this is the work of the Bolsheviks. They did not want to establish factories outside of Petrograd, but they wanted to evacuate factories in order that they might not have to give up their positions in Petrograd to the workmen, and one after another the factories were closed, and instead of getting 100,000 people against Bolshevism at Petrograd, they disseminated them through the whole northern part of Russia and they were not of great opposition in that way. There are some factories there running now. For instance, there is one factory producing mostly war material, but now they have tried to change it into agricultural implements and other machinery. I do not know whether they have been successful. Anyway, there are thousands of workmen yet in Petrograd, although the population of Petrograd has decreased during the past two years from 3,000,000 to 1,200,000 people, and, of course, all these people must be fed.

But, as I told you, the peasants do not produce much foodstuff now; and another thing, they do not want to give foodstuffs to the large cities. They say, "We do not need money any more. We have enough of money; but we want shoes and clothes and nails and machinery. You give us anything of this kind and we shall give you grain and flour instead." But, of course, the Bolsheviks have nothing of this kind, nothing is produced, and what is produced is produced under the condition that they can not sell it right away.

Workmen are now getting, instead of 60 or 70 rubles a month, 400, 500, and 600 rubles; but notwithstanding that, their work is only one-fifth or one-sixth of what it was before. It is a very interesting fact.

Senator STERLING. Why is that—on account of the shorter hours?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No; because they simply do not want to work for themselves. They are the masters of the position, and they work as much as they want, and they do not want to work well. There was a question at one time of introducing the Taylor system into Russian factories, but every time the workmen refused even to listen to it, so Petrograd, and, as I have heard, Moscow, have very little products to give the people.

The government, to get these products, devised this system: They offered the workmen the right to choose the best men among themselves, say, 40, 45, or 50 people, and the government gave them 25 or 30 guards, and they make a so-called food detachment, and this food detachment is given a special train and they go through the country and offer to the peasants 17 rubles for a pood of grain—a pood is 36 American pounds—but the peasants answer, "We do not want money. We want something like shoes; and, besides, we can sell this grain for more than 17 rubles." The detachment began to take grain by force. They searched the peasants' houses and took their grain and flour and anything they could find, except a small quantity that they left for them to live on. Then they brought this grain to Petrograd and Moscow and divided it into two parts, and one went to the government and one went to the workmen of these factories. Besides, the government sends detachments of their own, composed of the Red Guards, and they are doing the same work, asking, first, to buy for money, and then taking by force and paying 17 rubles a pood.

Senator STERLING. Seventeen rubles a pood?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes; 17 rubles a pood.

Senator STERLING. How much would that amount to when you consider the present depreciation of the paper ruble? How many cents in our money would it be a pood?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. The depreciation of Russian money is a very complicated question. For instance, the factory workmen and Bolsheviks that get, instead of 60 rubles, 600 rubles, do not feel that they can count on this depreciation, but people who could spend before 100 rubles, and are spending now 100 rubles, they have not 100 rubles but 1,000 rubles. But if you want to know, I think it is $1 for 36 pounds.

Senator STERLING. You think that these 17 rubles would be equivalent to $1 for the 36 pounds?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Would you say that, with the present depreciation of the paper ruble, it would amount to that?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes; I think so; about seven times what it was before. I am not a good financier, and perhaps I am mistaken.

Senator STERLING. Do the peasants as a rule refuse to sell for that amount of 17 rubles a pood?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; as a rule. They often refuse to sell at 40 and 50 rubles a pood, and I have told you just now why. The result of all these politics and policies and all this social government is this. On December 13, before I started from Petrograd—

I started on the 15th—1 pound of potatoes sold for 6 rubles. The Russian pound is 14 ounces, and the American pound is 16 ounces; so 1 pound of potatoes was sold for 6 rubles on Friday. On Saturday it was $7\frac{1}{2}$ rubles, and on Sunday, when I started from Petrograd, it was 10 rubles for 1 pound of potatoes. Now, I will tell you other prices.

Senator STERLING. That would be about $10 in our money, would it not?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No; $5.

Senator STERLING. I mean $5.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes; for 1 pound of potatoes, 4 medium-sized potatoes, $5. I am not a liar. I will tell you many other prices, because they were standing in these bread lines, and I was among them myself. I was buying this stuff on the market, and I know prices very well. We were given bread on cards according to the categories. All the people were divided into four categories. The first category was composed of workmen, the second was the families of workmen, the third category was professional men, like doctors, bankers, lawyers, and so on.

Senator WOLCOTT. School-teachers?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; the first time, school-teachers. But I will tell you afterwards. The first category was composed of capitalists; and every one who had under him some working people, one or two or more, as, for instance, a small storekeeper who had one or two clerks, went into the first category; and lately, when I started from Petrograd, teachers and professors were assigned to the first category; and the first category received half a pound of bread a day—black bread. White bread we did not see for two years.

The second category received a quarter of a pound; the third category one-eighth of a pound; and the fourth category one-sixteenth of a pound, if bread was in sufficient quantity. Otherwise, the first category received nothing except two small herrings. But if you would go to buy bread in the open market, the price for bread was from 18 to 20 rubles a pound. When you bought bread on the cards you paid from 25 to 30 rubles, but in the open market you had to pay from 18 to 20 rubles. Rye flour was sold for from 22 to 23 rubles a pound.

Senator STERLING. What kind of bread was it that you bought for from 18 to 20 rubles?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Black bread; rye bread. I told you that we did not see white bread for two years; and if white flour came to Petrograd—one carload or two carloads—they were taken by the Red Army men. They did not go to the other people. Sugar was 80 rubles a pound.

Senator STERLING. Per pound?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Per pound.

Senator WOLCOTT. That would be $40.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Senator STERLING. If the ruble was worth as much as it used to be.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes. Tea was selling for 100 rubles a pound; butter, 60 rubles; pork, 50 rubles; peas, 22, 23, and 24 rubles; eggs, 4 and 5 rubles apiece—for one egg; milk $2\frac{1}{2}$ -glass bottles, 9 rubles.

Senator WOLCOTT. Two and one-half glass bottles?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; 9 rubles.

Senator WOLCOTT. How much is that—a quart, a pint, or what?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I think it is half a pint or something like that. Salt fish, like herrings and so on, sold for from 7 to 9 rubles a pound. Salt, ordinary table salt, 3 rubles per pound. Such things like rice or macaroni we did not see for one year and a half.

Senator STERLING. How about beans?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No beans, no peas, nothing of that kind. The time that I started from Petrograd you could eat only a little bread, salt fish, and drink a little tea, and that is all.

Senator STERLING. How about beans and peas? Are they not produced in considerable quantities in Russia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. They are produced, but the peasants, generally, do not want to give them to this government. We are producing beans and peas and lentils and rice, and everything, because in the Caucasus we have large rice fields.

Senator STERLING. Were the peasants successful in many instances in keeping the grain they produced from the Red Guard and others who were out searching for it?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Well, of course, Russia is a very large country; and although the Bolsheviks are now only in one-quarter of European Russia, in my estimation, under the government are from 12 to 13 governments, because in these houses people are fighting with them, like the Ukrainian people and the Don people and Cossacks of the Caucasus and so on, and the northern part of Russia under the Bolsheviks comprises almost one-quarter of the whole of Russia, with from 12 to 13 governments.

Senator STERLING. What I want to get at is, would the peasants resist by force the searching parties that went out to get their grain or other produce, or were they successful in concealing it or hiding it, sometimes?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Well, sir, our people are a very good-natured people. They begin to protest only when they can not bear conditions any more. Lately they began to protest, and they even gathered together and tried to make some opposition, but they were without arms. When I shall talk about intervention it will be the end of my talk. Sometimes they say the Russian people can not oppose the handful of Bolsheviks because they have no arms. That is the only reason. They tried to protest and they tried to conceal in vain. If a food-searching detachment or a food-searching party comes to some village they can not conceal. How can they conceal? If you put grain into the earth it will rot. They have no special places to conceal it, and the grain is taken, but it does not help much, as you can see from my description of the prices. It does not help much, because besides this condition transportation is in a fearful condition, too. I told you about getting these products in, and about some distribution, but the pity is that the people in this government are completely inexperienced. Sometimes they bring in some vegetables, they bring in a load of vegetables into Petrograd, but they do not know how to keep them, and very often carloads of potatoes and cabbage are frozen and spoiled or rot, and that is the condition when a pound of potatoes is selling for 10 rubles. Carloads of potatoes are spoiled on account of the ignorance of these people, who do not know what to do with these potatoes. They have had no experience. In Switzerland and in France the refugees were talking and talking and writing socialistic pamphlets, who did not know how to keep potatoes or cabbage. Well, sir, it is a very interesting thing.

Senator STERLING. I know it is.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. And, besides these refugees, most of the people that are governing Russia now are Jews. I am not against Jews in general. They are a very capable and energetic people, but, as you Americans say, the right man must be in the right place. Their place is in the commission houses, in banks, in the offices, but not in the government of a fine agricultural country. They do not understand anything about agriculture, about production, about keeping materials, and about distribution. They do not know anything about those things at all.

Senator WOLCOTT. You mean those that are in charge of the Bolsheviks, do you not?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I am talking about the Bolsheviks; because, if you take our Bolshevik government, Lenine is a Russian and all these constellations that are turning around this sun are Jews. They have changed their names. For instance, Trotsky is not Trotsky, but Bronstein. We have Apfelbaum, and so on, and so on.

Senator OVERMAN. Are you a Russian?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I am a south Russian; yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Why did you leave Russia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I came back.

Senator OVERMAN. You live in this country?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Your home is here?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. How long have you lived in this country?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I have lived in this country for 16 years, and my family has been living here for 24 years. We have a farm in California and I came here for a few days, and expect to go to California and humbly ask for citizenship, because I think I have all the rights for it.

Senator STERLING. When were you last in Russia? You may have stated it at the beginning of your examination, but I was not here.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. On the 15th of December I left Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you have any trouble getting out?

ciary commission and get another certificate that I am not under their jurisdiction for any crime, and return again to the local police station, they put a stamp on it, and there is a man who puts another stamp on it, and then I go to the minister of foreign affairs and ask for this passport, and in from two weeks to two months I may get it, and I pay for it 40 rubles; and any time from two weeks to two months it is given to me, and for it I paid 40 rubles. Then I go to the minister of the interior and ask permission to cross the frontier, and it is given to me. Then, when I wanted to go abroad I was told that I must go to the military control, and in the military control I found a young Jew, about 22 or 23 years old, and he asked me what I wanted. I told him I wanted to go abroad, and he told me I could not go. I told him I had permission from the minister of foreign affairs and from the minister of the interior, and asked him why he did not want to give me permission. He said: "I will not give you permission; I will not give anyone permission." I told him I knew of other people who were going abroad, and that there was a steamship going to sail the next day from Petrograd to Stockholm, but he said: "I will not allow any steamship to go there."

Well, I went to the steamship office and asked them whether their steamer would sail the next day, and they told me it would. I asked them if it would carry passengers, and they told me it would; and at the same time one little man, a Jew, came in and asked for a ticket and it was given to him. I asked him if he was going to Stockholm, and he said: "No; I am buying a ticket for another man." "But," I said, "how about getting permission of the military control?" "Oh," he said, "I shall get it." "But the office is closed. It is now 1 o'clock, and the office is open only until 12." "Oh," he says, "I shall get permission." I asked him if he could get permission for me, and he looked at me and said, "No, sir; I can not." It was fortunate that I did not get a ticket on that steamer, because I read in the newspapers afterwards that only 10 passengers were on this steamer. They were Bolsheviks who were going there for some reason; and in Finland, at Helsingfors, this steamer was detained and all these people were taken from the steamer and put in jail.

Maj. HUMES. How did you get out? Go on and finish the story. How did you succeed in getting out?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Well, sir, when I obtained this passport I went to the Swedish consulate; and I have good friends here in America. They asked permission from the American Government for me to come here, and the Swedish consulate received this permission from Washington, and I was given the assistance of the Swedish and Norwegian consulates; but I could not cross the Norwegian border without permission of the military officials, so I tried to escape without permission, and I found an organization that was doing this business. I paid 1,500 rubles for that. From the station Beloostrov I was taken by two men. I had very little with me—only this suit which I am now wearing and four changes of underwear. One man took my little grip—another one was with me—and we crossed the river, which is the border line between Russia and Finland; and in Finland the three of us were taken by White Guards. They were very kind to us and helped us in every respect.

From Finland we went to Stockholm, and from Stockholm to Norway, and from Norway here.

Senator OVERMAN. Then, there are organizations there which, for a consideration, get people out of the country?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir. This system was doing a nice business. It cost me 1,500 rubles. There were three of us, so we paid 4,500 rubles, but on Saturday there were eight people and they had to pay 12,800. There were four people in this organization, but the head one has been shot by the Bolsheviks.

Senator STERLING. Was that the regular charge, 1,500 rubles?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; that was the charge in this organization, but there was another organization that charged 3,000 rubles. It was a little more complicated and I did not want to use it. This was more risky, because, while Red Guards who were on duty at the border were bribed, sometimes a new Red Guard would come on and he would shoot the people. However, this river is a very narrow one, so, while a person risked much while crossing, he was exposed but two or three minutes.

There is another class of people, however, that can not escape, who do not know where to go, who have no means to pay these organizations, and so on. They are staying in Petrograd and most of them are dying from hunger. It is not a fable; it is not insinuation; it is a fact. I have seen on the Nevsky Prospect—it is something like your Pennsylvania Avenue—a girl of 17 or 18 years, very thin and emaciated, crying, "I want to eat, I want to eat, I want to eat," and she was given little pieces of bread, and so on. But the people could not give much; they had none themselves. Many people are lying on the sidewalks and asking for some bread, but nobody can give them much, only a piece as large as the end of your little finger. Even the first category get only half a pound a day. These people are mostly getting thinner and thinner and thinner. Then they are taken to hospitals, but even in the hospitals they can not be fed, because the hospitals do not receive much food. So the people are dying. You see on the streets not a procession, but simply a wagon with three, four, five, or six coffins placed crosswise on each other going to cemeteries. Lately a decree was issued providing that corpses were the property of the government, and prohibiting relatives from burying their dead. Only the government can do that. This decree was issued because they have no religious ceremonies with burials. I was there in Petrograd at the time this decree was issued.

Senator OVERMAN. They had no legal ceremony for the dead at all?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes. They did not want it.

Senator OVERMAN. How are you regarded, as a Bolshevik or as a Red Guard?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. What, sir?

Senator OVERMAN. How were you regarded when you lived there?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Well, sir, in my opinion this Bolshevik system is comprised of three parties. One party can be termed lunatics, another party—

Senator WOLCOTT. Termed what?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Lunatics.

Senator WOLCOTT. Lunatics?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Another party are swindlers, and a third party is a two-legged herd.

Senator WOLCOTT. What?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. A two-legged herd.

Senator WOLCOTT. A two-legged herd?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir. You asked me my opinion. This is my opinion—a two-legged herd, because other animals have four legs and they make a herd, but these ones have but two.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are two-legged beasts, I suppose.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. A two-legged herd. That is my opinion, I say.

Maj. HUMES. Well, as they classify the citizens of Russia, did they treat you as belonging to the bourgeoisie, or what class did they put you?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. My position was an exceptional one. As I told you, I lived in a house where workmen lived. Across the street there was about 60 acres of vacant land. The inhabitants of our house wanted to rent that land from the owner and convert it into a vegetable garden, because, as I told you, vegetables were very, very expensive.

As I am an agriculturist they invited me to show them how to plow this land, how to plant their vegetables and take care of them. So I did, and I worked in this garden with them, and we had a large crop of vegetables. When other people, for instance, at that time, in September, bought cabbage from us, we charged them $2\frac{1}{2}$ rubles or 3 rubles a pound, while we sold them to ourselves at 1 ruble 90 kopecks. Therefore, they did not look on me as a bourgeois, as a capitalist, because they knew that I was living in a very modest apartment with but little furniture. Almost all my clothes and other things were taken in October by anarchists, so I did not have very much. They had taken everything I had.

Maj. HUMES. You say you rented that land?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. I thought all the land was nationalized. From whom did you rent it?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. We rented it from the owner; but the Government did not agree with us, and one morning they came to us and told us not to pay rent to the owner because that land belonged to the Government and they would not allow us to pay this money to the owner of the land.

Maj. HUMES. But they collected the rent, all right? They collected the rent themselves?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. So, I say they did not look on me as a capitalist or anyone that could harm them. And besides, I was acquainted with many of these people who were living in our house and everyone knew that I did not belong to any party at all; and when asked why I did not work with the Government I always answered that I was 61 years old, had worked all my life, and being tired, wanted to retire; but I was looking mostly to the time when I could escape from this—those socialistic governments. I could not do it. I had a little money in the bank. It was enough at that time to get to the United States, but one morning it was confiscated and I was allowed to draw only, for the first time, 150 rubles, then 250 rubles, and finally it was increased to 500 rubles; so, I drew them little by little, had to spend them for food, and finally had no money at all, and no possibilities to get here. However, fortunately, one of my American friends loaned me money to get away from there.

Senator WOLCOTT. How many people were left in Petrograd when you left there, did you hear it stated?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. In what direction?

Senator WOLCOTT. How many people were in Petrograd; what was the population of Petrograd when you left?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, yes. It was 1,200,000 instead of 3,000,000 as it was two years ago—only one-third left, because they had nothing to eat; and another thing, they are all terrorized. Terror is not an invention, gentlemen, it exists. I had an acquaintance of mine living in the same house, on the same floor, and one Sunday afternoon I went to visit him. He was clerk in a bank—a bank inspector—and I stayed there until 9 o'clock in the evening and then I said goodnight. As I opened the door to leave I saw seven or eight people, Red Guards, and the secretary of our house committee, who was with them, told me to go home quickly and I went.

Senator STERLING. Were these Red Guards armed?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; yes, sir. This man was questioned from 9 o'clock in the evening until 2 o'clock in the morning, and was then taken and put in jail, and was kept in jail. When he and his wife asked the Government why he was arrested and why he was put in jail no one answered them. They said only: "He is a counter-revolutionary and he is opposed to the Government;" and, when he said he was working all the time they said, "Never mind, you did sabotage; you did not work as well as you should," and so on, but the direct cause was not presented against him. Finally, he contracted spotted typhoid fever and was transferred to the hospital, and I do not know about his fate now. This is not an exceptional case, but there are hundreds and thousands of these cases. They are occurring every day.

Senator STERLING. So his offense was because he did not engage in sabotage, as you say, did not engage in hindering the operation of the factory or industry; was that it?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. He worked in the bank, but he did not want to support the Bolsheviks, and he did not want to be one of their creed.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. If you go to a Bolshevik and ask for work they say, "All right, are you a Bolshevik?" If you answer no, they ask you to what party you belong. If you say you do not belong to any party at all they say they will give you work only on condition that you bring them indorsements from some Bolshevik party or some prominent Bolshevik. Only when you do that are you to be given work, and if you support them. If you do not support them, you do not get work. You read in the papers, of course, that the famous Maxim Gorky is trying to induce intelligent people to work with the Bolsheviks. That is true. They organize meetings and say: "There is enough of discord; there is enough of sabotage; come to us; work with us; we shall give you work;" and as soon as anyone asks for work he is told what I have said before—"bring us some certificate that you are on friendly terms with the Bolsheviki."

Senator STERLING. What kind of work do they give men who say they are Bolshevists, and are willing to join them? They can not give them work in factories, because they are closed for the most part.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I say, mostly for intelligent people, for specialists; but for workmen, workmen mostly do not know to what political creed they belong. They are working in some factories that are running, and they are doing what the Bolsheviki say.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you over there representing any interests in this country? Were you a representative of some concern over there?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Here?

Senator OVERMAN. Over in Russia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Russia?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes. What was your business there?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I say, I was working with the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator OVERMAN. To this country?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. In Russia, and for four years I was representative of the Minister of Agriculture in St. Louis.

Senator OVERMAN. Representative of the Russian Government?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; as agricultural agent. It was my proposition to establish an agricultural agency in the United States for facilitating the buying of machinery, introducing into Russia American machinery and seeds, and so on; and I established it, organized it, and ran it for four years. Then I asked permission to be transferred to Petrograd to organize a cotton business there, but I was not successful, because the minister at that time was a shareholder of a large company that did not like this work.

Senator STERLING. During what year did you represent the Minister of Agriculture in this country?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. In this country?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. From 1909 to 1912.

Senator STERLING. Inclusive?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes; inclusive; but for the last two years I did not work at all. I ate my money that I gathered before—a little sum—and was not living, but starving. I lost 37 pounds at that time.

I have been present here for three days and have heard most of the things that have been told you, and would not like to reiterate what has already been said, but I would like to call your attention to some special questions. For instance, they told you about banks. I wish to tell you about the budget of this government. For the last half of the year 1918 their budget, on paper, was 26,000,000,000 rubles, and that is for only one quarter part of European Russia. Under the Imperial Government the budget for the whole of Russia was less than 3,000,000,000. It was 2,300,000,000; 2,400,000,000, about that amount. But under the Bolsheviki government for one-half year, for one quarter of the whole of European Russia, the budget was 26,000,000,000 rubles.

Senator STERLING. Why not for the whole of Russia? Because they did not have control of it?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. That was it.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir. And this article I read about revenue—unfortunately I could not get it out of Russia, because in Finland they do not allow the Bolsheviki literature to be brought into the country, but I wish I could show you this article. They say that the budget is twenty-six billion, while the income is only twelve and one-half, while the deficit is made up by contributions from wealthy people. There was thirteen and a half billion deficit.

Maj. HUMES. You say 13,000,000,000 is the contribution from the wealthy people?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No; ten.

Maj. HUMES. Ten billions?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Maj. HUMES. They use the word contribution, not as meaning a voluntary contribution, do they not, but a forced payment? In other words, it is money that is forcibly taken away from the people?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; yes, sir.

Maj. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. You were told about commerce; you were told about factories. Now I will let you know something about oil and coal production. It is a very interesting thing. When I left Petrograd, Petrograd had no fuel. A pile of firewood 7 feet by 7 feet by 7 feet was worth 1,800 rubles—ordinary birch firewood. At the same time the city of Petrograd is surrounded by peat lands, and only 130, 140, or 150 versts—or 75 or 80 miles—from Petrograd there are coal mines. Although the forests are plentiful around Petrograd, and peat lands are plentiful and coal fields are plentiful, Petrograd was without fuel. Why? Because firewood was not brought in.

The steamers and barges on the river were nationalized and stayed idle. They do not know how to make peat fuel, how to exploit coal mines; and the winters in Petrograd are very serious, and very long. From October until May you must heat houses day by day. What those poor people are doing now I do not know. Oil could not be brought from Baku in the south. Coal could not be brought from Poland, because they were fighting in the west. Firewood could not be brought on the other railroads from the east, because they were fighting in the east, and firewood could not be brought from the north, because they were fighting in the north. They were fighting in the north, south, west, and east.

Senator OVERMAN. How did you keep warm? How did you keep from freezing?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I do not know, I do not know what they are doing now. I think besides hunger and starvation, they are freezing now. We have every kind of heating, beginning with Holland heaters down to steam heating and hot-water heating and so on, but no fuel to heat with.

Perhaps you want to know what effect is produced by these decrees, these rulings of this socialistic government, on the social life and the individual life of the people. I can tell you in a few words.

Senator STERLING. Before passing to that, I would like to ask you a question in regard to the fuel supply. Have you any coal mines in Russia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes; plenty of them.

Senator STERLING. Have you any nearer than Baku?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, I told you that only 70 miles from Petrograd there are coal mines.

Senator STERLING. I did not get that.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. They are excellent, and very many of them, and near Petrograd, because I tell everything concerning the northern part, and not south of the fifty-second parallel, because the Bolsheviks have their power only as far south as the fifty-second parallel. South of that is the Ukraine. I do not know what kind of power they have in the Ukraine, as they are fighting there, too. Everyone is fighting.

Senator OVERMAN. Fighting in the nighttime and fighting in the daytime and fighting all over the town.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; they are fighting, fighting, fighting, and no end. The Bolsheviks are fighting all other parties, and I am sure that if another party should take the power in their hands they would begin to fight the other ones. I will tell about this just in the end.

Now, I begin with churches. As you know, gentlemen, the Russians are a very religious people. Like here in the United States, there are very many denominations there, but most of the people belong to the Greek Church. Of course, the priests and religious people are not very pleasant to the Bolsheviks, because the Bolsheviks deny any religion or any religious sentiment. They oppose the Russian clergy and the Russian clergy oppose the Bolsheviks, and the Russian priests are treated very badly. For instance, they are set to do street work, cleaning the streets, paving streets, digging ditches, and so on. The workmen told me several times, "The Bolsheviks are sending out priests to work in the streets. Why do they not send their rabbis?" And that is true. The Jewish rabbis are not sent to work on the streets. The Bolsheviks are opposing religion to such an extent that lately when I was going to Petrograd they raised a question of teaching atheism in the schools. They boast that they have opened so many schools, but they do not say that they closed as many schools as they opened. We had schools in connection with the churches, in connection with every church there was a school, and all these schools are closed now.

Senator STERLING. Were those church schools what might be termed free schools? Were they open to all children?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes, sir; they were open to all children, and they had a subsidy from the government like the state schools, only the difference was that in the church schools religion was taught a little more than in the common schools. In the common schools religion was taught some, but in the church schools religion was taught more.

Senator STERLING. But there was no tuition to pay?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Yes.

Senator STERLING. There was a tuition fee to pay?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No; they were all free.

Now, about the newspapers. We had not as many newspapers as you have here in America, but still we had some, and some good ones, but in seven or eight months they were all closed except the Bolshevik papers. The Bolsheviks did not allow them to publish any papers except the Bolshevik papers. They did not allow any pamphlets to be published against Bolshevism. No book, no paper, and no pamphlet; and no word can be told against Bolshevism in Russia.

Senator STERLING. Did some of the papers change and become Bolshevik papers?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. No, sir; I do not know any of them. One paper that was edited by Maxim Gorky tried to be between two chairs, as we say in Russia, but he was not successful and was ordered to quit it. Now, there are in Petrograd only three or four Bolshevik papers and nothing else.

Senator STERLING. Where is Maxim Gorky now? Is he in Petrograd?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. I think he went to Paris as the head of some committee that was sent by the Bolsheviks to try to get into the peace of conference; but, of course, they were denied all the time, and I do not know where he is now.

Senator STERLING. He is a recognized Bolshevik, is he not?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Now?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. That is true. Before, he was in opposition to the Bolshevik government, but finally he adopted all their teachings and helped them, and that is a great pity, because he is a very talented man.

You have heard about the persecution of the Russian intelligentsia. The Bolsheviks know very well that intelligent people understand better than the ignorant all their decrees and all their teachings, and they are fighting those people unmercifully.

I mentioned that we have in Russia 25 political parties, and among them several socialistic parties. We have already had two of them governing us, and you see the results. But if some party like the Mensheviks—the Social Democrats are divided into two groups, the Bolsheviks and the Mensheviks—if the Mensheviks were in control of the Government, they would fight the Bolsheviks and others, so, in my opinion, if Russia will be let alone, this continuous fighting will last at least for 20 or 25 years to come.

Senator STERLING. What opportunities would that condition of things give Germany in Russia, for German exploitation of Russia, if that state of disorder and anarchy should continue for 20 or 25 years, as you say?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Of course, Germany did not count well what results would follow from their efforts to introduce Bolshevism in Russia. They thought that Bolshevism would ruin Russia—Russian industry, Russian financial power, and so on—and at that time they would conquer the allies and would come to Russia and establish order and be the masters of all the world; but, of course, you know better than I do that they were not successful in this enterprise.

Senator OVERMAN. You have lived among the peasants and you have lived among the workingmen. What is their feeling against the Bolsheviks?

Mr. KRYSHTOFOVICH. Well, sir, that is a very interesting question, of course. Of course, the workmen were for the Bolshevik government; but little by little, as I have already mentioned, they were dissatisfied with the conditions. They were very glad when they received 400, 500, and 600 rubles a month, instead of 60 and 70, when the factories were running, but they were dissatisfied when the factories stopped. Of course, they were paid six weeks' pay, but it was not enough for the seventh week; so they began to protest, but all these protests were quenched by showing them armed red guards and so on. As I told you, they were dispersed from Petrograd to different cities, and those that are left in Petrograd are more and more dissatisfied with the Bolshevik government.

Now, about the peasants. The peasants were on the side of the Bolsheviks only for the reason that the Bolsheviks gave them all the land; but as soon as the peasants were in possession of this land, they thought that the Bolsheviks were not necessary for them any more, and especially when the Bolsheviks began to take their products, as grain, flour, cattle, and so on, they began to be resentful against the Bolsheviks, and now most of the peasants are in open revolt against the Bolsheviks. When I was starting from Petrograd, I heard from many people that in the government of Tula they caught the Bolshevik leaders and buried them alive in the earth.

Senator OVERMAN. Buried them alive?

Mr. KRYSHTOFVICH. Yes, sir. You ask me now if the workmen are against the Bolshevik government, or if the peasants are against the Bolshevik government, or if the Bolshevik government will exist perhaps one or two months more, and then will be obliged to run away. It is not quite so, gentlemen. The Bolshevik government has behind it two interesting organizations. These are Lett sharp shooters and Chinamen. I think that the Lett sharp shooters are between 25,000 and 30,000 people. They are very faithful to the Bolsheviks. They are getting a large salary, are fed well, are clothed well; and, besides, they can not go home because at home they will be hanged all as one man. The people at home have told them many times, "Quit this business and go home, otherwise we will not let you go home." They did not pay attention, and now they can not go home. They must work for the Bolsheviks to the end.

Senator STERLING. To what province do they belong—Esthonia, Courland, or what?

Mr. KRYSHTOFVICH. I can not tell, sir. I think they are disseminated from several provinces of the northwest of Russia—Courland, the government of Grodno and Kovno.

Senator STERLING. Esthonia?

Mr. KRYSHTOFVICH. Esthonia, yes. As to the Chinamen, there are now 8,000 Chinamen or more in the Russian guard and two Chinese officers. They are fed well, clothed well, and are happy. They have round faces now, shiny, and like to work more and more for the Bolsheviks, and the Bolsheviks want more and more Chinamen, and I have heard that they sent to China their emissaries to get more Chinamen from China, to bring them through Turkestan and use them as red guards. As the workmen and peasants have no arms, only a little force is sufficient to keep them in subjugation. These two causes—one that we have so many political parties, and the other that disarmed people can not fight armed ones—puts the question of intervention to the front.

Senator STERLING. With proper encouragement and aid, would the several parties in Russia be united against the bolshevism?

Mr. KRYSTOFOVICH. Well, it can be done, I think. Several measures can be taken in a very peaceful way. As for myself, I would say that two very strong props can be taken from the Bolshevik system. One is currency, and another one is paper.

Now, look here, gentlemen. Until lately they issued so-called Kerensky paper, greenbacks, Kerensky paper money. Why did they issue Kerensky paper money and not paper money of their own? We must ask what paper money is. It is a note which when presented to the treasury must be paid in gold or silver, and it must be signed with the name of a responsible man or representative of a party that the people believe in. They made this money and at first this money had some credit, but lately abroad they began to refuse to take it, and at home it was not very favorably accepted. But lately the Bolsheviks have decided to discontinue using Kerensky paper, and to resume the printing of Nicholas money. What does that mean? They take Emperor Nicholas' name and use it and get credit on it. That is a swindle; that is a counterfeit.

We have in Finland the same kind of precedent. For a short time the Reds obtained power there and issued their marks, Finnish money, but when they were overpowered by this government, this government made publication of all the series and of all the numbers of the money that was issued by the Bolsheviks, and this money is looked on now as counterfeit, as spurious. The same must be done with the Bolsheviks now in Russia. All the money that is issued by them must not be taken by any banker in the world. That is the first prop that can be taken from them.

Another one is paper. They are doing an excellent propaganda, and their propaganda is organized in a fine way. One hundred thousand pamphlets and leaflets perhaps are sent to the provinces to be distributed among the peasants and workmen, and doing their deadly work. But even before, the Russian paper industry was not developed, and Russia bought a large quantity of paper from Finland and Sweden. Now, the Finnish and Swedish Governments and the Finnish and Swedish people are against bolshevism, but merchants are always merchants, and everywhere are merchants. They are selling paper to the Bolsheviks in Russia, and this paper is going for Bolshevik propaganda. I think that America is strong enough to make the Bolsheviks do without this paper. I think that intervention along this line is feasible if this plan were adopted, but, unfortunately, for some reason this plan has not been followed, I am sorry to say.

TESTIMONY OF COL. V. S. HURBAN.

Col. Hurban is military attaché of the Czecho-Slovak Legation in Washington.

The witness was sworn by the chairman.

Maj. HUMES. Colonel, were you a part of the Czecho-Slovak army—with the Czecho-Slovak army—that was in Siberia, in Russia?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; I was.

Maj. HUMES. During what period of time were you in Russia?

Col. HURBAN. I have been in Russia since 1908. Since 1908 I have lived in Russia, and been with the general staff. I was an instructor of officers in the intelligence service.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is your nationality?

Col. HURBAN. Slovak.

Senator WOLCOTT. Where were you born?

Col. HURBAN. In North Hungary—now the country of Czecho-Slovakia.

Maj. HUMES. Will you just relate your observations and experiences with the Bolshevik government when in Russia?

Col. HURBAN. I know a good deal about the Bolsheviks. I saw how they started. I dealt with them because I have been a member of the Czecho-Slovak council, in the representative national council which was before we were recognized as a state.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you in the war between Germany and Russia?

Col. HURBAN. As the war started I entered as a volunteer in the Russian army, and I was in the Russian army from the first of August, 1914, until the end of 1916, when I became one of the organizers of Czecho-Slovak Russia. Since then I have belonged to our Army.

If you want to understand what happened in Russia, I think it is necessary to tell how it was possible, and I think the present situation in Russia is absolutely natural and logical, growing out of the conditions that existed before the revolution. We are fighting with the Bolsheviks, but I can not blame them alone for the present situation. The present situation has been absolutely prepared by the old Tsar régime. The people have been held by force in absolute darkness and ignorance. The governing classes have been degenerate, corrupt, and treacherous. The Russian people have suffered for four hundred, five hundred, a thousand years, have suffered always, in innocent suffering. They have been held by the old Russian Government not as slaves but worse than slaves. I should say that to-day the 180,000,000 people can be terrorized by some people, but it is only because they are accustomed to being terrorized, because they have been terrorized during the hundreds and hundreds of years before.

The Russian people have absolutely no national feeling as we understand it. Nobody in Russia has it. Why? The Government, the ruling classes, have been the supporters of the Tsar's régime. They have been demoralized, degenerated, autocratic, and corrupt, and everything they should not be. At this time they have no national feeling. The liberal classes rejected nationality. Under the Tsar's régime only one part of the Russians used national feeling as a tool for propaganda, which has been the so-called Pan-Slavists, and perhaps you know the Pan-Slavists have been the most reactionary people. They dreamed about a big Slav state under the wide rule of the Tsar, a Tsar half divine and half human, who would rule all Russia and all the Slav people. This is the only class in Russia that has spoken about nationality.

The liberalists must reject them because they saw that work was absolutely impossible, because they saw in Russia they could do nothing. Their work was to be on an international basis. The intelligent and honest people did not have this national feeling at all, and the largest class of people, the peasants, the ignorant people, did not know anything about national feeling.

For example, it has been said that the war has been popular. It has been said that the Russian peasant hates the Germans. That is not the truth. Take a wounded and suffering soldier, and he gives him bread, and gives him tea, and treats him not with hate. The Russian peasant does not like the Germans, but he dislikes them not because of the basis of national feeling but because of economic reasons, because the Russian peasant and worker knows that the German worker is much more clever than he is. There is a proverb in the Russian language that everything is invented by the Germans. The Russians did not like the Germans as they went into the war, but they did not hate the Germans because of their nationality, because of the national feeling, since there was no national feeling.

The Russian went into the war because he was told to go into the war, and he has been accustomed through thousands of years to obey, to go into war and to fight. Nobody knew where they were going, and they have been going into the war because they have been obedient, and because it was against Germany, and because it was for economical reasons; but nobody can truthfully say that the war has been popular. It never has been popular in Russia as it has been in Germany, in France, in England, and last, as it has been in the United States. When the war started the Russian Government was pro-German, corrupt, and dishonest.

Senator STERLING. Do you mean to say that the government as a whole was corrupt and dishonest, or only a few men under the government? Do you mean the Tsar himself was corrupt or that he was pro-German, for example?

Col. HURBAN. It is difficult to tell about him. I saw him many times and I heard him speak, and I thought he was mentally a feeble man.

Senator STERLING. I may not disagree with you in that. He was not a strong man.

Col. HURBAN. He has been nothing.

Senator WOLCOTT. His wife was, was she not?

Col. HURBAN. She was clever.

Senator WOLCOTT. She was German?

Col. HURBAN. Yes. You have the testimony there of Mr. Krysh-tofovich that he wanted to establish a cotton factory there but that one of the ministry had some stock in a factory and that he could not get it done. Such things are absolutely true. I do not know how you translate this Russian word "vziatka," where you put the money in the hand and you get everything.

Senator WOLCOTT. Call it "graft."

Col. HURBAN. You have an expression like it?

Senator WOLCOTT. Graft.

Col. HURBAN. It is such a common word; and if anybody takes money he is not considered a bad man. It is absolutely the natural thing there.

Senator OVERMAN. It was not considered dishonest to accept a bribe?

Col. HURBAN. It was not. I know thousands of men of high position and everybody knows that they do it. It is all right. Now, you have heard many times of Gen. Deniken. Now, he is the leader of the army in the provinces. Now, everybody knows that his intendant—

Senator WOLCOTT. Quartermaster or commissary?

Maj. HUMES. Supply department.

Col. HURBAN. Supply department, or intendant, it is called. It was known everywhere in Russia that his intendant took bribes.

Senator WOLCOTT. I might say right here that I talked with the foreign sales agent of one of our large munitions concerns in this country, who dealt with all the foreign Governments, and he told me that he had not found a Russian official yet that did not have his hand behind his back.

Col. HURBAN. It is true. But Gen. Deniken said about this intendant that he knew that the intendant was stealing. He said, "He steals, but my army will have shoes and will have bread." Those are the words of Gen. Deniken.

When the war started the government was pro-German, absolutely. Gov. Stürmer and others were pro-German not because they would, perhaps, help Germany, but they knew with the help of the Germans they could keep their autocratic government in Russia. Everybody knows that the head of the Russian general staff was a traitor. The general staff knew, when we started the war in August, 1914, that they must prepare for the war, and when we went into Galicia we only had shells enough to last a month, and the second month of the war we had no shells. This was because of the ignorant Russian general staff, which were traitors.

Senator STERLING. Suppose the Russian army had been well supplied with munitions and arms and had not grown suspicious or corrupt, perhaps, on the part of some of the leaders—the prime minister, like Stürmer; or the minister of the interior—would not the Russian soldiers have had considerable heart in the war and would they not have gone ahead and fought?

Col. HURBAN. By the end of September, when we started toward Cracow, the whole of Galicia was in our hands. We sent the Austrian army back with one push. It was all that was necessary. If we had had then 500,000 shells we would have put Austria out of the war. Austria was out absolutely, because, when we came to the neighborhood of Cracow, the Moravians and the Bohemians were waiting for us, and Austria would have been absolutely cut off. It would have been the absolute defeat of Austria. But we did not have those shells and we did not have the rifles. I saw the attack of a new regiment of 15,000 men that came up and did not have a rifle, and they went into the attack with sticks. The Russian soldier is, perhaps, the tallest soldier in history. They went to the attack with sticks and took the position, and they were told that they could find their rifles on the field. They took the position and they captured prisoners. If material had been furnished and they could have been led by honest men and not by traitors or ignorant men, the war would have ended, if not in 1914, in 1915, surely.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know the Grand Duke?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; I know him.

Senator OVERMAN. He was not an ignorant man?

Col. HURBAN. I do not believe in him.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by that?

Col. HURBAN. I do not believe in his ability. He was at that time like the rest.

Senator WOLCOTT. Like the rest?

Col. HURBAN. It is impossible to be a man who was educated and lived the life under the circumstances that he did and be honest. He can not be, under such circumstances—having been educated in the Russian court. Everybody said "Nicholas is honest." But that was impossible. No one in the country believes he is an honest man, and nobody thought he was a traitor, but he has been at the head of the general staff. That proves that he was a man of no ability. I do not believe in him. Nicholas said in the beginning to the Poles that they would get their autonomy. The Germans entered the Polish Provinces of Russian Poland, but when the military situation got better, nobody spoke about autonomy for the Poles. It proves that he does not keep his promises.

I must say that, to understand what is happening to-day in Russia, we must not think of anarchy as starting with the Bolsheviki or with the overthrow of the Kerensky government. I believe anarchy started on the 27th of March, 1917, when the Tsar was overthrown. I will explain my idea. All the laws, all the rules in Russia have been passed, not for the people, but they came from the head—passed by the Tsar. The Russian ignorant peasant never understands a rule, that the rule is necessary to be made for himself; but, on the other hand, he understands the rule is a law because the boss needs it—the Tsar.

The psychology of understanding and following a law has been not social, I should say, but it has come from above. The authority was personified by the Tsar, as being very near to God. All the Russian officials under the Tsar's régime were demoralized. A Russian official never thought of doing his duty toward the people, but his duty was toward his next boss; and so he never served the people, but he served first the next boss, and so on up to the Tsar. When the overthrow of the Tsar came, then the basis of following the laws was lost to the peasant in his own mind. He had been obeying the Tsar, and as there was no longer any Tsar, though the provisional government ran only a very short time, yet by force of gravity and custom the peasant continued along in the same way; but the force of gravity grew less and less until complete anarchy took possession of the Russian peasant. He had no moral basis for himself. He had lost it; it had been taken away. So I say he had anarchy in his mind, and that anarchy had been caused 50 per cent by the old Tsar régime and 25 per cent by the Kerensky government.

Senator STERLING. What is the last statement?

Col. HURBAN. If we are to decide who is responsible for the present anarchical condition, I should say that 50 per cent should be blamed on the old régime, 25 per cent on Kerensky, and 25 per cent on the Bolshevik government.

Senator STERLING. Why is it due to the Kerensky government?

Senator WOLCOTT. Let us see if I understand what you are getting at. I think I catch your point. Is it this way? The Russian people, the great mass of the people, do not recognize obedience to law in the sense that we Americans do. They only knew obedience to men, which obedience they gave because of the Tsar's claim to divine right, and which obedience they also gave because of fear. They obeyed their rulers, the people did, and they thought of laws only in the sense that they were rules put down on the people by the rulers?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, when in March the rulers were overthrown, the Russian people lost all their ties of authority. They were not devoted to law. They had been only devoted to the rulers, and the rulers were gone. For a little while the Russian people behaved themselves by the impetus of past custom, but within a short time that impetus was lost and the people just were left without any authority that they recognized, so that there was anarchy in their minds. And hence when that anarchy grew and grew, and got more, you trace it back and say that it started from Kerensky's government which had created an anarchy of mind, so to speak. Have I expressed your point right?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; perhaps you can make me understand. The rulers who came after the Tsar, the honest men in Russia who came out, ought to have known the mind of the Russian people, but they did not. I did not know Miliukov nor Rodzianko. Miliukov was one of the most able men that Russia had. He would have stopped the Russian anarchy by giving them the Dardanelles, and he proclaimed that the Dardanelles were Russian. It was the most foolish thing that he did, because the Russian peasant had been told that this was not a war of annexation, that he would only have peace, and he did not understand why the Dardanelles were for him. They did not have a national feeling.

Senator STERLING. While Miliukov may have made that mistake, was he not regarded as an honest and patriotic man, devoted to the interests of the Russian people?

Col. HURBAN. Yes. I can explain again psychologically, if you will, his failure. Even if you are an honest and able man, if you are accustomed from your very youth to work only to destroy, it is very difficult for you if you are one day placed in a position to construct. Miliukov and all his followers from their very youth never did any constructive work, because it was not possible. They only did destructive work. All their strength had gone into the work of destroying the then rulers in Russia. Now those rulers are gone, and they are not able to construct a new government for the people. Russia is many times bigger than the United States, and it is very difficult to expect from them that they do it. That is the reason why the revolution has brought no one big man. There was one in the first revolution that bid fair to become a man of some importance, but he was killed by the Bolsheviks in Petrograd while I was there. Many thought that Kerensky was the man.

Personally I did not like Trotsky, and I disliked Kerensky twice as much. I will tell you why. It was not his fault. Kerensky was a very able lawyer, and he fought on the side of the people against this destructive work. The Russian revolutionary liberals always worked with the people only in their minds. They thought they had actual power, but they had no real power in this provisional government, it was only imaginary: and they started to give to these ignorant people radical ideas which the Russian ignorant man never could understand.

Senator STERLING. They were too liberal, in other words?

Col. HURBAN. Kerensky, as the revolution started, as everybody knew, was the extreme left member in the provisional government.

Senator STERLING. And that means radical socialist?

Col. HURBAN. He had been of the party of the social revolutionists.

Senator STERLING. And a radical?

Col. HURBAN. He had been of the radical wing. His paper, "Del Naroda," that he started, I remember it very well, and got the first number. The boys cried, "'Del Naroda,' the paper of Kerensky." I began to read, and immediately I thought, I began to hate Kerensky, I think from the first day I saw him in the Duma. All his life he had been a lawyer, but as he appeared in the Duma he wore a working blouse. That means that he is an actor. I saw him in his working blouse. Though he worked for the people as a lawyer and became their minister, yet in order to show his democracy he wore a working blouse. Since that time I have seen his pictures and he is a very dangerous actor. He proved it by his lack of ability. I can tell you his attitude toward us. The old régime was against us.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by "us": the Czecho-Slovaks?

Col. HURBAN. Against the Czecho-Slovaks, because since 1914, when we entered into the Russian Army as volunteer soldiers, our boys began to escape from the Austrian Army, and we organized our units to fight against Austria and Germany. Kerensky knew that we were absolutely against Austria-Hungary, though he would not permit us absolutely to form an army, because we had been the biggest enemy against Austria-Hungary, because we never compromised with Austria-Hungary. In our proclamation in the beginning of 1915 our people declared that we would never make compromises with Austria-Hungary, and if the allies should make peace with Austria-Hungary, we would start a new war again within 10 years.

The old Tsar regiment was organized as the revolution started, and Miliukov, who was our big friend, was foreign minister and promptly he recognized the government of the Czecho-Slovaks, and we started to form one brigade. At that time we were on the Russian front, under Russian uniform. As the revolution started, Miliukov recognized our government and allowed us to form an army. We started in, and if we had gone along as we started, by May or June, 1917, we would have had 150,000 volunteers. But unfortunately Kerensky came in and stopped the formation of our army. We went to him and asked him why it was, and he said that our army was formed on a nationalistic basis; that we were Chauvinists, and our army was on a national basis, which was natural, we having been oppressed as a nation, but we could not declare war and form an army as a nation. He could not understand, because he was so naive in his views. Still he spoke about internationalism and such stuff. But he tried to stop our forming an army as large as we wanted. It was more or less anarchy, but we did it. He forbade us, but we did it, and we succeeded in forming an army of about 50,000 men. It was not allowed, but we did it, because it was announced in Russia that we could succeed. Kerensky saw in May that he had made a mistake, as the army was gone, and he began to talk about nationalism. He came to the soldiers and began to appeal to their national feelings. He was much uglier than before, because he denied—and he should know—that these people had any national feeling. But now he began to talk about national feeling, and wanted the people to go against Germany, and the people did not understand him.

Senator STERLING. He had been preaching internationalism?

Col. HURBAN. Yes. And after a while he started his first drive, and we helped him because we thought we would have an occasion to show ourselves to the world, and when he started his big offensive, as you perhaps know, only our brigade went into the offensive, and our brigade alone had a big victory, although we were surrounded because all the Russian soldiers fled away. Afterwards Kerensky came to us and talked to us because we fought and did such big things, and now he began to understand what national feeling meant.

Kerensky's attitude in the beginning was that 99 per cent of the Bolsheviki were German agents, but that was only in the first month. Then Kerensky spoke and said that they could be conquered by force of arms, etc., because they were men, all of them. In June we knew more about them, and knew that all the Bolsheviki were not German agents. You have heard Mr. Kryshstofovich say that they were not all German agents. It was not true. They were real Bolsheviki, and they believed that Bolshevism would bring happiness and would bring peace. But Mr. Kerensky comes and he says that the Bolsheviki are German agents. It was not true, and every Russian workman knew they were not German agents.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was true for about a month?

Col. HURBAN. It was true in the beginning.

Senator WOLCOTT. But when Kerensky said the Bolsheviki were all German agents, it was not true then?

Col. HURBAN. It had been true all over the country, but it was no more.

Senator WOLCOTT. It had gone all through the Russian people, then?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; and the Russian people really believed in the ideas of the Bolsheviki. I talked with them. I have been many times in the soviets, and I spoke with these people, and I know how real it has been and how their minds and souls have been in it. This time there was no longer a possibility of fighting against the Bolsheviki as German agents, because it was not true.

Senator STERLING. What do you know about Kerensky's ideas in regard to discipline in the army, and his relaxation of discipline, and what effect it had on the Russian army?

Col. HURBAN. I can not blame Kerensky entirely, because the discipline was gone. I can not blame him, because, as I told you, the Russian soldier had always been obedient. He did not know why, but he knew he must be obedient. Now he was told, "We are all alike, everybody," and therefore that was the end of all discipline.

Senator OVERMAN. He owed allegiance to nobody?

Col. HURBAN. The soldier did not understand. He had been subject to the high command, and that had been overthrown, and now the soldier began not to believe anybody.

Senator STERLING. Did Kerensky issue some order that the enlisted man should pay no particular respect to his superior officer?

Col. HURBAN. No; it is not Kerensky; no. He can not be blamed. That was the situation on the second day of the revolution, as the Petrograd soviet formed, because on the 26th of February, as the riots occurred, and on the 27th of February, nobody would believe that the revolution would be, and those liberal people who were in the Duma were surprised, themselves. Nobody believed in it. I have been in Petrograd and watched the streets, and I have been in the Duma, and nobody believed it was true. The revolutionary workers organized a soviet of soldiers and workers the first day, absolutely. The Duma did not know what to do. The workers on the second day issued an order, order No. 1. This was the work of German agents, I believe, this order No. 1, and there were some people with ideas, too, who did not believe in it. It was afterwards explained. Kerensky can not be blamed for it—for the nonsense of the order No. 1 which was issued by the Petrograd soviet—and it was bad for the discipline of the old régime.

Under such circumstances he was absolutely preparing the action for the Bolsheviks. Now, I will say something about that. You know what is the idea of Bolshevism. I do not think I need to explain that. In other words, while in former times the proletariat had been oppressed by the capitalistic class, it is now vice versa, and the capitalists are now oppressed by the proletariats. It is absolutely the same.

Senator OVERMAN. The bottom rail is now on top?

Col. HURBAN. It is absolutely the same thing. As the Bolsheviks started their action in Petrograd I was in Petrograd, and I have been over the streets and I have talked with them, and I saw those agents, and I have many proofs that the Bolsheviks who first came to Russia were German agents. Is Lenine a German agent, and are Trotsky and these different people? This question can be answered from absolutely different points of view. From our point of view I can tell you he is a German agent, but from his point of view he will tell you he is absolutely not. He is, from his point of view, absolutely honest.

I do not think Lenine will deny that he got German money. He got it and came through Germany; but it is very interesting that he denied it afterwards. There is no doubt that he came because they helped him. If anybody gives him money, he takes the money to realize his own ideas. I have heard Lenine talk many times, and I think he is a foolish man—a fool. How is he a foolish man? He does not believe in facts. After the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was interpreted, Trotsky refused to sign the treaty, and said, "We will not fight." He said, "I can not sign this horrible peace, but we will demobilize"; and the Germans took the Russian front. Then Lenine said that everybody was on the front, and there was a very big danger that we would be surrounded. Lenine told our representatives that the German soldiers who were advancing were German White Guards; that the Germans had formed a special army of the bourgeois, which was coming to Russia. He said they were not the German socialists because they were starting a revolution, but they were forming a special army of White Guards—a bourgeois army.

a German bourgeois army with only the bourgeois class in it—and they were advancing on Russia, and that no workmen and no peasants were in this army.

We gave them proof, because we dealt with the Bolsheviki from the beginning. We have been with them absolutely neutral, and we saw them and gave them proof. We had many prisoners, and we showed them these people. "No," they said, "they are bourgeoisie."

Such, I think, is Lenine; all his life a man that has worked only destructively, who has worked on his table in Switzerland, in our country, and in Prague, and I do not know where. His ego is such that he absolutely goes contrary to the facts.

Why should such a man as Lenine exist, or why should such a man as Stürmer exist, who believes in a tyranny of some classes of the people, and they, too, educated men? If they should not exist, one might say, Why should Lenine, who believes the contrary, exist? He is not necessarily a traitor or a German agent. Really he has been a German agent, de facto; but if he got help from the Germans, if he betrayed us on the order of the Germans, he did not do it because he wanted to help the Germans; he did it because he thought it would help to bring through his idea. You could not make Lenine believe that the allied army crushed Germany or that the Kaiser is gone because the German Army is crushed. He thinks it was his propaganda that caused it.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is what Mr. Albert Rhys Williams, who was the head of the Bolshevik propaganda in Russia, says. He says that the Bolsheviki of Russia caused Germany to be beaten.

Col. HURBAN. I can not tell you, because as we retreated from Courland we were surrounded by the Germans, and we had a very difficult withdrawal from Ukrainia. We had a big battle, and we beat the Germans there very badly, and got some prisoners, and we sent them to Moscow as examples of those White Guards, and they were all workers and socialists, and they had come into Russia. But you could never make Lenine believe it.

Senator OVERMAN. He believes he ended the war, does he not?

Col. HURBAN. He believes he brought about the restoration of peace; and you could never make him believe that only victory made it possible, and that Wilhelm lost his throne only because he was beaten.

I can not explain Trotsky like Lenine. Trotsky is much more of a real man. Trotsky is satanic.

Senator WOLCOTT. In other words, he is a devil?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; if you please. I can not explain myself. I have heard him speak many times, and I am of the belief that he is acting—I can not explain—because he is a very real thinking man. He does not believe in what he writes. I always had the impression that Lenine really believes what he says; but Trotsky, never. He does not believe what he says.

I can give you an example, to illustrate. It was the first attempt to overthrow the provisional government. As you know, the main force of the Bolsheviks in the beginning were the sailors at Kronstadt, and I think it was the 1st of July, 1917, or the 3d—I do not remember exactly now, as I have not got those dates right here—but the sailors from Kronstadt came to Petrograd, and they were then a force of 10,000 men, armed from their heads to their feet, and they came on battleships and transports to Petrograd and they all disembarked and went to the Duma. I was interested to see them, and as they marched through the street in Petrograd I went out to see them, as I wanted to see them march and to look at them. All of a sudden something happened, like it always does in Russia—somebody shoots a shot and is gone. It was more or less an everyday occurrence in Petrograd, and if somebody shot, nobody paid any attention. The shooting came from near the houses, you know, and the bullets struck the wall and ricocheted, and it looked like the shooting came from there. They had these smokeless powder cartridges. Then everybody began shooting. In less than 15 seconds no one was on the street. I found myself alone on the corner, because they were shooting from everywhere; they shoot, they shoot, and they shoot, in the windows of the shops and everywhere, and the whole army of 10,000 men escaped.

Senator WOLCOTT. You mean the sailors ran?

Col. HURBAN. The sailors ran, but I stayed on the corner of the street with one older man and a boy, and he used a very nasty, bad Russian word about them because they all escaped in the houses, and began to loot, and after two or three hours they came out of the houses and this disorderly crowd came before the Duma. Everybody in Petrograd knew what had happened with the heroes of Kronstadt who now came out, and naturally Trotsky knew it, too. Trotsky came out on the balcony, and I was there because I was anxious to know and to see these people, and he says, "This is the beautifulness and proudness of the Russian revolution." Those were his words. Excuse me, but how can I believe him? He is clever enough, but how can I believe him? Afterwards in his dealings with us he tried to explain, but he will have to explain to me many times.

Perhaps I choose a very difficult question when I speak of the rôle of the Jews in the Russian revolution, but I think something has been told which is not quite true and not just. The Jews in Russia have not been treated like human beings. Whenever a Russian spoke to a Jew he always addressed him by the use of some insulting epithet which I can not translate into English because I do not know the words, and they have always been treated in such a manner by the old Russians, and all the people have been allowed to treat them in that way, and they have really always felt themselves between two enemies threatening to kill them; but you know the Jewish people are a very energetic people, and are not so ignorant as the lower classes of the Russians. Now, is it not absolutely natural that now that the revolution is over and everybody is alike, everybody is free, the Russian peasant, who has been looking on, as the Jew, and especially the Russian Jew, who has been working under a very difficult task, should have gone forward. It is natural that everywhere he should have had enough of the ignorance of most of these incapable Russians.

It is also logical that the morals of the officials should be corrupt. I can not deny it, because it is a fact, and it is useless to deny it, that in the soviets from the beginning there have been a very large percentage of Jews. It can not be denied. I can explain myself. We should not blame them, because it is just their revenge. It is a human thing. He who does not believe in revenge is an idealist. Revenge is an absolute human feeling. And I think many of the men who have been in the Russian revolution are men of feeling, too. It is only natural. I can not blame them. But the Russian Jews generally, who number 8,000,000, are suffering as the Russian people are suffering. They are against the Bolsheviks, the workingmen. The masses of the Jews who live in Poland are against the soviets of the Bolsheviks, just like the Russian people, and yet they have been blamed. That is why I question it.

So, as to the success of Trotsky, I can only explain, under such conditions, that it is nice to work for Trotsky. We must not look at this from one side. Is it not worth while to throw away principles and be satanic? It is a great thing, and he will be a man who has accomplished a career. Is it not worth while to deny all moral principles for such a thing? Every man is something of an actor, and he is an actor, and it must seem quite nice to him to go from the bottom to be, as he is to-day, the director of the whole of Russia. Is it not nice to kill and to do everything? Trotsky, perhaps, took money from Germany, but Trotsky will deny it. Lenin would not deny it. Miliukov proved that he got $10,000 from some Germans while he was in America. Miliukov had the proof, but he denied it. Trotsky did, although Miliukov had the proof.

Senator OVERMAN. It was charged that Trotsky got $10,000 here.

Col. HURBAN. I do not remember how much it was, but I know it was a question between him and Miliukov.

Senator OVERMAN. Miliukov proved it, did he?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know where he got it from?

Col. HURBAN. I remember it was $10,000; but it is no matter.

I will speak about their starting the propaganda. The German Government knew Russia better than anybody, and they knew that with the help of those people they could destroy the Russian army.

(At 5.45 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow. Wednesday, February 19, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

TESTIMONY OF COL. V. S. HURBAN—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. Colonel, you had just arrived at the statement about the Bolsheviki, I believe. You may proceed, now.

Col. HURBAN. Yesterday I tried to explain what had been before the big Russian revolution. All was well prepared for the anarchy which is to-day in Russia. I would explain that the Bolsheviks alone, as they are, could not be the cause of this anarchy. Bolshevism is, as I see it, an absolutely natural social business. A good, honest government in a state has in it the germ of this disease also; but if it is a government that has been honestly democratic, it goes through slight influences only. On the other hand, a dishonest government, an autocratic government, must succumb. So succumbed Russia; and, as you see, is succumbing, partly only, Germany.

Senator NELSON. What you mean is that where they get this Bolshevik germ and have lived under a bad government like that of Russia under the Czar, it takes them longer to get over the disease than when they are under a milder form of government?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; that is what I mean. These germs are everywhere. The germs are in every state, and it is an absolutely natural occurrence; because everybody who is not content does not know why he is not content. He has not natural possibility to get money, or he is unable to get money, and he is discontented. He tries to help himself, and if he can not get it the honest way he tries to make it otherwise.

Senator STERLING. What do you think the leaders of the Duma, or through the Constituent Assembly, might have been able to accomplish if it had not been for Kerensky and the Bolshevik element that followed?

Col. HURBAN. I did not understand one word, then, Senator.

Senator STERLING. Do you not think that the leaders of the Duma would have been able to work out, through the Constituent Assembly, a good, democratic government if they had been let alone; if Kerensky had not come in, or the Bolsheviks later?

Col. HURBAN. It is very hard to answer such a question because, as I know the Russian people—and I have been 10 years in Russia and I know the Russian people—as I believe, it was in an anarchistic state of mind since the first day of the revolution, and the honest and the liberal leaders of the Duma, and otherwise, they have been not prepared for this work.

Senator STERLING. I know, but now if the extremists had not got in their work, do you not think that a democratic form of government would have been worked out through the Constituent Assembly?

Col. HURBAN. Oh, yes; that is true. It is absolutely true, and there would not have been such a disorganization as there has been. If you could see the Russian people—the Russians have been drunken with the ideas of the Bolsheviks. They were a drunken people. If you could see them you would look on this not as merely the work of agents, but in the start it was absolutely natural. I can not deny the possibility of some people having their ends—to oppress. It is a very human thing. Why should only the upper classes oppress, as they knew before? Why should not the lower classes oppress? And such a thing is absolutely undemocratic—that idea of democracy has nothing to do here—because the Bolshevik doctrine has absolutely nothing to do with justice, has absolutely nothing to do with honesty, and has absolutely nothing to do with culture or with progress. It has absolutely nothing in common with those things; and anybody who says otherwise—who has been in Russia and who says otherwise—is blind, stupid, or dishonest and a liar.

I told about my experiences, first directly about the Bolsheviks, what I saw first, and in Petrograd, as they began the action, until afterwards there came the official connection with them and I dealt with them, and as they betrayed us; I told yesterday about the Bolshevik German agents; I told about the leaders; I told about Lenine and Trotsky and others.

But, as the revolution started, there came to Russia many, many agitators. I speak now about the first week or the first month. I believe that I am telling the truth, and I want to tell the truth. I believe 99 per cent of the Bolshevik agitators in the beginning were paid German agents. I can illustrate how it was. There was the system of meetings; after the revolution came the meetings, on the street, everywhere; everywhere meetings. There would be standing on the street three or four talking, or perhaps there may have been 200 of them, and one of these men began to talk, and he agitated the question about all power to the soviets: peace, bread, etc. Nobody told the people, but it was demagoguery—speeches. I listened to these people many times and I could find only one man who was a Russian and who believed in these things, who did this. All the other men who spoke had been prisoners of war, Germans and Austrians who had learned some Russian; Finns, Swedes, and different people that the Germans sent. They knew how the Russian people were sentimental, and how they had been drunken about this idea of liberty, freedom, and law. They believed it.

Once there was a big meeting on the street, and I was going by and I listened to these men.

Senator OVERMAN. Very few of them are Russians?

Col. HURBAN. No; these people were Russian soldiers and sailors.
 Senator OVERMAN. I mean the people who were talking to these Russians?

Col. HURBAN. Yes. The first word that I heard I knew he was not a Russian who was speaking. I speak German, too, and I heard the Germans talking. I know their accent. If somebody talks Russian—an Englishman, a German, or a Frenchman—I know him, because I know them; I know their languages. I immediately saw that it was a German speaking, and he was speaking against the war, against the provisional government; he was saying that the army should be demobilized, and that there should be peace, peace, peace. Generally, I was a very patient listener, and I did not mix up, but this time I was excited, and I asked him, "Who are you, that you advocate so for these people? Who are you; what nationality are you? Where are you coming from, and what from?" The answer that I got, not from him, will show you how it is possible that such a big trouble came in Russia. I was stopped in my questioning by the Russians—the real Russians. They attacked me and asked me, "What do you speak about the nation for? It is nothing who he is, what he is, or from where he comes. The difference is what he says." I was stopped, and I had to go away, because they said "There is nothing in nationality." They believed it; and he laughed at me; and I had to go. If I had told them, "Listen, it is a German! He advocates his cause; he does not advocate your cause," they would say, "No, no; no nationality. We are all brothers. We must make peace."

Under such circumstances was started the action. Who supported, in the first start of the revolution, the Bolsheviks? They were abused by demagogues. Trotsky was not there in the beginning, but there were those other people; and there were German agents, and those who are all agents, all the policemen and all these people who had been employed by the provisional government: because the police and the gendarmes, they had been abolished, and they went to the Bolsheviks and they began to agree with the Bolsheviks. I knew a policeman—I can not say a friend of mine, but an officer whom I knew—and I talked to him. In about the second or the third month after the revolution I met him in one of the Bolshevik organizations. I asked him, "Listen, you do not mean to say that you have had this quick turning of your mind, and everything?" He looked at me, and he said, "What could I do? I must live." On that the supporters of the Bolsheviks in the beginning were of these two elements from the old régime. You would find everybody there. All these spies, if I can use this word, the high-cultured spy system of the old régime—because if anything was high, absolutely, it was the spy system in Russia, the interior spy system—all these people have gone to the Bolsheviks. I am talking about the first month and the second month. These ideas must make drunk, not those who were ignorant, but a very good hearted and sentimental people like the Russians. It made them drunk; and really, in July, all the workers and all the soldiers, a big per cent of them, were Bolsheviks. They thought that they were. It was not based deep in conscience, but a Russian man, an average Russian peasant worker, understands liberty, I should say, "zoologically," if I can use that word. To illustrate, many times I talked to such a soldier, and I saw how he understood it. It was, "What is thine is mine, and what is mine, you have nothing to do with it." That is first. Second, the Russian peasant is a proprietor, a first-class proprietor. He wants his own soil. He wants to be the owner; that is, the first-class owner.

Senator STERLING. The proprietor, you mean?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir; he wants to be the owner. He wants to own in that sense, as we understand it.

Senator NELSON. He is land hungry?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; the fact is that he has been land hungry; and they commenced to give him soil, and in this matter I must say not only how it has been done all the time, not only the Bolsheviki are guilty, but the provisional government and all the social parties especially, are ahead of everyone, because no one told to the people the fact that liberty brings a burden, and he who will be free, he must work. Nobody told the Russian people, the Russian workers or the Russian peasants, "You are free, but you have some duties. You must work." All the time there was not work. No one worked; not under the provisional government, not under the Bolsheviki; but they spoke, and the Bolsheviki were more demagogic about the rights; and the Russian is an ignorant man, he understands about the rights, that it is that he can do what he wants, and that is the liberty. You have joked many time, about how they say "Now is freedom."

Senator NELSON. Were you in Russia during the revolution of March, 1917?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; I was in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. You were in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. You are a Czecho-Slovak?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. How came you to be there? How came you to go there? Were you a prisoner of war?

Col. HURBAN. No; but I was, before the war started, in Russia, and in the Russian Army as a volunteer.

Senator NELSON. You served in the Russian Army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes. I served in the Russian Army.

Senator NELSON. And you were stationed with the army, in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. No; when the revolution started I was a member of our provisional government of the Czecho-Slovak National Council, of the Russian branch of the Czecho-Slovak National Council.

Senator NELSON. You fought in the Russian Army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you wounded?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. How many times?

Senator NELSON. Did you go into the provisional council, you say?

Col. HURBAN. No; we had our own organization.

Senator NELSON. In the army?

Col. HURBAN. No; we formed, in Russia, from the provisional army—

Senator NELSON. No; I am coming to the army. You were with the Russian Army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Where were you stationed when you were in the army?

Col. HURBAN. I have been on the front all the time.

Senator NELSON. When did you leave the army?

Col. HURBAN. I began to work about the organization of our army in the end of 1916.

Senator NELSON. No; when did you quit the army? When did you leave; when did you quit the front?

Col. HURBAN. Since 1916 I have been in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. How came you to be in Petrograd at that time? Was your detachment or regiment sent there?

Col. HURBAN. No; I have been sent to work, to Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. Who sent you?

Col. HURBAN. From the Russian command.

Senator NELSON. What were you to do at Petrograd?

Senator OVERMAN. What were you engaged in?

Senator NELSON. What did they send you to Petrograd for?

Col. HURBAN. About the organization of the Czecho-Slovak Army.

Senator NELSON. About the organization of the Czecho-Slovak Army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Were there any Czecho-Slovaks at Petrograd at that time?

Col. HURBAN. We have been there; we have been on paper; we had our organization—political organization—there.

Senator NELSON. Oh, you had, in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; and we tried to form our army under the old régime, but the old régime was against us, and we participated in the fighting with the old régime to bring through our army.

Senator NELSON. Then you went there to help organize the Czecho-Slovaks who were in Petrograd, who had been there before the war, and you started to do that?

Col. HURBAN. No, no; that is not so.

Senator NELSON. I understood you to say that there was an association of Czecho-Slovaks.

Col. HURBAN. Our people were all through Russia.

Senator NELSON. No; come down to Petrograd. Was there any organization there?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; but they had been all over. That had been the center.

Senator NELSON. There was no organization?

Senator WOLCOTT. May I ask a question there?

Senator NELSON. Yes; certainly.

Senator WOLCOTT. When did the Czecho-Slovak people set themselves up as a Republic?

Col. HURBAN. The Czecho-Slovak people declared war in manifests given out in August, 1915. We formally declared war against Austro-Hungary and Germany.

Senator WOLCOTT. August 4, 1914?

Col. HURBAN. In 1915.

Senator NELSON. When did you leave the front and go to Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. It was in 1916.

Senator NELSON. How long did you stay in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. I have been in Petrograd since 1916, and until—no; I have been going from Petrograd to see our army and to the front, but I have been in Petrograd from March 1, 1918.

Senator NELSON. 1917?

Senator OVERMAN. 1918, he said.

Col. HURBAN. 1918. I have been six months in hospital.

Senator NELSON. During all that time?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Did you belong to a Czecho-Slovak organization while in the Russian Army?

Col. HURBAN. Oh, no. While I was in the Russian Army I was in the Russian Army absolutely as a Russian volunteer.

Senator STERLING. I did not know but what you had a regiment of Czecho-Slovaks with the Russian Army.

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator STERLING. To which you belonged; is that right?

Senator OVERMAN. You stated yesterday that you had 50,000, and you wanted 100,000.

Col. HURBAN. It was our own army. We had afterwards our own army.

Senator NELSON. But the Czecho-Slovak forces did not go to Petrograd, nor they did not go to Moscow.

Col. HURBAN. Why—

Senator NELSON. The Czecho-Slovaks did not go to Petrograd or even to Moscow?

Col. HURBAN. No.

Senator NELSON. They were in Siberia.

Col. HURBAN. No; we have not been. We have been on the front.

Senator NELSON. The Czecho-Slovaks were in Siberia.

Col. HURBAN. No; it is not so.

Senator WOLCOTT. He is referring to Czecho-Slovaks who went out of Austria—left Austria—and went into Russia and joined the Russian forces.

Col. HURBAN. On the front.

Senator WOLCOTT. You were born in Hungary?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. He was born in Hungary, and when the war broke out he went into Russia and volunteered in the Russian Army.

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. A great many other Czecho-Slovaks did that too, did they not?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; and then we started our trip from the Russian front, where we fought with the Germans; we started our trip through Russia—to France through Siberia. That is the reason we were in Siberia.

Senator WOLCOTT. After the war started a great many Czecho-Slovaks deserted the Austrian Army and surrendered?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And you took them into the Russian Army and organized a brigade, did you not?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And you fought with them as a brigade of Czecho-Slovaks under the Russian command?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And you were with that brigade?

Col. HURBAN. No; I was not with this brigade, because I had been detached to Brussiloff's staff. I was on his staff.

Senator OVERMAN. You were on the general staff?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; I was on Brussiloff's staff.

Senator WOLCOTT. Where is he—up in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. No; he is in the army yet.

Senator WOLCOTT. You went up to Petrograd afterwards?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And why did you leave the general staff and go to Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. Because I wanted to work with our own people in our own work.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by "our own work"?

Col. HURBAN. Because we were at that time organized all through the war work in our struggle against Austro-Hungary, and because we had many war prisoners in Russia, we tried to make from them a force to help Russia against Austro-Hungary. This division of men which has been known from our own country, which worked with the people, they started this work.

Senator WOLCOTT. You went to Petrograd to do that work, did you?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. To organize the Czecho-Slovak prisoners into a fighting force?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was your business at Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; that was my business at Petrograd; and at that time it was a very difficult business, because at that time the old régime was against us. But I had been in Russia a long time, and I had many friends, and so, through other people, more or less secretly we organized our force; and as the revolution came our organization grew very quickly. I will explain afterwards about our dealings with the Bolsheviks.

I will not argue more with the ideology of the Bolsheviks. I want to show you how they put their ideas into practice. Nothing about these things has been said, very much, here, nor can I say much of them that is really true.

Senator NELSON. Just tell us what the practices were of the Bolsheviks. That is what we want to know.

Col. HURBAN. Yes; that is what I will tell you. The reason the Bolsheviks succeeded so very quickly at first, you know, they promised peace and bread and—

Senator WOLCOTT. They promised land?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; and land. The provisional government promised that, too; but they promised peace and international brotherhood at the beginning of their agitation.

As the Russian Army began to collapse the provisional government again introduced the death penalty. It was very drastic action to take against them, and the Bolsheviki really succeeded with their argument against the death penalty; but you know that since the Bolsheviki have been in power they have enforced the death penalty. That is everyday bread for them. That is one thing they put into practice. You know how it has been in Petrograd.

I want to tell you several stories in order to illustrate the attitude of the Bolsheviks toward us. When the Kerensky government collapsed the only military force left in Russia was ourselves.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is, the Czecho-Slovaks?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; composed of 50,000 men, and we could have done with Russia what we wanted. We had all of Siberia in our hands, and we could do in Russia absolutely what we wanted. There was no force to do anything against us, because the Bolshevik armies did not exist. The army which had been on the front fled in disorder, looting, and at this time the Germans and the Bolsheviks had only one force which was a real force, and that was the Letts. At this time they had about six regiments of Letts.

Senator STERLING. Making how many men, the six regiments?

Col. HURBAN. About 15,000 men. In regard to the Letts, the Letts are a great people, and they fought the Germans. They hated the Germans. They are the greatest enemies of the Germans, and they fought very bravely in the Russian ranks against the Germans, as voluntary regiments. After the collapse of the Russian armies, the Germans occupied their territory, and the Lettish regiments stayed in Russia. The Bolsheviks promised them money and everything, because the Bolsheviks counted that they would be best supported by people who did not understand them, a foreign people, and they tried to convert those Letts.

The Letts suffered from the German landowners, and we must not wonder at their revolutionary ideas because of the treatment they have received from the German landowners in Russia, the Russian and German landowners who had been supported by the old régime. They have suffered so that their radical socialistic ideas are for them very nice and very agreeable. The Letts were away from their homes, and they had nowhere to go, and had nothing to live on, and the Bolsheviki promised them money and plenty of money, and why not take it? It is a good life, and you know what it means for a soldier who has fought one year or two years in the trenches. His moral judgment is not such as yours who are here in peace and in orderly circumstances. If you see your friends die every day, and these other horrors, your mind is changed and your judgment is altered. I do not wonder that the Letts have been won so quickly and so easily as they have been won to the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Go on and tell us what they did there.

Col. HURBAN. At this time, as I told you, the Bolsheviks had only those Letts, because as to the Russian units of Red Guards, it is to laugh.

Senator NELSON. Did they form what they call Red Guards?

Col. HURBAN. It is for children; it is for boy scouts.

Senator NELSON. The beginning of the Bolshevik army, then, was this detachment of Letts. Did they recruit any more?

Col. HURBAN. I can not say it was the beginning of the Bolshevik army.

Senator NELSON. Did not the Bolsheviks form an Army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, they did.

Senator NELSON. And they started with the Letts, did they not?

Col. HURBAN. No; the Letts have been fighting three years. They have been a ready army.

Senator NELSON. Did they not take the Letts into the Red army?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; they took them.

Senator NELSON. I say they started with them. Now, where did they get the rest of their forces—from what sources?

Col. HURBAN. At this time they had a sort of burglars' army, but it was not a military force. We had been retreating from the Ukraine because the Germans were advancing. The commander in chief of the armies of the soviet socialistic republic was the title of the commandant of the Bolshevik army, and his army consisted of about—I do not know how many thousands.

Senator NELSON. Did they get together an army of some kind there in Petrograd? Did the Bolsheviks get together an army in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. In Petrograd were the Red Guards, but they had only the Letts there, and it was not a considerable force.

Senator NELSON. Well, after they got the Letts did they increase their army. Did they get any more into the Red Guards?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Where did they get them from?

Col. HURBAN. From the people.

Senator NELSON. From the people?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. What class of people?

Col. HURBAN. Pardon me, and I will explain. You can not understand if I jump around.

Senator NELSON. How big a Red army did they get?

Col. HURBAN. When?

Senator NELSON. Well, when it started.

Col. HURBAN. It is very important when.

Senator NELSON. Tell us about the Red army. Go on and tell us about it.

Col. HURBAN. In the beginning there were nothing but the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. I understand there was nothing in the beginning, but go on and tell us how they got their Red Army.

Col. HURBAN. Pardon me, and I will explain my experiences and what the attitude of the Bolsheviks has been toward us, and I think if I explain it you will have a picture of their attitude, and after a while I can answer all your questions. I have not prepared anything, and I must fight with the language, too.

As I told you, when the Bolsheviks started we were the only force. All of the Russians asked us to overthrow the Bolsheviks, but since the Bolsheviks assumed power we have been absolutely neutral, and we had many reasons for that attitude. First, we have been guests in Russia, and we did not have the right to mix ourselves in absolutely Russian questions. That was one thing. The second reason was that we saw the absolute inability of the provisional government and of the other socialistic parties to get out of this trouble, and we thought that the Bolsheviki, because they have nice ideas, would die from themselves, and through the trouble there would arise in Russia a real force which would unite the whole nation. That was our point of view, and that is why we maintained absolute neutrality toward the Bolsheviki.

When the Bolsheviki assumed control, at that time we were on the front in the Ukraine, and the Bolsheviki took Petrograd, and afterwards took Moscow, and then took the headquarters of Miliukov, and now the only province which is not under the soviet government of the Bolsheviki is the Ukraine.

Now, the Bolsheviki formed some kind of an army from the Letts, because the Letts had been held in Petrograd and Moscow to save the government, and they made some kind of an army from the people that they got there, but it was not many thousand men. Then, what they call the Red Guards went to the Ukraine, and in the Ukraine there was the Ukrainian Army which was as absolutely worthless from a military standpoint as the Bolsheviki. As a military organization, they were as absolutely worthless as the Bolsheviki. We were in the middle between them.

Now, what did we do? We maintained absolute neutrality. We only guarded the people and saw that there was no murder and no looting in the zone where we were; but if the Ukrainian army came through our place we let them pass, and if the Bolsheviks came we let them pass; but we proved absolutely to the Bolsheviks that we were not against them. We did not sympathize with them, everybody knows, but we were not against them, because we had no right to be against them.

Second, if we would fight with them we could not go to anyone whom we could trust. There was nobody in Russia to form a government; no one party, no one organization; nobody was there. That is the reason our attitude toward the Bolsheviki was absolutely neutral. We helped to maintain order. At this time one of their commanders, who had formerly been a supporter of the old Tsar's régime, got some hundred million of rubles and went away. I do not know whether he has been killed or not. At this time most of the Bolshevik commissars were from the former guard officers.

I will tell you about two of them to illustrate how these people have acted. They came to the Ukraine and they fought, they came to Kiev and they fought, and in Kiev there were many Russian officers, who were unorganized, and they were murdered like chickens. It is true that perhaps we could fight such a thing, because it would only take one battalion to beat their armies—that is, one battalion from our real military force—but we could not do it, because we fought for our cause and we were saving our army to fight the Germans; and at this time we agreed with the allied commander that our army would be a part of the allied army, a part of the French Army. We accepted the highest command of the French, and our army has been regarded as a part of the French Army. At this time, as I say, we had found a way to get out of Russia and to fight for our cause, because when the peace conference came, if the Czechoslovaks had an army, the peace conference must hear us. They could not refuse, because we would not demobilize. It was our plan that we must have an army. We must be represented as a nation in the peace conference. We would not let our army be demobilized by anybody. It was our plan, and we brought it through, as you know, and our representatives are in the peace conference.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, Colonel, can you not tell us something of the terrorism?

Col. HURBAN. I can tell you about the Bolsheviki. They maintained a secret diplomacy. When the Bolsheviks came into power we dealt with them, and we have dealt with them from the beginning. I told them, "You are here, and it happens that we are here. Let us go out. We do not care about you. Let us go out from Russia. Our plan is to go to France. We have helped to crush Austria-Hungary, which forced upon you the Brest-Litovsk treaty."

Senator NELSON. Did you go out of Russia to France?

Col. HURBAN. We started to go.

Senator NELSON. How far did you go?

Col. HURBAN. I myself came to the United States.

Senator NELSON. I do not mean you. I mean the Czecho-Slovak army.

Col. HURBAN. As you know, many of us were in Vladivostok, and that is what I will tell you. Now, not to make a long story, we dealt with the commissars of the Bolshevik Government and asked them to let us go out, and one way was through Siberia. We said: "We are absolutely loyal to you. Let us go through Siberia." At this time it was in the beginning of March. After the Brest-Litovsk treaty the German representatives came to Moscow, in the foreign department of Mr. Tchitcherin. I do not know whether Mr. Reed from America has been there, but Mr. Williams can tell you that he met there German representatives, German officers, who acted as Russians. Mr. Reed has been there and talked to them, and he must know it.

Our 50,000 men on the western front was nothing, but the political force of our army has been bigger than our one army. The political force of our army corps of 50,000 men has been three or four times stronger than any of the allies, because we have been a regular army from this state against which we are fighting. You understand me? So the Germans made a pressure to disorganize us and stop us. They did that. They tried it. We made an agreement with them that we would prove our neutrality, and we gave them all our arms. We disarmed. We had a great deal of arms. We disarmed, and the Bolsheviki allowed us to go out, but afterwards, after we started our trip, part of our force was in Vladivostok and the other part was on its way to Siberia, 6,000 miles away. When our 50,000 men were on their way to Siberia, 6,000 miles away, we were attacked by the Bolsheviki; not by the Bolshevik government, but these attacks were made by German and Austrian prisoners. The Bolshevik government organized the German prisoners and the German younger officers, not socialists. The commanders of the Bolshevik armies against us were not socialist Germans, but were Prussian officers, different noblemen and everything, and they attacked us, stating that we were going to help Japan, and imperialistic government, and in view of that they attacked us and attempted to destroy us. It was the order of Trotsky to disorganize us and send us to the prison camps as prisoners, and we were disarmed. You know the strength of the Bolsheviki. We had been disarmed and our train had only about 10 rifles and some hand grenades, and, as you know, we were attacked by thousands armed with machine guns; but everywhere we succeeded, and all of Siberia was in our hands in one week. Everywhere the red armies were disarmed, and we started our trip to go out. Afterwards, as you know, came the intervention, and we have been asked by the allies to stay there and hold the Ural front, and not to let the Germans get into Siberia a foot.

Senator OVERMAN. Now come down to Petrograd and the conditions among the people in Petrograd, and the terrorism.

Col. HURBAN. One question which is asked many times is, "How is it possible that 3 per cent can reign over 180,000,000? How is it possible? What you say is not true. The Bolsheviks must be more in Russia." It is absolutely true. I agree with those who have told you that the workmen are not Bolsheviks, the peasants are not Bolsheviks, but the Bolsheviks are only people who are starving, who have not got food, and go in the red army because there they get food. They are the Letts and the Chinese and the Magyars and Germans. The Bolsheviks are ruling absolutely only by terror. The Russian people are accustomed to terror. They have been obedient to the old régime because the old régime governed by terrorism. The Bolsheviks are clever men. They know with whom they are dealing, and they use the same methods, only in a more brutal manner. The red army is now a real, organized military force. It has been organized by German officers, and a large number of the former Russian officers have been forced into it, having no other way to live. The red army is now cruelly disciplined, much more cruelly than it was under the Czar's régime, and with such units you do not need much terrorism. Without any scruples, with shooting and looting and killing you can reign with a few people over many, many men. The other Russian organizations to-day, the socialists parties, the bourgeoisie, the democratic parties, and the libertal parties, are absolutely unable to do anything.

Senator OVERMAN. On account of the terror?

Col. HURBAN. On account of weakness and the inability to unite themselves and understand the big task that is before them. If you were to throw out the Bolsheviks to-day and leave only the Russians you would have exactly the same condition as you have under the Bolsheviks. You would have the Mensheviks, the social revolutionists, the Lettish, the Siberian government, the Bolsheviks. You would have 20 governments, and no one government could make order. You see, half of Siberia is not yet free. They can not organize a strong government, and that is why they now reign absolutely by terror.

Senator OVERMAN. You are making an argument which we all agree is a good one, but I want to know the facts of the reign of terror in those countries.

Col. HURBAN. I can tell you what I saw in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. That is what we want you to tell us—what you saw. We do not care to have any argument. We do not want your argument. We want you to tell us what you saw and heard.

Col. HURBAN. These are facts that I tell. Everybody has his way. It is very hard to tell.

Senator NELSON. What did you see the red guard do in Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. Just as I have described here. The red guard has been absolutely undisciplined. They are absolutely criminals. You have looting, killing; and in Kiev many officers—I do not know how many, but I heard 5,000—have been killed like chickens.

Senator OVERMAN. What became of the old Russian officers in the army, who fought so well?

Col. HURBAN. Some escaped to Siberia. Some stayed there, and a great number of them have been killed.

Senator NELSON. By the Bolsheviks?

Col. HURBAN. By the Bolsheviks, yes; the greater number of them. Those who did not join with them, most of them have been killed. It is not such a story. I had been in the hospital, and the first time I went out I went on the street, and I saw a Russian officer who had been wounded. I had civilian clothes on, and he had a uniform. We came to a red guard, and he shoots him down with me. Such things we have every day.

Senator OVERMAN. They are shooting people on the streets every day?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. When did you leave Petrograd?

Col. HURBAN. In the beginning of March, 1918.

Senator NELSON. Last March?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You were sent over here by your country as a representative?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. You are a delegate from the Czecho-Slavs?

Col. HURBAN. I am now military attaché here in our legation.

Senator NELSON. You have a legation here?

Col. HURBAN. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is your minister?

Col. HURBAN. Mr. ———.

Senator NELSON. The government you hope to form in Europe——

Col. HURBAN. We have formed it.

Senator NELSON. That is not a part of Hungary; it is Bohemia and Moravia?

Col. HURBAN. Slovakia is a part of Hungary.

Senator NELSON. The government you propose to form there, or have formed, as you say, is Bohemia, or what the Germans call Perma, and then Moravia or Moraine, and what you call Slovakia.

Col. HURBAN. Silesia and Slovakia; yes.

Senator NELSON. And that constitutes the new State of Bohemia? What name have you given it?

Col. HURBAN. We do not care about the name. We have much more.

Senator NELSON. You have given the state some name, have you not?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you call it?

Col. HURBAN. I do not know, myself, yet how it will be.

Senator NELSON. You are likely to call it Bohemia, are you not?

Col. HURBAN. No; we do not like that name.

Senator NELSON. That is the old name.

Col. HURBAN. Because many people, if you say Bohemia, think they are gypsies.

Senator NELSON. What is the Czech name for Bohemia?

Col. HURBAN. The Czechs. What they call it now is not Bohemia, but Czechs.

Senator NELSON. You call them Czechs?

Col. HURBAN. Czechs and Czecho-Slovaks.

Senator NELSON. Is that the name of the country, Czechs?

Col. HURBAN. No: Czechs is like English.

Senator NELSON. Well, that is the name of the people. What do you call the country in your language—in the Czech language?

Col. HURBAN. Czecho, and Czecho-Slovaks are the people.

Senator NELSON. We call it in English Bohemia, and the Germans call it Perma. Now, what do you call it? What do the Bohemians call it in their language?

Col. HURBAN. They call a part Bohemia, because Bohemia is only one part.

Senator NELSON. Well, you do not answer the question. Why do you not tell us something? Have not the Bohemians a name for their country?

Col. HURBAN. Now; the new state?

Senator NELSON. No; have they not had a name for their country?

Col. HURBAN. Sure.

Senator NELSON. In the Bohemian language?

Col. HURBAN. Czecho.

Senator NELSON. Is that the name of it?

Col. HURBAN. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is the Bohemian name for the country?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; for one part of it, one state.

Senator NELSON. What is the Czech name for Moravia?

Col. HURBAN. It is Moravia, and then Silesia and Slovakia; but how it will be called the next time, I do not know.

Senator NELSON. The capital of your new state is Prague?

Col. HURBAN. Yes; Prague.

Senator NELSON. Do you take in any part of Silesia?

Col. HURBAN. It is a question for the peace conference now.

Senator OVERMAN. Where is Prague—in what province?

Col. HURBAN. It is in Bohemia. Now, I want to tell you about this terror. As we started our trip the Bolsheviki everywhere tried to attack us, and they used this terror.

Senator NELSON. In order that we may get a clear idea—how did you get out of the country? You left there in March. Which way did you come out of the country? Did you come by Vladivostok?

Col. HURBAN. I was with our troops, and we came with the first train which was on the way, and we came to Vladivostok. Our president has been here in this country.

Senator NELSON. Tell us what you saw on your journey. What did the Czecho-Slovaks do there? Tell us about that.

Col. HURBAN. I have been going as a member of our provisional government.

Senator NELSON. I know, but coming through on the railroad to Vladivostok, did you not see any Czecho-Slovak forces?

Col. HURBAN. I have been in those forces.

Senator NELSON. Then, why not tell us?

Col. HURBAN. That is what I am telling.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead.

Col. HURBAN. I can tell you something like that. The train that I was on had about 900 soldiers on it—one battalion—and as we came through we gave our arms away to prove our loyalty toward the Bolsheviks. At every station where there was a soviet we were surrounded by red guards—so-called red guards, for the most part Germans—and we had some arms, and in the night we were all surrounded by machine guns, and they came in and said we must give up all the rest of our arms or we would be shot down. We began to talk with the Russians, but not with the Germans. The Germans we did not talk with; we killed them. You could argue with these people because they knew we were not afraid of them. It so happened that some of the trains coming to Vladivostok encountered big disturbances. My train was not in the fighting, but only the trains which had been attacked by the Germans and the Magyar red guards which were under their command. As we were going through Siberia, which was in the hands of the Bolsheviks, we were going on the Amur Railroad, the northern railroad.

Senator NELSON. You went down the Amur?

Col. HURBAN. The Amur railroad through to Vladivostok.

Senator NELSON. You did not go down the Amur, then, to the mouth?

Col. HURBAN. Everywhere the Russians asked us to overthrow the Bolsheviks. The peasants came and begged us to overthrow the Bolsheviks. We told them it was not our business.

Senator OVERMAN. What would become of the people there if the army moved out?

Col. HURBAN. After we got to Siberia we stayed in Siberia, and afterwards we got all of Siberia in our hands.

I will tell you an interesting thing. I talked with the engineer and asked him if he voted for the soviet. "No; I have no right to vote." "Why?" "Because on my engine are two men who are heating the engine, and I must direct those people how to heat the engine, and because I must direct them I am an oppressor, and I have no right to vote." Only these people vote who work on the engine.

If you have some questions, I would like to answer.

Senator OVERMAN. If you have a statement in writing, you may put it in the record.

Col. HURBAN. All right.

Mr. HUMES. Did you see any of the terrorism of the Bolsheviks in Kiev?

(Maj. Edwin Lowry Humes was honorably discharged from the Army of the United States on February 18, 1919, and thereafter in civilian life continued to act as counsel to the subcommittee.)

Col. HURBAN. I was in the hospital in Petrograd. I did not see it. I did see it in Petrograd many times, but not in Kiev. But we have photographs of those things, because our Army has been there. Two of our officers have been killed by mistake.

Mr. HUMES. Have you photographs illustrating the barbarity and the cruelties and the assassinations over there?

Col. HURBAN. No; all these are here in our Army. I can tell you one thing. We have a photograph by an officer who came from Vladivostok, of a doctor, a Russian man, who helped our wounded men when we fought with the Bolsheviki and the Germans, and who had been captured by the Bolsheviki and killed. His photograph I can show you.

Mr. HUMES. He was a doctor?

Col. HURBAN. He was a doctor. He helped our wounded men, and he had been captured, and his photograph we have here.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that he be allowed to put in a written statement, and that will save us time.

Senator OVERMAN. All right, you just put in your written statement. You can write it out and put it in the record.

Col. HURBAN. That will be much easier for me.

Senator OVERMAN. Just put it in the record so we can read it. We are much obliged to you.

Col. HURBAN. I would like to say here that the greater part of what Mr. John Reed and Mr. Nuorteva and Mr. Williams said about us to the working people of Chicago is a lie.

TESTIMONY OF MR. CARL W. ACKERMAN.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you live?

Mr. ACKERMAN. New York City.

Mr. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Correspondent, New York Times.

Mr. HUMES. Have you recently been in Russia and Siberia?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I have been in Siberia for three months.

Mr. HUMES. When did you leave Siberia?

Mr. ACKERMAN. On the 23d of December.

Senator WOLCOTT. Last?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Will you state to the committee in your own way just what you observed with reference to the practical operations of the Bolsheviki wherever they are carrying on their activities?

Mr. ACKERMAN. When I was in Siberia, of course, the Bolsheviki were not in power. I went there in October after the allies had landed in Vladivostok. At that time there was in existence in Omsk an all-Russian government, which had been selected at Ufa and organized in Omsk. This government was composed of a directorate of five men, of a council of ministers, and a constituent assembly. When I arrived in Omsk this government was still in power, but on the 16th of November it was overthrown and the Kolchak dictatorship came in power, and since then Kolchak has been the supreme commander of Siberia, with everybody else questioning his authority.

Mr. HUMES. Is he a Bolshevik?

Mr. ACKERMAN. No; he is not. What his politics are no one knows. He probably represents the military party, although he states that he is in favor of a constituent assembly to decide what form of government Russia should have.

Senator OVERMAN. You did not observe the Bolsheviki?

Mr. ACKERMAN. The Bolsheviki are very strong in Siberia, and their propaganda is the strongest propaganda in Siberia to-day. They are not in power, however; that is, they do not have the political power.

Senator NELSON. In whose hands is the power there?

Mr. ACKERMAN. The power, when I left in December, was divided. Admiral Kolchak, who was supposed to be the supreme dictator and the head of the Siberian government, controlled practically the district around Omsk and the Ural Mountain district. When I left Omsk and was on my way to Irkutsk I passed through the district which was controlled by the Cossack leader, Onankoff. At that time Onankoff declared he would not support Kolchak, and when I arrived at another town another Cossack leader was in power, and he said he would not support Kolchak.

Senator NELSON. And they were anti-Bolshevik?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Yes; they were all anti-Bolshevik.

Senator NELSON. So the Bolshevik authorities have no power in Siberia?

Mr. ACKERMAN. They have no political power; no, sir.

Senator NELSON. And the power is divided between the forces that Admiral Kolchak is trying to gather up, and the Cossacks?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Yes, sir. The Bolsheviki, however, are very active in Siberia, and everywhere I went I heard of their propaganda. Everyone speaks of it, including Americans and Czechoslovaks who were in various cities.

Senator NELSON. Did you get off of the railroad and go back into the country?

Mr. ACKERMAN. No, sir; I did not.

Senator NELSON. Did you stop at the stations and converse with the people? Can you talk Russian?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I can not speak Russian. I had the very good fortune of traveling with Mr. Bernstein, who speaks Russian, and also interviewed the people through my attorney. In the cities I had my interpreter and traveled with the interpreter.

Senator OVERMAN. You can not tell us anything of the acts of terrorism of the Bolsheviki there, at all?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I do not know anything from first hand information as to the Bolsheviki terrorism.

Senator NELSON. Did you go as far west as Perm?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I was not as far west as Perm. I went as far west as one could go at that time. Perm was taken after we left.

Senator NELSON. You were just barely across the Ural Mountains?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And did not go into Russia proper?

Mr. ACKERMAN. No, sir.

(At 12.05 p. m. the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 20, 1919, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 2,30 o'clock p. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Wolcott, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The subcommittee will come to order. Miss Bryant will be heard now.

Miss Bryant, do you believe in God and in the sanctity of an oath?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly I believe in the sanctity of an oath.

Senator KING. Do you believe there is a God?

Miss BRYANT. I suppose there is a God. I have no way of knowing.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe in the Christian religion?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly not. I believe all people should have whatever religion they wish, because that is one of the things—

Senator NELSON. You are not a Christian, then?

Miss BRYANT. I was christened in the Catholic church.

Senator NELSON. What are you now, a Christian?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I suppose that I am.

Senator NELSON. And you do not believe in Christ?

Miss BRYANT. I did not say that I did not believe in Christ.

Senator NELSON. But do you believe in Christ?

Miss BRYANT. I believe in the teachings of Christ, Senator Nelson.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you believe in God?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, I will concede that I believe in God, Senator Overman.

Senator KING. This is important, because a person who has no conception of God does not have any idea of the sanctity of an oath, and an oath would be meaningless.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you believe in a punishment hereafter and a reward for duty?

Miss BRYANT. It seems to me as if I were being tried for witchcraft.

Senator OVERMAN. It is not, at all.

Miss BRYANT. I did not hear any other witness put through such an ordeal.

Senator OVERMAN. It is not an ordeal. It is the ordinary procedure in court to see if a witness appreciates the sanctity of an oath.

Miss BRYANT. Very well; I will concede—I will concede that there is a hell.

Senator WOLCOTT. I did not ask you that.

Miss BRYANT. Or that there is a life hereafter.

TESTIMONY OF LOUISE BRYANT.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Miss BRYANT. I certainly do; and I wish to state that I have come before this committee at my own request.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, I want to find out about matters in Russia and what you observed there. What is your name?

Miss BRYANT. I will be glad to give you my name and my ancestry or anything you wish. My name is Mrs. John Reed. My legal name is Louise Bryant. In New York State a woman can keep her pen name for her legal name. That is the name that I have used as a correspondent for many years.

Senator OVERMAN. Louise Bryant; and your real name is?

Miss BRYANT. Mrs. John Reed. Just the same as Mrs. George Cram Cook has used the name of Susan Glaspell, her pen name, and Mary Heaton Vorse, who is Mrs. O'Brien.

Senator OVERMAN. If you will answer the questions as we ask them of you, we can get along much better.

Miss BRYANT. Senator Overman, I know that I have certain rights as an American citizen. I know that I can answer these questions to the best of my ability, and that no previous witness has been stopped, and if you stop me you do not give me a fair trial.

Senator WOLCOTT. You are not on trial.

Miss BRYANT. I feel as if I were.

Senator KING. You asked to come here, and we can hear you or not, as we prefer. We will ask you certain questions and you can answer them as you please.

Senator OVERMAN. Your home is in New York?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Where have you been living since you have been in Washington?

Miss BRYANT. I stopped for a while at the National Women's Party headquarters, and then I went to the Capitol Park Hotel, where I am at present.

Senator OVERMAN. You got up this meeting here in Washington?

Miss BRYANT. I did not. I have requests, and all people coming from Russia have more requests than they can answer, to tell what they know about Russia, because people are anxious to know the truth about Russia. That was only one of many meetings at which I spoke.

Senator NELSON. You said that you were at the National Women's Party headquarters?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Did you belong to the picket squad?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know what that has to do with the truth about Russia, but I did. I believe in equality for women as well as for men, even in my own country.

Senator NELSON. Did you participate in the burning of the President's message?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You did not participate in the burning in effigy?

Miss BRYANT. I did; and I went on a hunger strike.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you mean by that; you went to jail?

Miss BRYANT. I went to jail and went on a hunger strike. If you go without food and become weak, the authorities let you out because they do not want you to die in prison.

Senator KING. Where did you live before you lived in New York? You lived in Oregon, did you not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. And were the wife of a dentist there?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir. I wish you would let me, please, tell you something about Russia.

Senator KING. We want to know something about the character of the person who testifies, so that we can determine what credit to give to the testimony. Then, you afterwards married Mr. Reed?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. And you and Mr. Reed went to Russia?

Miss BRYANT. We did.

Senator KING. You swore down in the State Department before you went to Russia that you would not engage in political propaganda there?

Miss BRYANT. I did; and I kept my word.

Senator KING. You have answered my question?

Miss BRYANT. I did.

Senator KING. You engaged in political propaganda there?

Miss BRYANT. I did not engage in political propaganda. I made certain reports to Col. Robins.

Senator KING. You participated in meetings of the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Please prove that, will you, that I participated in soviet meetings?

Senator KING. You participated in Bolshevik meetings?

Miss BRYANT. How did I? I took down notes as a reporter.

Senator KING. Just answer the question.

Miss BRYANT. No, sir; I did not.

Senator KING. You were present at those meetings?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly; all the reporters were.

Senator KING. And your husband and Mr. Albert Rhys Williams were on the staff of the Bolsheviks for the purpose of preparing propaganda for—

Miss BRYANT. A revolution in Germany.

Senator KING. For the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; for a revolution in Germany. I must be exact.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did your husband also, before he left, take the oath that he would not engage in propaganda?

Miss BRYANT. My husband is in this audience. Ask him.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am asking if you know.

Miss BRYANT. I wish to refer that to Mr. Reed. I do not have to answer that, and I will not.

Senator WOLCOTT. I will ask you this: Did your husband in your presence take such an oath, do you know?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he took such an oath, but I will have to explain that Col. Robins was particularly pleased to have him get certain information into Germany through the soviets. He was very glad to have him go into the foreign office.

Senator WOLCOTT. Your husband, then, in Russia, did engage in Soviet propaganda?

Miss BRYANT. My husband in Russia did a great deal toward bringing about the German revolution.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have not answered my question.

Miss BRYANT. That is an answer to your question.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did your husband when in Russia engage in any political activities?

Miss BRYANT. Why, not that I know of, except that he worked in the foreign office.

Senator NELSON. Let me ask this. Was your husband employed by the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Employed for what purpose?

Miss BRYANT. He worked in the propaganda department, and I will show you the kind of papers. There has never been any secret about this propaganda. For instance—

Senator NELSON. We do not care about that.

Miss BRYANT. You do not care about it?

Senator NELSON. About those papers. We want the facts.

Miss BRYANT. Those are the facts. You must admit the facts. Here is a paper printed in German, prepared for sending into the German lines in order to make—

Senator NELSON. Do not be so impertinent. [Applause and hisses.]

Senator OVERMAN. I do not want any more noise or we will have an executive session and close this meeting. I want to treat this lady respectfully.

Miss BRYANT. I hope you will.

Senator OVERMAN. We want to get the facts, to examine her according to law, but I want her, at the same time—

Miss BRYANT. You said, Senator Overman, that I am not on trial here. I am a free American citizen. I expect to be treated with the same courtesy as former witnesses, and I have not gotten it so far. [Applause.]

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am going to suggest that this room be cleared and that no further testimony be taken until the room is cleared.

Miss BRYANT. Everybody out? I will not testify unless it is before an open session. It is very necessary that these things be known.

Senator KING. The stenographer will be here.

Miss BRYANT. All other witnesses testified in open session.

Senator WOLCOTT. I make this suggestion, that the press reporters remain and the stenographer remain; that the testimony be written up and the witness be allowed to have a copy of it, and anybody else in the public may have a copy of it.

Miss BRYANT. May I correct my copy?

Senator WOLCOTT. But this audience, which persists in applauding, should be invited to leave the room.

Senator OVERMAN. I propose that she have an opportunity to be heard. The stenographer will remain and the newspaper reporters, but the public will go out.

Miss BRYANT. May I have the courtesy of going over my remarks?

Senator OVERMAN. You shall have. You shall have the same courtesy as any other witness.

Miss BRYANT. I ask that they remain.

Senator OVERMAN. I have ordered them to leave the room.

Miss BRYANT. You see, I am the only witness on the other side; the only witness, so far, who wants to bring about amicable relations between Russia and America.

Mr. JOHN REED. May I stay? I am John Reed, Miss Bryant's husband.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Has everybody left except the reporters? If there is anybody here not a reporter, I will ask him to retire.

I want it to appear on the record that at the beginning of this hearing a demonstration occurred, and I warned the spectators that if there were any more demonstrations of that kind I would clear the room, and in less than 10 minutes there was a much larger and more vociferous demonstration, and it looked as though we could not proceed with the crowd with this demonstration, and I cleared the room, all except the newspaper reporters and the stenographer, and the testimony of the witness will be put into the record for the world to see.

Senator KING. May I ask a question, just in line with what I was asking a moment ago? Mrs. Reed, your husband and Albert Rhys Williams were members of the international revolutionary propaganda under the direction of Boris Reinstein, of Buffalo, N. Y.?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he is now Lenine's secretary.

Senator KING. Lenine's secretary?

Miss BRYANT. At the present moment.

Senator KING. He went over from this country?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but he is a Russian.

Senator KING. And they worked with other American socialists who are over there, who went over from this country?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; there has never been any secret about that.

Senator KING. So that your husband and Albert Rhys Williams were propagandists there for the international revolutionary propaganda?

Miss BRYANT. I would not quite exactly say that. You have to specify. I know that they worked in that office, and I put it into my book. If I had intended to cover up anything, I would not have done that.

Senator KING. You have stated this, have you not:

Next door was the newly founded Bureau of International Revolutionary Propaganda, under the head of Boris Reinstein of Buffalo, N. Y.—

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING (continuing reading):

where also worked two other American Socialists, John Reed and Albert Rhys Williams.

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING. So that your husband and Mr. Albert Rhys Williams were connected with the International Revolutionary Propaganda?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; but they had very particular work to do. I think the committee ought certainly to understand this. That is why I brought these papers. It is the only evidence to prove what they did.

Senator KING. I was asking if they belonged?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; I would not have written it if they had not, and they never have denied it. In fact, if you will permit, Mr. Reed will explain the whole thing.

Senator KING. In that department was a man named Radek?

MISS BRYANT. Radek; yes.

Senator KING. Who is now under arrest in Germany because of his efforts there to create revolution, and to lead the Spartacides to murder, and to destruction of the form of government which Ebert has formed?

MISS BRYANT. I do not follow you at all.

Senator KING. He is in Germany?

MISS BRYANT. To the best of my knowledge. I do not know, except what I have read in the papers.

Senator KING. And he was there for the purpose of aiding the Spartacides?

MISS BRYANT. I suppose so; but I must tell you—I must explain. You see, the Ebert government worked in harmony with the Kaiser, and the Spartacides, with Liebknecht at the head, were always against him, and Radek, of course, naturally worked with the Spartacides and did not work with the Ebert government, for Ebert, to him, is no different than the Kaiser.

Senator KING. But the Kaiser has abdicated, and the Ebert government has taken charge under an election by the people of Germany, and Radek has tried to destroy that government, and he left the Spartacides to overthrow the existing government in Germany. Is that true or not? Answer yes or no.

MISS BRYANT. I can not answer yes or no. I will say that he is there, and is against the Ebert government, of course, because they (the Spartacides) do not trust the Ebert government; they fight with the Ebert government, and would as soon have the Kaiser back.

Senator KING. But they are trying to destroy the Ebert government?

MISS BRYANT. I suppose they are.

Senator KING. You, of course, knew of your husband's propaganda work in Russia?

MISS BRYANT. Of course I did.

Senator KING. And participated with him in that work?

MISS BRYANT. Oh, I object when you say propaganda work. May I be allowed an explanation?

Senator KING. Very well, you participated with him in propaganda work?

MISS BRYANT. I never did.

Senator KING. When did you leave Russia?

MISS BRYANT. I left after the Constituent Assembly had been dissolved.

Senator KING. What date?

Miss BRYANT. That was in the latter part of January.

Senator KING. Of last year, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING. You then went to Stockholm?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING. And you carried with you when you went to Stockholm this statement or passport given by the Bolshevik government, did you?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I did. I went as a courier.

Senator KING (reading):

This is given to a representative of the American Social Democracy, an internationalist and comrade—Louise Bryant.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING (reading):

The military revolutionary committee of the Petrograd Council of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies gives her the right of free travel—

Miss BRYANT. No; that is another. There are two passes. One is a reporter's pass to the front.

Senator KING. You are denominated a "comrade" by the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. All persons in Russia are comrades who are not enemies, so that has no significance. Just as in the French revolution people were called citizens, in the Russian revolution they are called comrades.

Senator KING. Would they have called a representative of this country "comrade"?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. Mr. Robins was called "comrade."

Senator KING. Would they call Mr. Francis "comrade"?

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Francis was not popular in Russia and they did not think that he represented America. They thought Col. Robins did.

Senator NELSON. Who thought so?

Miss BRYANT. The Russian people very largely; all the Russian people felt that Col. Robins was a true representative of America; that he was a more representative American than Ambassador Francis was. They considered Mr. Francis to be an old man, entirely out of sympathy with the revolutionary movement.

Senator WOLCOTT. And they felt that he—Mr. Robins—was in sympathy with the revolutionists?

Miss BRYANT. Not exactly; but they felt that Mr. Francis was hostile to the Socialists, and they felt that Robins was the better man to bring about amicable relations.

Senator NELSON. Did you not know that Mr. Robins was not the representative of our country?

Miss BRYANT. Col. Robins was the head of the Red Cross there.

Senator NELSON. But the Red Cross did not represent our Government.

Miss BRYANT. Nevertheless, we worked with Col. Robins. In fact, Col. Robins acted as the intermediary between Ambassador Francis and the soviets, because Francis felt that he could not get in touch with them, that there was a certain feeling of hostility, and so Robins went to them in place of Francis, and if you will call Robins he will tell you all this himself.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know where he is?

Miss BRYANT. He is in New York, and I know absolutely that he is very anxious to testify before this committee, and he has not been asked.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is his address?

Miss BRYANT. Care of his sister, Mary Dryer. I could get him myself on short notice.

Senator KING. I want to call attention to one other matter. You had a certificate, did you not, dated January 7, 1918, as follows [reading]:

The bearer of this certificate, Louise Bryant, is going to Stockholm as a courier of the People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs and is taking along sealed bags and packages. It is requested that all those in authority show her assistance on her journey, and particularly with her baggage.

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator KING (continuing reading):

Assistant to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Zalkind. Stamp of the People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs.

Now, you have such a certificate?

Miss BRYANT. I had such a certificate.

Senator KING. That was issued by the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir. There was no one else to issue it.

Senator KING. You were called a courier of the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. "The People's Commissar" of the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir. Will you please let me explain?

Senator KING. You were authorized by the Bolshevik government to take such bags and packages, and were denominated their courier, so that when you came to this country you came as a courier of the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. I did not. I explained all that in my book, and that is a matter——

Senator KING. We will come to that. Did your duties as courier cease when you got to Stockholm?

Miss BRYANT. Of course; yes.

Senator KING. But you were a detailed courier as the representative of the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Not a courier to anybody. The fact was that there was only one way to get through the fighting lines, and that was to go as a courier. So they gave couriers' papers to a number of Americans that went there. Prof. Ross went as a courier, and Madeline Doty, and Miss Bessie Beatty put her papers in her bag, so that they would not be molested. And I brought things like this [indicating], because I wanted to come home and write my books and articles, and I did not want them to be taken away from me.

Senator KING. Did your husband go with you?

Miss BRYANT. No; he came later.

Senator KING. When did you come to the United States?

Miss BRYANT. In March.

Senator KING. When did Mr. Reed come?

Miss BRYANT. About four months later.

Senator KING. When did Mr. Albert Rhys Williams come to the United States?

Miss BRYANT. He came very much later. He has not been here very long—just about two months.

Senator KING. Mr. Williams was there engaged in propaganda work?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes.

Senator KING. And since he came here he has been engaged in propaganda work, has he not?

Miss BRYANT. Now, if you just let me answer "yes" or "no" I do not tell you anything.

Senator OVERMAN. I think she is entitled to explain.

Senator KING. Mr. Williams came to the United States after he had been in the employ of the revolutionary government, the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; Mr. Williams was organizing the foreign legion, which was organized to fight the incoming Germans, after the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, but most all the foreigners and war prisoners in Russia did not believe in the invasion of Germany into Russia, but Mr. Williams organized that foreign legion and that was one of his last activities in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You said you wanted to explain.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; Mr. Williams came back to this country with a paper which was read by the naval intelligence or the military intelligence, I do not know which, and which they have since returned to him, saying that he had come to open a bureau of information for the soviet government, in order to bring about more amicable relations and to tell the truth. He never has denied that.

Senator KING. He is the representative, then, of the soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. He is not a representative. He is simply a man who wants to open an information bureau, but Mr. Williams can tell you about that better than I can.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he employed by the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. I do not imagine he is in their employ. I imagine he does it just to give information to people who want to know about Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. You said your husband was in the employment of the Bolshevik government.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you in their employ?

Miss BRYANT. I was never in their employ.

Senator OVERMAN. But your husband was?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What salary was being paid him?

Miss BRYANT. The same salary which they all got—the same salary as Lenine and Trotzky—$50 a month.

Senator OVERMAN. And what they could pick up on the side?

Miss BRYANT. No; they could not pick up anything. It was very dangerous, Senator Overman, to "pick up" anything in Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. They picked up hotels and palaces.

Miss BRYANT. Why do you say that? You were not there and I was.

Senator WOLCOTT. We have had testimony here that they lived in beautiful palaces and rode in Pierce-Arrow automobiles.

Miss BRYANT. I do not know of any that lived in palaces after the soviets came into power. I knew Trotzky quite well, and I know that he lived with the utmost frugality.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know him before you left here?

Miss BRYANT. No; I met him simply as any reporter would, in Russia. I used to go to Smolny Institute and to his office and ask him if he would tell me about current events in Russia, which he very gladly did.

Senator OVERMAN. What did you go to Russia for?

Miss BRYANT. For the Metropolitan Magazine and the Philadelphia Public Ledger and a number of magazines.

Senator OVERMAN. Are you a correspondent for that paper now?

Miss BRYANT. I am not now. I am a foreign correspondent. I mean I was in France before and then I went to Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What foreign papers do you correspond for?

Miss BRYANT. Not for foreign papers. I am an American correspondent and go to foreign countries and write about conditions in foreign countries. My articles were sold by the Ledger and printed in conservative papers in almost every city in the United States and in Canada and in South America—these very same articles you are reading here.

Senator OVERMAN. Suppose you tell us what the condition in Russia is under this Bolshevik government.

Miss BRYANT. I will be very glad to do it.

Senator STERLING. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Humes ask such questions as he cares to and then that the witness make any general statements that the committee feels proper.

Senator OVERMAN. I think she wants to tell us about Russia.

Miss BRYANT. I want to tell you about one thing before anything else—about the so-called nationalization of women, which has been so largely discussed here. You see, I was particularly interested in how women would act under the revolutionary government in Russia, because I had always known that Russian women had gone to Siberia, as many as the men, and sometimes more, and that they were particularly interested in freedom, and I wondered how they would act. I was particularly interested, so naturally I feel very badly that we are so confused over these decrees, because the decrees—

Senator OVERMAN. Do not go into that.

Miss BRYANT (continuing). The decree of Saratov. I have got to go into that before I can explain anything to you.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there a decree about the nationalization of women?

Miss BRYANT. There was a decree, but it is not true that there was a soviet decree.

Senator OVERMAN. That is all we want to know, whether it was true or not.

Miss BRYANT. That can not be all you want to know, because all the other witnesses went to great length to tell you it was true.

Senator OVERMAN. They said there was such a decree, and furnished a copy of it.

Miss BRYANT. By an anarchist club in Saratov.

Senator OVERMAN. You say that was not issued by the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. No. I want to say, Senator Overman, further, that anarchists of the sort that would issue such a decree who were not imprisoned were shot for issuing this decree and for other disorders, and surely no one here would want a more severe punishment meted out to them.

Mr. HUMES. Is Izvestija an official paper of the soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but everything printed in it does not mean that the soviets agree to it.

Mr. HUMES. Have you seen a decree on the nationalization of women which was published in Izvestija?

Miss BRYANT. I think it is just exactly what I have here.

Mr. HUMES. Whom was it signed by?

Miss BRYANT. I am mistaken; I do not have it here, but I will tell you about it. The decree of Saratov had nothing to do with the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. I am not talking about Saratov; I am talking about a decree that was published in the official soviet organ, the Izvestija.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Have you seen that decree?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but not in the Izvestija.

Mr. HUMES. Was that decree not published with the authority of the soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. No; that decree was published—you see, for instance, Maj. Humes, if the American Government would publish something and say it was the work of a certain anarchist club, that it was the work of a certain group of anarchists, that would not mean that the United States Government approved of the action of that club.

Mr. HUMES. I am not talking about an anarchist decree.

Miss BRYANT. There never was a soviet decree.

Mr. HUMES. You say the Izvestija did not publish a decree in which, among other things, the following was contained:

A girl having reached her eighteenth year is to be announced as the property of the state. Any girl having reached her eighteenth year and not having married is obliged, subject to the most severe penalty, to register at the bureau of free love in the commissariat of surveillance.

Was that ever published in Izvestija?

Miss BRYANT. I read such a decree, but not in Izvestija.

Mr. HUMES. Just answer the question and explain afterwards. Was not that published in Izvestija?

Miss BRYANT. I can give you an explanation.

Mr. HUMES. What was the explanation?

Miss BRYANT. The explanation is that it was not a soviet decree and——

Mr. HUMES. Have you got the paper in which those explanations appear?

MISS BRYANT. No; but I have a very important statement here, issued very recently by the head of the Y. M. C. A., saying that he himself—I refer to Mr. Davis—investigated the whole thing, and that he was in Saratov at the time.

MR. HUMES. Let us get away from Saratov.

MISS BRYANT. Vladimir also; and it is the same thing in both towns. I have the statement which he issued, and I certainly believe he knows what he was talking about.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Let me interject a question. What paper was that statement of the Y. M. C. A. man published in?

MISS BRYANT. The copy I have here was published in the New York Call.

MR. HUMES. When was the statement made?

MISS BRYANT. The statement was made, I suppose, day before yesterday. It was in yesterday's Call.

SENATOR STERLING. A Socialist paper?

MISS BRYANT. But Davis was the head of the Y. M. C. A. in Russia, and I suppose it was printed in a good many other papers, but I do not know.

MR. HUMES. Mr. Davis has been defending the soviet government and the Bolshevik government of Russia since his return to this country?

MISS BRYANT. A great many heads of departments also have done more or less the same thing. It is the undersecretaries of the Y. M. C. A. and various organizations and the bank clerks who have been against it.

MR. HUMES. When did you secure your passport to leave this country for Russia?

MISS BRYANT. In August; early in August.

MR. HUMES. In 1917?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. When did you sail?

MISS BRYANT. I believe it was on the 9th; I am not sure.

MR. HUMES. The 9th of August?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. When did you arrive in Russia?

MISS BRYANT. I arrived—

MR. HUMES. I mean approximately.

MISS BRYANT. Early in September.

MR. HUMES. Where did you arrive, at Petrograd?

MISS BRYANT. It was just at the time of the Korniloff revolt. I came through Finland—around that way.

MR. HUMES. You arrived in Russia while the Kerensky government was in power?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. In September?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. You were there for a time up until the revolution of October, or rather November?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; I was there a long time after that.

MR. HUMES. You were there before that time?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Were you in Petrograd during all of that time?

Miss BRYANT. A good deal of the time.

Mr. HUMES. Where else were you?

Miss BRYANT. In Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. How long were you in Moscow?

Miss BRYANT. I went there at the time of the street fighting. I wanted to go down and get the story, and I went down there at the time the fiercest fighting was on.

Mr. HUMES. At the time of the internal disorders?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; at the time of the internal disorders the fiercest street fighting took place in Moscow, and I went down.

Mr. HUMES. That was while the civil war and rioting was in progress in Moscow?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long were you there?

Miss BRYANT. Three or four days, and then I went back to Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Then you went back to Petrograd. When was that with reference to the time the Bolsheviki revolution broke out?

Miss BRYANT. I was in Petrograd at the time the Bolshevik revolution broke out.

Mr. HUMES. How long before that time had you been there?

Miss BRYANT. I had been there since I came to Russia.

Mr. HUMES. I mean between the time you left Moscow until the—

Miss BRYANT. Well, you see, I did not go down to Moscow until after the Bolshevik revolution began.

Mr. HUMES. You were in Petrograd continually up until the Bolshevik revolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And that occurred early in November, according to our calendar?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long after the Bolshevik revolution and the Bolshevik régime did you remain in Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. I stayed until after the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. When did they meet?

Miss BRYANT. They met in January.

Mr. HUMES. In January, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Then when did you leave Russia for Stockholm as a courier?

Miss BRYANT. I just said I left in January, the latter part of January.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say the constituent assembly was in January, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; the 6th of January.

Senator STERLING. Where did it meet?

Miss BRYANT. It met in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. The constituent assembly met in January and was dissolved by the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Do you remember the date?

Miss BRYANT. Not exactly, but if you want the exact dates I have them in my book.

Mr. HUMES. I do not want it exactly, but just approximately.

Miss BRYANT. I am a reporter and go a good deal on my notes, but I think it was January 6, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. Were you present at the time of its dissolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir; I was present at the dissolution of the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. It was dissolved forcibly, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know that you would call it forcibly. It was held in a room like this, and a couple of sailors stepped in and said, "All the good people have gone home; why don't you go?" And they went.

Mr. HUMES. Were they armed?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir; the two sailors were armed. You see the politicians sat around and everybody else had gone home.

Mr. HUMES. Was there any constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. That was the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. There was not any other constituent assembly while you were there?

Miss BRYANT. No; the idea seemed to be very dead, and it did not seem as though the adherents had vitality to do anything more.

Senator KING. Did you see any other armed forces there at that time besides these two sailors?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; there were guards around the palace.

Senator KING. They were around the building there, were they?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir. Petrograd was under martial law.

Senator KING. They were Bolshevik guards, were they not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; Lettish guards.

Senator STERLING. Lettish, did you say, Miss Bryant?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; some were Letts.

Mr. HUMES. Was anybody killed in the dissolution of the constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. No. Some one was killed before then in some sort of demonstration, but not——

Mr. HUMES. Some member of the constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. No; not a member of the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. How many guards were around there outside of the constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. The only armed men you saw on the inside were those two sailors?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and the sailors that were standing by the door.

Mr. HUMES. How many people were in the room at the time the two sailors came in?

Miss BRYANT. The hall was not as crowded as it was at the beginning, because after the soviet defenders read their challenge and the right wing of the constituent assembly did not agree to it, they, the left wing, got up and went out, and the right wing stayed there and discussed the situation. They talked and talked until about 2 o'clock in the morning, and the sailors stayed there, and seemed to get more sleepily and more bored with the whole thing, and finally they came in and asked the politicians to go home.

Mr. HUMES. Was there any business being transacted?

Miss BRYANT. No, there was not; they were simply talking about what they had intended to do. The constituent assembly had fallen to pieces. The people, the masses, were weary of politics and left and went over to the revolutionists, the Bolsheviki had bolted the meeting. The masses followed the Bolsheviki.

Mr. HUMES. These Bolsheviki and some other revolutionists had bolted the meetings?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; the Bolsheviki and the left socialist revolutionists had—the left socialist revolutionists are the largest party in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. At that time the provisional government was trying to maintain a constituent assembly, and was trying to organize a permanent government?

Miss BRYANT. They, the soviets, were also trying to organize a permanent government, but it was a soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Rather than a representative government?

Miss BRYANT. They consider it a representative government.

Mr. HUMES. When you got to Russia, what were the food conditions there—when you got to Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. The food conditions were never very good, and, as I understand, they have not been very good since the beginning of the war. Shortly after mobilization began in Russia the railroads were in disorder, and they were right straight along, and so, of course, the suffering was intense from the very beginning of the war.

Mr. HUMES. How did you supply yourself with food while you were there?

Miss BRYANT. I did not supply myself with food any better than anybody else did. In fact I was hungry a part of the time, and I lived on black bread and cabbage soup and things like that.

Mr. HUMES. How did you get it, on food tickets?

Miss BRYANT. Why, no. During the Kerensky régime I lived in a Russian boarding house, and the woman who managed it was allotted food tickets for each guest, and she got food in that way for all of us. Later I lived in the government hotel. Since the beginning of the war the correspondents have been treated more or less as guests of the government—that is, they can live in government hotels like the officers.

Mr. HUMES. What periodicals did you have credentials to represent?

Miss BRYANT. I had credentials from the Metropolitan Magazine, the Ledger, Seven Arts, and Every Week. Every Week is a magazine that has since ceased publication.

Senator STERLING. The Philadelphia Ledger?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator KING. Since you left there this last January you have not been back?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Senator KING. So you know nothing of the conditions since you left, except from hearsay?

Miss BRYANT. I know as much as Mr. Bernstein and some of the other witnesses whose testimony I have heard.

Senator KING. You know nothing except from hearsay?

Miss BRYANT. I know more than hearsay.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Bernstein was there more recently than that.

Miss BRYANT. Well, just a week or two afterwards, because I met him myself in Stockholm and talked to him there.

Senator WOLCOTT. But he came here and went back.

Miss BRYANT. But he went to Siberia, and I am speaking of central Russia.

Senator KING. Then what you know as to the conditions there now is hearsay, in the sense that you have not seen the conditions with your own eyes, but have derived your information from somebody else.

Miss BRYANT. I know a good deal that is happening now.

Mr. HUMES. Where did you get your information?

Miss BRYANT. I got it from several places. One place, the Finnish information bureau. Mr. Nuorteva, the head of the bureau, recently sent a letter to Senator Overman, saying he was receiving some funds and information from Russia from time to time, and that he wanted to tell the committee about it. He said, "If there is Bolshevik propaganda, I am it, and I want to testify."

Senator OVERMAN. Who did that?

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Nuorteva, of the Finnish Information Bureau.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, you have information you have received from Mr. Nuorteva?

Miss BRYANT. Part of it.

Mr. HUMES. Did Mr. Nuorteva show you the letter that the former officer of the Bolshevik government wrote to him, in which he told him that the experiment was a failure?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You have seen that, too, have you?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I have seen that. It is not important. It was the expression of an easily disappointed Socialist, I should say.

Mr. HUMES. Have you got any official information from the Bolshevik government? Have they furnished you with official information?

Miss BRYANT. No; but I saw some very official information in Col. Robins's apartment, which he showed to me.

Mr. HUMES. Is Col. Robins in official connection with the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think he is now.

Mr. HUMES. You say he has official information in his office?

Miss BRYANT. He brought back information which he showed to many of us.

Mr. HUMES. When did Col. Robins leave over there?

Miss BRYANT. I think some time after I did. I suppose you know when he left. I do not.

Mr. HUMES. It was early in 1918 that you left, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. I think he stayed longer than that. He certainly stayed until after the embassies left.

Senator KING. When I use the word "hearsay," I think, Miss Bryant, you probably do not get the meaning that lawyers attribute to the word. If I tell you something and then you go out and tell somebody else that I told it to you, that would be hearsay. Now, when I asked you if you had been there, and you said "no," and I asked you if you knew anything of the conditions there of your own knowledge, obviously, if you were not there you would not know.

Miss BRYANT. If I read documents and papers and things of that kind, I would know that.

Senator KING. But I asked you if you knew anything about the conditions, of your own knowledge, since you left.

Miss BRYANT. I have seen people——

Senator KING. You only know what somebody has told you.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; except I have read Russian papers.

Senator KING. You have answered my question. That is all.

Miss BRYANT. I want to answer that I have gotten information from people who were in direct communication with the soviet government. Mr. Nuorteva was allowed by Mr. Polk to send messages to the Bolshevik government about the Prinkipo conference.

Mr. HUMES. Is your husband in direct communication with the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. No. The only direct communication I know is what has been sent through the State Department.

Mr. HUMES. Was he not appointed by the Bolshevik government as consul general to New York?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he was.

Mr. HUMES. Has he been acting in that capacity?

Miss BRYANT. No; he did not come here as consul general.

Mr. HUMES. Has he undertaken to perform any of the duties of consul general although not recognized?

Miss BRYANT. Of course not. I think he was consul general for a period of about four days, but before he was given his passports the whole scheme was changed.

Mr. HUMES. He was designated as consul general of the Bolshevik government, at Petrograd, was he not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; certainly. Everybody knows that.

Mr. HUMES. Then he accepted that responsibility for the Bolshevik government in that particular, in violation of his sworn promise to the government when he secured his passports, did he not?

Miss BRYANT. I think he accepted that with the sanction of our officials there, and I think he can explain it. He can tell you about it better than I can.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that he made that statement at the time he secured his passports?

Miss BRYANT. He made a statement. I do not know what he did afterwards to counteract that or what conclusion he came to. I am sure that Col. Robins can tell you, probably even Ambassador Francis, and certainly my husband can.

Senator OVERMAN. You said some time ago that when you came out on your passports you had a certain sealed package. Were they your own papers?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and Miss Beatty's, who is the niece of Admiral Beatty, of the British Navy. She was with me, and I also took her papers. She is now the editor of McCall's Magazine, of New York, and was then a correspondent for the San Francisco Bulletin. She came with me, and I kept her papers as well as my own.

Senator OVERMAN. You had no official papers?

Miss BRYANT. No. Couriers' passports were given us just to enable us to pass through the lines.

Senator STERLING. If your husband did accept this position, it would have been in violation, would it not, of his passport and of his obligation as an American citizen?

Miss BRYANT. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. It would not?

Miss BRYANT. It would not, because—I do not know all the details, but I think his oath only concerned participation in the Stockholm conference, but I wish you would ask him about it. He is in the room, and I suppose you could do it. I am firmly of the opinion that Col. Robins or Ambassador Francis could tell you something about that, and he certainly could. I was not there at the time, you see, so I do not know about it.

Mr. HUMES. After the Bolshevik revolution, what were the food conditions?

Miss BRYANT. They were just about the same as they always have been.

Mr. HUMES. Was there any rioting or fighting in the streets, or the searching of houses, during that period of time?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; what was known as "requisitioning" began way back, as far as I can understand, at the time of the Kerensky government. The government used to send notices to the upper-class Russians asking them for shoes, overcoats, and for things like that to send to the destitute soldiers at the front, but they were pro-German and would not support the soldiers in any way. They would not even pretend to do so; they just simply refused to do anything or to obey any of those demands which were sent out under the Kerensky régime, so when the soviets came into power they requisitioned the banks to carry on the revolution in the same way that Benjamin Franklin in our revolution took over His Majesty's post-office funds, which was the property of the British Government.

Mr. HUMES. You mean they confiscated them?

Miss BRYANT. They confiscated them, only they nationalized the banks.

Mr. HUMES. And they confiscated private property of individuals?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the Red Guards went into the houses of private citizens and demanded money and foodstuffs—

Senator NELSON. And jewelry?

Mr. HUMES. And jewelry, clothing, and that sort of thing, and took it by force?

Miss BRYANT. I never heard of them demanding jewelry. I do not think they made any demand for that, but they may have taken clothing.

Mr. HUMES. Did not the Bolshevik government, by this so-called process of requisitioning, take all of the precious metals they could in the shape of platinum and material of that kind because of its commercial value?

Miss BRYANT. I do not believe so; I never came across such an instance.

Mr. HUMES. You never saw any of that?

Miss BRYANT. I never saw anything of that kind.

Mr. HUMES. Did not killings occur on the streets frequently during the time you were there?

MISS BRYANT. No; I went around more or less alone all the time and I did not see any killings there on the streets, except once, and that was not an ordinary killing.

MR. HUMES. When was that?

MISS BRYANT. It was at the time of the last stand of the officers, when they came down the streets of Petrograd in an armored car and turned it on a group of civilians, of which I was one. I saw that.

MR. HUMES. Was that after the Bolsheviki came in?

MISS BRYANT. That was just after the Bolshevik revolution, during a counter-revolution.

MR. HUMES. Did you ever see people starving?

MISS BRYANT. No.

MR. HUMES. And falling on the streets?

MISS BRYANT. No; I never saw anything like that.

MR. HUMES. Did you ever see horses falling on the streets?

MISS BRYANT. No.

MR. HUMES. Did you ever see people there cutting off horse meat for the purpose of food?

MISS BRYANT. No.

MR. HUMES. You never saw anything of that kind?

MISS BRYANT. I never saw it.

MR. HUMES. Then, from the time of the revolution, in November, up until you left in January, except for a few pangs of hunger that you yourself felt; you never saw any disorders, except the one incident of the motor car that you referred to?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; and just the ordinary things that would go with civil war and with fighting. I suffered no more hardships with regard to food than I did when I was in France.

MR. HUMES. How many civil wars have you seen? You say there were just the things that ordinarily go with civil war.

MISS BRYANT. I mean that from what history I have read it seems to me that in our own Civil War we suffered a great many privations; and, of course, the Russians had to do the same thing.

MR. HUMES. Then, the privations that are incident to war are to be expected, are they not?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; that is what I felt.

MR. HUMES. There is nothing in the privations incident to civil war that warrants any very serious thoughts?

MISS BRYANT. I think that an American traveling there would find his stay very uncomfortable, but he could always leave; and I think that is the way the Russians felt about foreigners. I could leave, myself, if I did not like it.

MR. HUMES. You say one could always leave, although it was necessary for you at least to represent yourself to be an official of the government in order to get out.

MISS BRYANT. No; you see, this is the situation: If I had gone through Siberia, it would not have been necessary; but from the beginning of the revolution—the first revolution—the Finns were fighting the Russians; and when anybody came through Finland they took absolutely everything away, whether it was foodstuffs or whether it was papers. I did not want that to happen to me in Finland. I knew that they respected a courier's passport, and so when I was ready to leave I simply went to the soviet officials and said, "Can you give me a courier's passport?" and they said, "Yes"; and they did it.

MR. HUMES. Then the situation was this, that it was difficult to get out of Russia through Finland?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Or out of Russia proper to the west, but it was, apparently, easy to get out of Russia to the east, through Siberia?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. When Mr. Reinstein went over did you go over with him?

MISS BRYANT. No; I did not know him until I saw him over there.

MR. HUMES. You got there before he did?

MISS BRYANT. No; not until much later. He used to teach me Russian.

MR. HUMES. When you got there, did you find him connected with the——

MISS BRYANT. Soviet government? No; not at that time.

MR. HUMES. Was he connected with the soviet revolutionary party?

MISS BRYANT. No; he was a Menshevik internationalist—a very small party in Russia.

MR. HUMES. When did he become a member of the Bolshevik government?

MISS BRYANT. He became connected with it after they tried to bring about the revolution in Germany; he is a student of international affairs, and they wanted him to be the head of the bureau.

MR. HUMES. What was Reinstein's business?

MISS BRYANT. He has always been a writer. I think he wrote for a socialist paper, the Weekly People, over here for a great many years.

MR. HUMES. Living in Buffalo, N. Y.?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; I believe so. I did not know him before I went over there.

MR. HUMES. Is it not a fact that his wife is a doctor in Buffalo?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; she is.

MR. HUMES. At the same time that you were there, was Mr. Reinstein, with whom you became acquainted, you and your husband?

MISS BRYANT. And many other people.

MR. HUMES. What other people from America, or Americans, did you find and get acquainted with while you were in Petrograd?

MISS BRYANT. With Arno Dosch-Fleurot, the World man, and especially with Miss Beatty. We were the only two American women reporters there most of the time, so we saw each other a great deal. And with Col. Thompson—I beg your pardon: not Col. Thompson—Col. Robins and Maj. Thacher. I came from Stockholm on the same boat with Gen. Judson. I met him in Christiania, not in Russia.

MR. HUMES. He was military attaché in Russia?

MISS BRYANT. He was the head of our military mission there.

MR. HUMES. I do not think you quite understand me. What other people from America were connected with the operations of the Bolshevik government while you were there?

MISS BRYANT. You mean Americans?

Mr. HUMES. Yes; Americans, or people who had come from America to Petrograd.

Miss BRYANT. There were a number of exiles that came from over here and went back.

Mr. HUMES. Name them.

Miss BRYANT. There was William Shatoff.

Mr. HUMES. What is his position in the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know what he is now.

Mr. HUMES. Is he a commissar of some kind?

Miss BRYANT. No; he is not a commissar. He was organizing what they called the factory shop committees.

Mr. HUMES. But he had an official connection with the government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he is a Russian.

Mr. HUMES. How long had he been in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. He is not an American; he is a Russian.

Mr. HUMES. He is a Russian, is he?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Was he in any way connected with the railroad administration?

Miss BRYANT. I heard a witness testify to that effect, but he must have been mistaken, because he was not a railway expert. He was working in the factory shop committees there when I was there, and I think that he would not be changed, because that is what he is particularly fitted for.

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not know whether he was changed or not.

Miss BRYANT. No; but I do not imagine so.

Senator STERLING. The witness Smith testified to that effect.

Miss BRYANT. I do not think it makes any difference at all, only I am telling you what he did when I was there.

Senator WOLCOTT. While you were there he was not the head of any railroad?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Mr. HUMES. What other person that had come from America did you find over there in some official capacity?

Miss BRYANT. I told you Reinstein and Shatoff, and I guess that is all that I know.

Mr. HUMES. Of course, Trotzky was there, and he had been in the United States.

Miss BRYANT. But I did not know him here.

Mr. HUMES. I do not mean whom you knew here! I mean people you discovered when you got there that had been in the United States, had come from the United States.

Miss BRYANT. Trotzky, of course.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. I am talking about Americans you came across over there.

Miss BRYANT. I saw, for instance, Alexander Gumberg, a Russian, who worked for Col. Robins, and later worked for Mr. Sisson. He has returned to this country.

Mr. HUMES. He had an official connection with the Bolshevik government, did he?

Miss BRYANT. He came back here to establish a press agency for them, the Petrograd News Agency, I believe, and he got certain concessions from them to do that.

Mr. HUMES. Did he ever establish it?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. I know he received $5,000 from Mr. Sisson for his work.

Mr. HUMES. For his work in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; for securing certain documents, and other work.

Mr. HUMES. Was he in the employ of the government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he was in the employ of the government. He also pretended to be a close friend of Trotzky, and he was in the employ of Sisson, and I do not know who else or what other mysterious business he performed.

Mr. HUMES. Did he ever organize that information bureau in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Or press bureau, or whatever you call it?

Miss BRYANT. It was called the Petrograd Press Agency. That agency is a real plum.

Mr. HUMES. Is he still in America?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What other Americans did you come across over there in government circles?

Miss BRYANT. That is all I can think of.

Senator STERLING. Did you know Mr. Shatoff before you knew him in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I once heard him speak at a meeting of Russians here.

Senator STERLING. Where, here? In what city?

Miss BRYANT. I believe it was in Paterson.

Senator STERLING. In Paterson, N. J.?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. When was that speech made?

Miss BRYANT. About three years ago.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you know a man over there by the name of Zoren?

Miss BRYANT. I did not know him. I heard that he was there, I believe in Kronstadt. Let me see——

Senator WOLCOTT. He was a commissar, was he not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. I mentioned him in my book, I believe, but I do not remember in what connection now.

Senator WOLCOTT. He was from America?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he had been in America.

Mr. HUMES. You say that Col. Robins had an information bureau over there?

Miss BRYANT. You see, it was this way: Col. Robins was very anxious to know everything that was going on in Russia, and he realized that the socialists, of course, would be closer to the soviet government, and would have their confidence. Therefore, he was very anxious to know through them what was going on, and also he wanted to know what they were doing about organizing a revolution in Germany, and whether they were pro-German or not, and when there were meetings we went to them and reported to him. I went to one of the meetings of the German war prisoners with Mr. Dosch-Fleurot, and I made a report to Col. Robins and also to the American consul, Mr. Treadwell. We went to as many meetings of all kinds as we possibly could.

Mr. HUMES. Will you tell us how many of those were employed by Col. Robins in this information bureau?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think you would call it an information bureau; and I know that Miss Beatty worked for the Red Cross.

Mr. HUMES. This was an information bureau of the Red Cross, was it?

Miss BRYANT. Why, yes, in a way; and we all worked very closely with the Red Cross and Col. Robins with the American Embassy.

Mr. HUMES. You have mentioned two people that were employed besides the assistance that you gave him. Now, whom else did he have working for him?

Miss BRYANT. At one time he had Mr. Reinstein. I was never employed. I did my work gratis.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he the man who is now in the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When was that with reference to the time when Reinstein became an official of the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. That was at a previous time. They used to give Col. Robins accounts of all meetings, public and otherwise, that they could get into, meetings in the prisons and elsewhere, so that he would have news besides what he covered himself.

Mr. HUMES. Were there any other informants besides the ones you have mentioned? Was Williams one of his informants?

Miss BRYANT. Why, yes.

Mr. HUMES. Was your husband?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. I would like to give testimony at this point, if you will let me, about certain things they did.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Miss Bryant, when you left Russia, how did you get out of Finland? At what point did you leave Finland?

Miss BRYANT. I went by way of Haparanda, and the sailors—you see, there was a good deal of confusion and there was fighting going on, and the Kronstadt sailors who were on my train were taken off and taken out and shot, and——

Senator NELSON. Shot by whom?

Miss BRYANT. By the White Guard and the Germans. You see, the Germans were fighting against the Red Guards in Finland, because the White Guards wanted to put a German king on the throne of Finland, and the Bolsheviks were sending up people to reenforce the Red Guards in Finland.

Mr. HUMES. Then you were on that train——

Miss BRYANT. I was on the last train that got through.

Mr. HUMES (continuing). On which there were some of the representatives of the Bolshevik government who were——

Miss BRYANT. No; they were not representatives of the Bolshevik government. They were simply sailors, in another car.

Mr. HUMES. They were Kronstadt sailors?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Were they not sympathizers with the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, they were sympathizers; they were Bolshevik sailors.

Mr. HUMES. They were sympathizers; and the White Guards came on that train and took them off and shot them?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. That was because of their connection with the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, and because the sailors were anti-German.

Mr. HUMES. How does it happen that you, an official messenger of the Bolshevik government—

Miss BRYANT. They did not know that I had courier's papers.

Mr. HUMES (continuing). Did not fall into the hands of the White Guards, if they were after all the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Because they simply thought that I was an American, and did not pay any attention to me.

Mr. HUMES. They did not even ask you for your credentials?

Miss BRYANT. They may have looked at my American passport. I would not have given them the other, certainly.

Mr. HUMES. But you had in your possession bags with papers, with the official seals on them of the soviet government, did you not?

Miss BRYANT. You are making a picture that is not quite true. They were only looking, as they came through the train, for certain armed persons, for soldiers sent up there to fight them. They went through the train and took the soldiers away and went right on and paid no attention to us.

Mr. HUMES. They did pay some attention to you, because you say they looked at your American passport.

Miss BRYANT. I mean, it was like this: People were always going through the train and looking at your passports. You are shut in these compartments, you know; the train is all made up of compartments, and they would come and open the door and say, "Give me your passport," and you would hand it to them. The thing was that when we got to the border the Bolsheviks, who were in charge of the border—you see, the way it was, some points would be held by the White Guard and some by the Red. The Bolsheviks still held the border, and when I got up there I gave him my credentials and they let me bring my bags through.

Mr. HUMES. The White Guards you came in contact with simply demanded credentials of the Americans and others on the train besides the sailors that were coming on there for military purposes?

Miss BRYANT. They did not stay on the train two minutes. They simply said, "Show us your passports," and marched away, and we went on.

Mr. HUMES. The White Guards you speak of respected your American passport and American citizenship?

Miss BRYANT. They did not have time to respect it or not respect it. They simply wanted to get all the armed people out of the way.

Mr. HUMES. The fact remains that they did respect it?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not know that they did. I could not tell whether every different group of people that passed through my train were White Guards or Red Guards.

Senator NELSON. They did not shoot you like they did the sailors?

Miss BRYANT. They would have if I had been armed.

Senator NELSON. Why?

Miss BRYANT. Well, they would have, in any case, if I had remained, because if I had been in Finland and the White Guards were trying to put a German king on the throne, I would have been fighting with the Red Guards.

Senator NELSON. Did you not say that they took those sailors out and shot them?

Miss BRYANT. I did not see them shot. I did not run after them when they took them out.

Mr. HUMES. How do you know they shot them?

Miss BRYANT. I found that out in Stockholm afterwards.

Mr. HUMES. Now, you say you do not know whether the people who came in and took these sailors off the train were White Guards or Red Guards?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; I do know about those particular people.

Mr. HUMES. You said a moment ago that you did not know which they were.

Miss BRYANT. You are trying to confuse me now, major.

Mr. HUMES. No; I am not trying to confuse you. You said a moment ago that you did not know whether they were White Guards or Red Guards.

Miss BRYANT. Will you let me straighten this out?

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. In time of revolution American correspondents usually carried passes from both sides, and often both sides gave us passes, and especially in Great Russia. Correspondents were not armed and not detained.

Senator NELSON. Did you have passes from both sides?

Miss BRYANT. No; I did not in this particular case; but in Russia I often had passes from the reactionaries and passes from the Red Guards, and they gave them to other correspondents. They all gave us passes, so that we could go and report the truth.

Senator OVERMAN. I notice your passports here say that you are a representative of the American social democracy and an internationalist. You did not go there, then, as a correspondent, but as a representative of the internationalist?

Miss BRYANT. No. You see, Senator Overman, when you go and ask the soviet officials for a pass they make it out in their own way. They make it out so that their own soldiers will understand it.

Senator OVERMAN. They did not make this out to show that you were a correspondent, but they made it out to show that you were an internationalist.

Miss BRYANT. Oh, as for that, being an internationalist is not unique. Anyone is an internationalist that even believes in the league of nations and things of that kind.

Senator OVERMAN. All except one of your passports is signed by Peters, who is said to be the "high executioner."

Miss BRYANT. Yes. I would like to tell you about Peters.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know anything about the activities of Peters as executioner recently?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know; but I know how he felt about capital punishment. He knew all the correspondents very well. One reason for that was because he had lived in England, and he spoke English very well.

Mr. HUMES. What is his nationality?

Miss BRYANT. He is a Lett.

Mr. HUMES. How long had he been in England?

Miss BRYANT. He had escaped from Russia during the 1905 revolution and had been over there ever since.

Mr. HUMES. Has he ever been in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. No. When we found out that this man spoke English so well we, of course, always went around and asked favors of him, asked if he would tell us about certain things, and if he would give us certain credentials. He was very friendly to the correspondents at that time.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that it was not at all difficult to find people who spoke English in the soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. No; it was not difficult at all.

Mr. HUMES. People who spoke English as well as Peters?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; there were a good many of them that spoke English, but he had a good deal of authority and could render assistance.

Mr. HUMES. That is what I want to find out. Who were these people that spoke English and had learned it in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. They did not necessarily learn it in the United States. Russians who are educated often speak five or six languages. They do not have to go to the country to learn the language.

Mr. HUMES. Then I understand you to say that, so far as you have knowledge, you only discovered the three or four or five persons that you have mentioned in Russia who had formerly lived in the United States; is that true?

Miss BRYANT. I think that is true; but I would like to refresh my memory.

Mr. HUMES. The only people you came in contact with?

Miss BRYANT. I mentioned four or five people in my book. If there are any more there than I mentioned—let me see the book for a moment.

Mr. HUMES. Can you tell us who the others are who came from the United States by reference to your book?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I will tell you. Kollontay, the minister of welfare.

Mr. HUMES. What position did he hold?

Miss BRYANT. She.

Mr. HUMES. She?

Miss BRYANT. She was minister of welfare.

Mr. HUMES. What was her nationality?

Miss BRYANT. Russian.

Mr. HUMES. How long had she been in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. I did not know her in the United States.

Mr. HUMES. Did you not hear from her how long she had been in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. No. In the democratic congress we were seated in the reporters' boxes. They always reserved a place for the reporters. She came up one evening and asked, "Are you American correspondents?" We replied, "Yes"; and she said she had been in America; and from that time on we all came to know her very well.

Mr. HUMES. Where had she lived in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think she had lived here. I think she went on a tour of the United States.

Another person I knew over there was Catherine Breshkovskaya, who testified here. I saw her, more or less, during the time she lived in the Winter Palace.

Mr. HUMES. She had only been in this country touring?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; but she had also lived some time in this country.

Mr. HUMES. Well, now, whom else did you find who had been in this country?

Miss BRYANT. Let me see.

Mr. HUMES. Did you meet a negro by the name of Gordon?

Miss BRYANT. I did not meet any negroes. I did not see but one negro while I was there, and he had nothing to do with the soviet. He was a professional gambler.

Mr. HUMES. Did you meet a man by the name of Murieff?

Miss BRYANT. I did not.

Mr. HUMES. You did not meet him?

Miss BRYANT. I do not remember—

Mr. HUMES. If you can think of any other Americans or persons who had been in America, by reference to your book, any other person who had been in this country, I wish you would tell us who they are.

Miss BRYANT. Let me see; you mean Americans who were connected with the soviet government?

Mr. HUMES. Americans who were connected with the soviet government, and Russians who for a period of time had been residents of this country.

Miss BRYANT. There was one man over there, who worked on an English paper, by the name of George Sokolsky, who may or who may not have been a Russian. He claimed to be a Russian here and he claimed to be an American in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Was he connected with the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. He had no connection with the Bolshevik government, but he had other connections. The Bolsheviks distrusted him.

Senator STERLING. Had he lived in America?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Where?

Miss BRYANT. In New York.

Mr. HUMES. Had you known him in this country?

Miss BRYANT. No. I met him there; he came up to me on the street in Petrograd and spoke to me and to Mr. Reed.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know with whom he was connected in this country?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not know with whom he was connected, particularly in America or in Stockholm. He worked on this English paper and he wrote certain things that always seemed to me to be written just to anger the Russians—that is, to alienate them from America. He seemed to take particular delight in saying "An American says this and that about Russia," at a critical moment. None of the reporters trusted him.

Mr. HUMES. Was he connected with Morris Hillquitt in New York?

Miss BRYANT. No; not at all. He is not a Socialist.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is Alexandra Kollontay?

Miss BRYANT. She is the minister of welfare. She is an exceptionally cultured woman, who wrote 10 books on welfare before she became connected with the government.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I ask who Mr. Dosch-Fleurot is?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he is the World correspondent.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was he or not sympathetic with the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. He changed every now and then. Now he is very much against them. At times I think he was not so much against them. At the present time I think he is quite against them.

Senator WOLCOTT. How was he over in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. In Russia he went through various changes. He did not seem to remain of the same opinion, at all.

Senator STERLING. What was he to begin with?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. He has been a correspondent of the World abroad for a good many years.

Senator STERLING. But what were his sympathies to begin with? Did he sympathize with the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, no; not at the beginning. I think he was quite against it.

Senator STERLING. Afterwards, did he become identified with the Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. No. I brought back to the World an article, which was printed by the World, telling how Mr. Dosch-Fleurot felt about Russia at that time. The article was featured and caused a good deal of comment in other papers.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Miss Bryant, you say your husband and Boris Reinstein and Williams were engaged in propaganda work. Were they engaged in a propaganda work as distinguished from this correspondent that you have referred to, which was intended to create a friendly feeling between Russia and the United States?

Miss BRYANT. Why, their principal task was to break down the German forces on the front.

Mr. HUMES. Were they undertaking to do that by an attack on the United States Government and upon the officials of the United States Government?

Miss BRYANT. Why, no: of course they were not.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that this newspaper was published as one of the papers that was published by them [indicating]? Is not that one of the papers that they published over there in German?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but everything in it they did not write.

Mr. HUMES. I do not know whether you can read Russian or not, but on the front page of that paper that is published—

Miss BRYANT. This is not Russian, it is German text [indicating another paper].

Mr. HUMES. In that paper that they published is there not a violent attack upon the President of the United States and upon the attitude of the United States?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but they did not write it.

Mr. HUMES. How did it happen to be in the paper that they were publishing under the supervision of Col. Robins if they had no control over it?

Miss BRYANT. Well, if you will ask Col. Robins, he will tell you a very interesting story about it, and he could tell you why, much better than I could, because he knows much better.

Mr. HUMES. You made the statement that this one newspaper correspondent was putting, as you understood, squibs in the paper from time to time that you felt were calculated to estrange the Americans and Russians?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; but he had no connection with this paper or with the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the activity—that your activity and the activity of Boris Reinstein——

Miss BRYANT. My activity? I did not confess to any activity.

Mr. HUMES. Well, we will omit you, then. Is it not a fact that the activity in which Boris Reinstein and your husband and Williams were engaged was calculated to create prejudice and a feeling of animosity against the United States and against the officials of the United States?

Miss BRYANT. Absolutely not.

Mr. HUMES. How do you account for this article; and who did write that article?

Miss BRYANT. As I understand it, someone not an American, wrote that; someone who was very unfriendly toward the United States; but they (the Americans) did not even know that it was going into the paper until after they actually saw it in print.

Mr. HUMES. Then they were running an information bureau——

Miss BRYANT. No; you do not let me answer you, Mr. Humes, and that is why I can not tell you anything clearly. This paper that you have particular reference to, they did not have supervision of that.

Mr. HUMES. Did they not have anything to do with this paper?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but they did not edit that [indicating paper in the hands of Mr. Humes]. They edited this [indicating another paper], an illustrated sheet.

Mr. HUMES. Let me call your attention to your husband's own article.

Miss BRYANT. That is not my husband's article. Why do you not ask my husband about it?

Mr. HUMES. I want to call your attention to your husband's own article. After about a dozen numbers of Die Fackel it was changed to Der Volkefriede. I do not know what the pronunciation is of that, but it was changed to this paper [indicating].

Miss BRYANT. Yes; it was first Die Fackel—the Torch—and then it was changed.

Mr. HUMES. Now, in this article he says that the publication of this paper is under himself, Williams, and Boris Reinstein.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, if he had nothing to do with this, and was not the editor of the paper, who did control the things that went into the paper?

Miss BRYANT. If you would ask him, he would tell you.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know?

Miss BRYANT. No; I simply know about this point.

Mr. HUMES. You do not know anything about the detailed activities, then, of your husband and Williams and these other English papers at that time?

MISS BRYANT. No. There were no English papers. There were Russian and German papers. I did not work in the foreign office. The English paper was not published by the soviets.

MR. HUMES. They worked in the foreign office, did they?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Working in the foreign office, they assumed, as provided by the constitution, the duties and the responsibilities and rights of Russian citizenship?

MISS BRYANT. I do not know.

SENATOR STERLING. Who was the minister for foreign affairs under whom they worked?

MISS BRYANT. Trotzky.

SENATOR OVERMAN. I notice that you have a picture in your book which is before me here, "The Red Burial held in Moscow in November. Five hundred bodies were buried in one day."

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Were those Red Guards who were buried?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; Red Guards that were buried, shot by the White Guards?

MR. HUMES. Did you at any time, except on the one occasion you related about the armored car, see any open assassination on the streets of Petrograd?

MISS BRYANT. No; I was in the Winter Palace the day that it fell. I was in the Winter Palace with the Kerensky officials and the junkers. I stayed there all day. They expected that they would have to surrender, and I wanted to be there when the palace fell. I wanted to see what it would be like, and to get the story.

About 5 o'clock I decided that there was not going to be any attack, and I asked permission to leave. They told me that I could go, and I went out, and I found that there was a huge meeting going on in Smolny Institute, and I went to that meeting. While we were at the meeting, we heard firing, the firing of cannon on the Winter Palace, and we rushed out and saw a big motor car just going down, and we asked permission to ride in it, and they let us ride. We went down the Nevsky Prospect, and when we got near the Winter Palace we found that it had just fallen, and we ran in with the first troops. I was with Miss Beatty, and Mr. Reed was there, and Mr. Williams.

MR. HUMES. Of course, you saw some people killed at that time?

MISS BRYANT. No.

MR. HUMES. No one was killed?

MISS BRYANT. I did not say no one was killed. I did not see any one killed.

MR. HUMES. The Bolshevik revolution and the overthrow of the Kerensky government was entirely bloodless?

MISS BRYANT. No; I say I did not see anybody killed. There were a number of Bolsheviks killed outside of the Winter Palace, but it was night, so I did not see them, but there were no junkers killed. I did not say that the revolution was bloodless. In fact, I just stated a moment ago that I was on the street when many people were killed.

MR. HUMES. All connected with that one occurrence of the motor car. I said, with that one exception, did you ever see anyone killed there in street fighting, or shot down and killed on the streets of Petrograd, while you were there?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; I saw one man killed. I was walking on the street, and some sniper shot from a roof top, and he dropped down.

MR. HUMES. That was after or before the Bolsheviki came in?

MISS BRYANT. That was after the Bolsheviki came in.

MR. HUMES. Then what happened?

MISS BRYANT. Then sailors ran out of the government hotel and from everywhere, and cried out "provocateur," because they thought that it was some one trying to start a riot, and they were rushing around the streets, trying to find who it was. That is the only time.

MR. HUMES. That is the only time? Besides the persons you saw killed from that armored car, you only saw one other person killed on the streets of Petrograd?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; except wine pogroms.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that it is an everyday occurrence, and was while you were there, on the streets of Petrograd, to have people shot down in cold blood?

MISS BRYANT. I do not know that it is so, and I am sure there are 10 witnesses who will testify to the opposite, and they were the heads of the official organizations sent over from the United States. They did not see it, either.

MR. HUMES. Then the testimony of all the reputable people who have testified here as to the things that they actually saw with their own eyes is false?

MISS BRYANT. Did they testify that they actually saw those things?

MR. HUMES. Yes.

MISS BRYANT. I have been in the room most of the time, and I did not hear people say that they actually saw such things.

MR. HUMES. There has not been a witness here that has not testified that they with their own eyes saw these things.

MISS BRYANT. They may have. I did not. You do not want me to testify to things that I did not see, do you?

MR. HUMES. As a reporter, yes, you did not see them?

MISS BRYANT. As a reporter, I did not see such things. And please remember, it would have made a much more lurid story if I had, but I did not see it.

MR. HUMES. Who was paying you while you were over there?

MISS BRYANT. Well, I went on a contract of fifty-fifty; that is, 50 per cent of the amount of money for the articles I wrote was paid to me by the Philadelphia Ledger when I returned. My husband paid my expenses. It is not a matter of money at all. I did not take any money for what I did over there.

MR. HUMES. Did you receive any money from anybody in Russia, I mean by way of pay for services?

MISS BRYANT. No; I did not work for pay while I was over there; not even for Col. Robins.

MR. HUMES. You did not work for pay. You were there for love?

MISS BRYANT. No; I was not there for love. I was there because I wanted to see the revolution, and because I am a reporter, and because the revolution caught my imagination.

Mr. HUMES. And during all your time over there you saw no evidence of disorders or of starvation on the streets—people falling dead?

Miss BRYANT. No; I did not see anybody fall dead.

Mr. HUMES. No horses falling dead on the streets of Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Mr. HUMES. And you left there in the middle of January?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Did you see anybody begging for bread or food or anything of that kind?

Miss BRYANT. There are always many beggars in Russia, but I understand there are less there now than before.

Senator STERLING. But you saw no beggars on the streets?

Miss BRYANT. Very few beggars. No more than I see here in the United States.

Senator NELSON. Is not that because they have joined the Red Army, that there are no beggars?

Miss BRYANT. If they are old or weak, of course they can not join the Red Army. It is composed mostly of young men.

Senator WOLCOTT. There are much fewer people in Petrograd than there were?

Miss BRYANT. There may be less people there now. I have read reports claiming great decrease in population since I was there, but at the time I left the population had not diminished. In fact, it was very hard to get accommodations at that time, because so many delegates came in for the various congresses and all sorts of political meetings that were going on.

Senator NELSON. You came there before the Kerensky government had lost its power?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The Kerensky government was trying to carry on the war against Germany, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and so did the soviet government.

Senator NELSON. Did the Bolshevik government that succeeded them; did they try to fight the Germans?

Miss BRYANT. They not only tried, but they have succeeded, Senator Nelson, so that they have pushed the Germans clear back almost to their original borders.

Senator NELSON. They succeeded in culminating in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk.

Miss BRYANT. But, Senator Nelson, do you know that at the time of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk the soviet sent a series of questions to the United States asking for assistance, saying if this assistance was given them, if we would back them up, they would break the negotiations and not sign the treaty of Brest-Litovsk?

Senator NELSON. No.

Miss BRYANT. And Col. Robins has that original document in his possession?

Senator NELSON. I never heard of that.

Miss BRYANT. That is true, and I have seen it and at least 20 other persons have seen it.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you notice any German officers there?

Miss BRYANT. I certainly did not. I saw some German prisoners; and the Bolsheviks, of course, were organizing them to fight against their own government.

Senator STERLING. And they were succeeding in organizing German prisoners to fight against Germany?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and one way they used them before the armistice was as smugglers of propaganda, sending all sorts of things back into Germany to overthrow the German Government.

Mr. HUMES. When these troops were organized, where did they do any fighting against Germany?

Miss BRYANT. They have been fighting steadily against Germany.

Mr. HUMES. That was the Czecho-Slovaks. It was the Czecho-Slovak unit that was organized, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. Not altogether.

Mr. HUMES. What unit was organized by the soviet government that did any fighting against Germany?

Miss BRYANT. They fought with the soviet army and have been fighting Germany and have been pushing the Germans back to the Russian borders, as you must know. If you will follow the line, you will see they have gone down as far as Kiev and Riga.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the only fighting force besides the Red Guards, that was organized to perpetuate the Bolshevik power, was the Czecho-Slovak unit?

Miss BRYANT. I would not say that that was the only organization.

Senator OVERMAN. You may let the crowd come back now, if they will keep quiet.

Miss BRYANT. My feeling for the Czecho-Slavs was that that body of men should have been allowed to go back to their own country, and that is exactly what they tried to do.

Mr. HUMES. That is what they were trying to do?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

(At this point the doors of the committee room were reopened, and the subcommittee resumed its public session.)

Senator OVERMAN. Now, I want to say to those in the audience, I have let you in, and I hope you will observe the warning not to make any noise or allow any more cheering in here. If you do not observe it, I will have to clear the room again. I hope I will not have to do it.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Miss Bryant, you say when you came out of Russia as a courier you brought many papers with you?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What official papers of the Bolshevik government did you bring out?

Miss BRYANT. I did not bring any, as I have already stated. You have seen all my papers, Mr. Humes, because, of course, they were all gone over when I came into the United States. Everybody's papers are. And you have returned all these papers, both to myself and to Mr. Reed and to Mr. Williams. Everyone's papers have been returned.

Mr. HUMES. Have the papers of Mr. Reed been returned?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; months ago. I think three or four were lost, but almost all were returned.

Mr. HUMES. The trunk of literature that was taken from him has all been returned?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir; Mr. Williams's papers were also returned.

Mr. HUMES. Then the material that you brought out was purely your own notes and property. They belonged to you?

Miss BRYANT. I did not bring much; just what I needed for my stories in books and papers.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to ask you whether or not at that time the people were starving?

Miss BRYANT. Well, you see, Senator Overman, the cutting off of the supplies by the Germans in the south and by the allies in the north, of course, made starvation——

Senator OVERMAN. Answer the question, whether or not there was starving.

Miss BRYANT. They were very hard up. I was trying to answer. I did not see anybody fall on the street.

Senator OVERMAN. You did not see it, but you know that they were starving.

Miss BRYANT. I think they must have been, in some communities, especially where they were carrying on retreats; and the suffering of the children was very great. The American Red Cross did all it could to bring milk over for the babies of Russia, but it was not very successful.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that all the food that was in Petrograd was in the custody of the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir; the soviet had taken it over.

Mr. HUMES. The soviet government issued the foodstuffs that they had to those that were affiliated with their own government and their own organization and let the other people starve?

Miss BRYANT. That is not true. There never was a time while I was in Petrograd that you could not go into a store and buy certain supplies. You could do that.

Mr. HUMES. Was there plenty of money there when you were there?

Miss BRYANT. People seemed to have money.

Mr. HUMES. Specie?

Miss BRYANT. Just paper money.

Mr. HUMES. Well, it was the money of the Bolshevik régime and the Kerensky régime, or of the old régime?

Miss BRYANT. They seemed to have a combination of all kinds, but it did not seem to make any difference to them.

Mr. HUMES. All passed at the same value?

Miss BRYANT. There were various kinds in Petrograd which all passed the same way, but I noticed when we got to the border of Sweden, for instance, we had some Kerensky notes, and they said they were not worth very much, and they would only give us a hundredth part of what they were worth.

Mr. HUMES. What did they give you for Bolshevik notes?

Miss BRYANT. We did not have any, or very little money when we got there.

Mr. HUMES. You did not have any money of the old régime?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Mr. HUMES. Now, when you were in Petrograd, were the newspapers permitted to publish anything that they wanted to print?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir. Will you let me bring evidence to show?

Mr. HUMES. If you have the newspapers.

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes. I have files which I shall be very glad to show you. I wanted to state at the beginning—but you would not allow me to make a statement—that I would not say anything that I could not prove myself or could not give you the source of information in the United States. These [indicating] are what they call "Satirikons," satirical magazines, cruelly denouncing the Bolshevik revolution.

Mr. HUMES. What are the dates of those?

Miss BRYANT. April and December, two December, 1918, numbers. That is long after the Bolsheviki came into power.

Senator WOLCOTT. December, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; 1918, after the Bolshevik uprising. These [indicating] are cartoons of Trotzky and various people.

Mr. HUMES. This paper has been since suppressed, has it not?

Miss BRYANT. Not that I know of.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that there is not a newspaper published in Russia except the Bolshevik journals?

Miss BRYANT. I do not believe that is so.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that the constitution of the Bolshevik government itself provides for the suppression of all newspapers?

Miss BRYANT. I am certain it does not.

Mr. HUMES. I will call your attention to the constitution itself.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the purpose of that meeting that you had at Poli's?

Miss BRYANT. The subject?

Senator OVERMAN. The purpose.

Miss BRYANT. The purpose was to protest against intervention in Russia. I, as an American, believing in self-determination, can not believe in intervention. I do not see how we can fight for democracy in France and against it in Siberia, or for self-determination, either, and I believe we ought to take our troops out of Russia, because I think it would be better for both nations to have friendly relations.

Senator NELSON. You are anxious to have the Bolshevik government established in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I am anxious——

Senator NELSON. Answer my question. Are you anxious to have the Bolshevik government there as a permanent thing?

Miss BRYANT. I think the Russians ought to settle that.

Senator NELSON. I am asking you if you think the Bolsheviki ought to be established there?

Miss BRYANT. I answered you. I said I believed in self-determination.

Senator NELSON. Are you anxious to have the Bolshevik government, as they are operating it now, established in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Why, if the Russians wish it, yes. If the Russians do not wish it, no.

Mr. HUMES. I call your attention to this paragraph from the constitution of the soviet government [reading]:

Guided by the interest of the working class as a whole, the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic deprives individuals and separate groups of any rights which they may be using to the detriment of the socialist revolution.

Now, does that not deprive the people of Russia of freedom of the press and freedom of speech?

MISS BRYANT. No; it deprives them of—for instance, if they wanted to bring about a counter-revolution, that is, if they are traitors.

MR. HUMES. That is, if they are against the Bolshevik government?

MISS BRYANT. No; if they bring about a counter-revolution.

MR. HUMES. There is only one purpose of a counter-revolution, and that would be against the soviet or Bolsheviks, would it not?

MISS BRYANT. No; the Bolsheviks is only a political party. The largest party is the left socialist revolutionary party.

MR. HUMES. The Bolshevik party is not the largest party?

MISS BRYANT. That is true. It is not the largest party. The left socialist revolutionary party is the largest and it works in the soviet.

MR. HUMES. You say that anyone who is opposing the present government in Russia is a traitor?

MISS BRYANT. By force of arms, of course, or asking for outside help. The same thing is true in our country, Mr. Humes.

MR. HUMES. Do you mean to say that anybody in this country who would try to overthrow the government is a traitor?

MISS BRYANT. By force or by outside aid, every government official would consider them such.

MR. HUMES. Would you consider them such?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; I do not want the government to be overthrown by force. I do not think that anything like that will happen here unless there is frightful suppression.

MR. HUMES. But anyone that would overthrow the Bolshevik government would be a traitor, and the government has a right to oppose and suppress their activities, the Bolshevik government, has it not?

MISS BRYANT. I am explaining that—

MR. HUMES. Under your contention.

MISS BRYANT. Not under my contention. I am explaining to you not what I believe, but what the Russians believe.

MR. HUMES. I am asking you how the government is being administered, the actual facts and conditions. Now, is it not a fact that under the Bolshevik government, every person who is opposing the Bolshevik government—

MISS BRYANT. Who is trying to overthrow it; yes.

MR. HUMES. Is treated as a traitor?

MISS BRYANT. Who is trying to overthrow it, naturally.

MR. HUMES. Anyone who is trying to overthrow the government is treated as a traitor?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. And is shot?

MISS BRYANT. I do not know that that is always so.

MR. HUMES. If his guilt is established.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you not know that they have disarmed them?

MISS BRYANT. I did not know that they have disarmed them. I would say that most everybody in Russia has arms.

Senator OVERMAN. That is, the Bolsheviki have arms, but those who are not Bolsheviki have all been disarmed.

Miss BRYANT. The social revolutionists? Perhaps the 2 per cent capitalist class is disarmed, but the workmen and peasants are armed.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did they not disarm the Czecho-Slav brigade, I believe it was, that set out to leave Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I believe so, but that is a long story. It has all sorts of complications. They believed that the Czecho-Slavs were trying to bring about a counter-revolution. But as I was not there I can not tell you about the Czecho-Slovaks. Louis Edgar Browne, the correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, can tell you a good deal about it. He wrote a good many articles about it when he came back. He is now in this country and he can tell you the whole trouble.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you not know, Mrs. Reed, that they entered the homes of people and disarmed the people and looted the houses?

Miss BRYANT. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Have you any reason to believe that the disarming of the Czecho-Slovaks was at the instigation of the German agents?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not think that it was.

Senator STERLING. You have heard that and heard it repeatedly?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I have heard many things repeatedly that I do not believe.

Senator STERLING. You are not satisfied that that was the fact?

Miss BRYANT. No; I am not satisfied that that was the fact. I do not think you can say that the soviets are in favor of Imperial Germany, because by all logic they could not be. They are opposed on every point. The two governments could not exist side by side.

Senator NELSON. Is not the soviet government attempting to establish itself by force?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; all governments, including our own, did that.

Senator NELSON. And force against the Russian people who do not agree with them?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; we used force also against the King of England and his army.

Senator NELSON. And why should not the rest of the Russian people have the right to express themselves?

Miss BRYANT. Why should not our Tories have had the right?

Senator NELSON. Why should they go to work and use force and disarm anybody?

Miss BRYANT. That is the way revolutions are brought about.

Senator NELSON. Do you call that freedom?

Miss BRYANT. It is a transitory stage that is always necessary in establishing new governments. We had to do it; we had to disarm our Tories, and we even shot some of our Tories.

Senator NELSON. You compare the Russian people, then, who do not agree with the Bolsheviki, with the American Tories, do you?

Miss BRYANT. I compare the Russian upper classes with the Tories; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. You think that those who do not agree with the Bolshevik government and with their reign of terror are Tories, and they ought to be killed and disarmed and driven out of the country?

Miss BRYANT. I do not say that they should either be killed or disarmed or driven out of the country.

Senator NELSON. What would you do with them?

Miss BRYANT. I would let the Russian people decide, just as they let us decide in our Civil War.

Senator NELSON. You would let them go on and slay one another?

Miss BRYANT. I am in favor of the Russians working it out themselves; yes.

Senator STERLING. Miss Bryant, you know as a matter of fact, do you not, that the Russian Red Guards entered prisons and took men out without a trial and had them shot, again and again?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know that of my personal knowledge.

Senator STERLING. You have every reason to believe that is true from what you have heard?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not, because so many stories have been started about Russia that I can not believe it ever happened.

Senator STERLING. Do you disbelieve the stories told by witnesses here, who were in those prisons, who saw the guards take them out?

Miss BRYANT. I think there is no doubt that there is terror in Russia at the present time, both red and white terror.

Senator STERLING. You will admit that?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; it is the natural course of a revolution.

Senator NELSON. You stand for the red terror; you pick the red terror for your mission?

Miss BRYANT. For my mission? I do not understand. My point is simply this, that I believe in self-determination, and I think the Russians should decide all questions for themselves.

Senator NELSON. Self-determination at the point of a gun?

Miss BRYANT. All governments have had to be self-determined at the point of a gun. There never has been a government established except after a war.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes; lots of them.

Miss BRYANT. Yes?

Senator NELSON. Have you studied this league of nations? [Laughter.] That is supposed to be accomplished without bloodshed.

Miss BRYANT. Seventeen millions of lives were lost, and they have not done anything yet, you will agree.

Senator NELSON. There is a big plan laid out.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mrs. Reed, I had formed the impression from what I have read in the newspapers from time to time and from what I have heard, that you have been engaged in this country in expressing words of very hearty approval of the soviet government. Now, was that impression correct on my part or not?

Miss BRYANT. Why, I have always spoken against the hysteria, against the scare word we have made of Bolshevism. I have spoken in favor of an understanding, or trying to find out who these people are and what they want. There is a conception in my country that the Bolsheviki are anarchists. They are social democrats. They are against anarchism, and they have put it down with force of arms. I think those things must be made known. All people coming back from Russia are asked to speak again and again. People really are hungry to know about Russia, and they ask you to speak, and they ask questions, and you tell them what you think. That is all.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have not answered my question yet. Do you recall what my question was?

Miss BRYANT. If I have spoken favorably of the soviet?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. Well, I have said that it was by no means what it was represented to be; that these people are really struggling——

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not answer my question at all.

Miss BRYANT. How do you mean, in favor of the soviet—that I ask to have a soviet government immediately in the United States, for instance?

Senator WOLCOTT. If we get down to definite questions, I will ask you that.

Miss BRYANT. I am not advocating anything of the kind.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, I will ask you if you have not before American audiences and through the American press, in your writings, praised the soviet government as a good thing for the Russians?

Miss BRYANT. Why, I have said that it is my belief that it is the government desired by the majority of the Russian people, yes. I have said it fits Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have not lent it your own personal indorsement?

Miss BRYANT. I have said this, that I think it is a government that properly fits Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. It has your personal indorsement for Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but I would not fight for it or against it. I would not ask for intervention to keep it in Russia. I think the Russians ought to settle their internal troubles, and I think it is a shame to have American boys killed determining what form of government there should be in Russia. That is my personal opinion.

Senator WOLCOTT. I will ask you this. You mentioned a while ago your opinion of it as it was applied to our situation in this country. Do you think it would be a good thing for this country?

Miss BRYANT. I think each government has to work out its form of government, and I should not talk about it.

Senator WOLCOTT. But I have had the impression that you have backed it as a good thing for this country, and I want to know.

Miss BRYANT. I do not personally see how the soviet government would be established here, and I do not say anything like that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then you do not want to express an opinion?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Would it be a good thing for America? That is a plain question.

Miss BRYANT. I do not think it would fit America at the present time.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is the answer I was after.

Senator NELSON. Do you regard yourself as a missionary for the Bolshevik government to the people of the United States?

Miss BRYANT. No, sir; I do not.

Senator NELSON. Why are you preaching their propaganda here?

Miss BRYANT. I did not say that I was.

Senator NELSON. Why are you advocating it?

Miss BRYANT. You say that in the same way that all the other people have been saying things against it. I am telling what I know about it.

Senator NELSON. You have no fault to find with the cut-throat policy of the Red Guards, the killing of everybody that does not agree with them?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think they do kill everybody.

Senator NELSON. And disarming everybody else, and going through the buildings of people and taking out all their food and property, and looting it?

Miss BRYANT. You see, Senator——

Senator NELSON. You do not think they have done that?

Miss BRYANT. I think Russia is in a state of civil war.

Senator NELSON. Has not the Red Guard done that? What are the constituents of the Red Guard? What are they composed of?

Miss BRYANT. Peasants and workers, young men generally, in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Are they not composed to a considerable extent of criminals?

Miss BRYANT. Why, I would not say so; no.

Senator NELSON. Are there not many of the criminal class in their midst?

Miss BRYANT. I did not notice it when I was there.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that since they have got into power they have shot many of the Russian officers of the old Russian Army?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and I can understand that.

Senator NELSON. You think that is good?

Miss BRYANT. I would not say that is good exactly, or exactly bad.

Senator NELSON. Your idea is that they have got to pass through a Bolshevik purgatory in order to land on terra firma in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I did not say anything of the kind. I stated that I can not say what they should do.

Senator NELSON. But you have come to tell the people of this country how good the Bolshevik government is?

Miss BRYANT. Not particularly. I have come to explain.

Senator NELSON. What is your mission about the Bolshevik movement?

Miss BRYANT. If you will let me explain, I would like to do it.

Senator NELSON. Wherein do you differ from those people who have been over in Petrograd and seen the slaughter and seen the killing and the commandeering? You have not seen any? Where have you kept yourself while you were in Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. I kept myself out and in danger a good deal more than the Y. M. C. A. secretaries and the bank clerks did.

Senator NELSON. But they were men who were over there all through this business.

Miss BRYANT. If you ask the head of our military mission, the head of the Y. M. C. A., the head of the Quakers, or the head of the Red Cross—the heads of these various organizations—they will tell you just what I have told you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did the Quakers have a representative over there?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and they have requested that he be heard.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is that?

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Frank Keddie, of Philadelphia. They have published a statement saying that they have not been heard.

Senator OVERMAN. Has he been over there?

Miss BRYANT. He was over there for several years. And also Davis, who is the head of the Y. M. C. A., was over there for two years.

Senator OVERMAN. When did Mr. Keddie leave there?

Miss BRYANT. I think he has just come back.

Senator NELSON. Were you at any other place in Russia than Moscow and Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. I was there all the time.

Senator NELSON. Only those two places?

Miss BRYANT. Those were the places where most of the struggle went on.

Senator NELSON. That is the storm center?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And you did not see any of the storm?

Miss BRYANT. I told you some of the storm.

Senator NELSON. You say you saw ordinary battles but did not see massacres. You saw soldiers fighting against soldiers?

Miss BRYANT. Soldiers fighting against soldiers.

Senator NELSON. Where?

Miss BRYANT. Well, when Kerensky marched with the Cossacks on Petrograd I saw the Red Guards, composed of men and women, smash his forces.

Senator NELSON. Did you think that Kerensky would establish a fair government?

Miss BRYANT. I believe he was a fair man, but he was not backed by the allies and that is why he failed.

Senator NELSON. You do not think he was quite as good as the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. As the soviet government, no, because he was only tolerated by the Russian people. It was only a provisional government tolerated by the soviets. They did not like the way he acted, so they threw him out.

Senator NELSON. Why do you call the Bolsheviki a provisional government?

Miss BRYANT. I did not do so. It is a political party, just like the Democrats, who are in power now.

Senator NELSON. It is a political party? It is no government? It is chaos—the soviet rule in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Not at all. You do not follow me.

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not know what the conditions are?

Miss BRYANT. I can only state as to what they were when I was there.

Mr. HUMES. The present government is a dictatorship?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; it is a transitory period.

Mr. HUMES. It is an absolute dictatorship?

Miss BRYANT. Of the proletariat; yes. It has been called that. It is the rule of the many against the few, a dictatorship of the many.

Mr. HUMES. Have you studied the constitution of the Bolsheviks?
Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve of the form of government, and have you defended the government as it is outlined?

Miss BRYANT. I have not been defending it, and it is of no importance to anyone whether I approve of it or not.

Mr. HUMES. I am asking if you have advocated it?

Miss BRYANT. No; I have advocated self-determination in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. And you have not given your approval to their form of government?

Miss BRYANT. Just as I have said, I believe in self-determination.

Senator STERLING. I note one sentence in your book here, Miss Bryant, which reads as follows:

The high place and the respect accorded Trotsky gives evidence of the real feeling of the people.

Miss BRYANT. "Toward the Jews," if you will go on and finish it; "the feeling of the people concerning the Jews."

Senator STERLING. Does that relate to the Jews?

Miss BRYANT. That relates to the fact that after I came home to America I found that there were stories afloat that there were pogroms among the Jews, and what I said was that the high place accorded to Trotzky—the minister of war—proved that that was not so.

Senator STERLING. Then you did not mean the whole people of Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I mean to say 95 per cent.

Senator STERLING. The Jewish people?

Miss BRYANT. Ninety-five per cent of the people.

Senator STERLING. You think that 95 per cent of the Russian people have this high respect for Trotzky?

Miss BRYANT. I think all the people in the soviet have it.

Senator STERLING. All the people in the soviet. Are there peasants in the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly. They have been in there for a year.

Senator STERLING. Do you think the peasant population of Russia—the farmers—are upholding Trotzky?

Miss BRYANT. I can prove that to you.

Senator STERLING. They are terrorized more or less, are they not, by the Trotzky government?

Miss BRYANT. I should say that they are not terrorized. They are armed, and they have taken their land and they are working it.

Senator STERLING. And they send out the Red Guards to get supplies from the peasants?

Miss BRYANT. The peasants have their own land and have equal representation in the government.

Senator STERLING. Answer my question. Do they not send out Red Guards to take by force grain and supplies from the peasants?

Miss BRYANT. No; not that I know of.

Senator OVERMAN. You say the peasants are armed?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. Of course the old Russian Army was composed originally of peasants, and when they went home they took their arms with them.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you not know that it has been testified here that the Bolsheviki have taken all the peasants' arms, and they have got nothing to fight with except pitchforks and sticks?

Miss BRYANT. That is not the truth.

Senator OVERMAN. How do you know it?

Miss BRYANT. The Russian armies were composed of peasants.

Mr. HUMES. Were not the Russian armies disarmed when they were demobilized?

Miss BRYANT. They were not. They were sent home with their arms.

Mr. HUMES. Those that belonged to the Bolsheviki were given their arms.

Miss BRYANT. All the rest that did not have arms were given arms.

Mr. HUMES. Did it not occur while you were there that the Red Guards searched the houses and went through all the territory that they could reach, disarming the people who were not a part of the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. I heard stories like that, but I did not see any of it.

Mr. HUMES. You heard of it but did not see it?

Miss BRYANT. No. You see, the left socialist party is the peasant party, and it is the biggest party in Russia, and works with the soviets. Now, Marie Spirodonova, whom I describe in my book, has been twice elected president of the all-Russian congress of peasants, meeting in Petrograd, and she has always worked with the peasants. She told me how the peasants came into the soviet, and all about it, and I think she is very good authority.

Senator OVERMAN. People who have lived out among them—distinguished men in this country who have lived in Russia—say that they have been deliberately going to the homes of the people and robbing them and taking all their food, and also disarming them. You do not believe that?

Miss BRYANT. I do not believe that is true, because Prof. Ross does not think so, and he was there, and was out among the peasants, and he said it was not true.

Senator OVERMAN. You heard these people?

Miss BRYANT. But I do not think they knew the peasants in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. When did Dr. Ross leave Russia?

Miss BRYANT. In March. Mr. Keddie has just come back, and he will testify to the same thing. He knows the peasants.

Mr. HUMES. When did Mr. Keddie leave?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. It was just a short time ago.

Mr. HUMES. Now, you say that the Bolsheviki are only a political party?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How many political parties are there in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. There are a lot of political parties, and they are all socialists, except the cadets. You see that that is the mistake that they make there, the mistake that Breshkovsky, the old grandmother of the revolution, that came in here, makes. She differs from the Bolsheviki, but they are all socialists, as this old woman is. That is what she was put in prison for, for being a socialist.

Senator OVERMAN. And yet she came here and said that the people are starving.

Miss BRYANT. I do not think she knows.

Senator OVERMAN. And she says the people are praying for us to help.

Miss BRYANT. Most of her own party has gone back in the soviet. I think she is an old lady with a grand past and a pitiful present.

Senator NELSON. Do you think that if you had been 20 years in Siberia—

Miss BRYANT. I think my mind would have broken, too.

Senator NELSON. She graduated from Siberia.

Miss BRYANT. She did, and so did many others who are now commissars in the government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did Trotzky?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly. His name, Trotzky, was a jail name that he had in Siberia.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was Lenine in Siberia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and Lenine's brother was one of the greatest martyrs ever executed in Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. How many years was Trotzky in Siberia?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know how many years, but he escaped.

Senator WOLCOTT. And he came to America from there soon after the 1905 revolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he escaped from Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes. Having graduated from Siberia, having the record behind her that this old grandmother of the revolution has, you do not agree that that old lady has any interest in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I do not contend that at all, but I think she is being used.

Senator OVERMAN. By whom?

Miss BRYANT. By the counter-revolutionists, by the Mensheviks, and by various organizations.

Senator OVERMAN. The very people she has been fighting for 30 years?

Miss BRYANT. Down in Henry Street House, when they were expecting Breshkovsky, all the old ladies who have known her a lifetime were very much concerned about what was going to happen to her over here, because one of the first things she asked about was, "Where is my dear Emma?" meaning Emma Goldman, with whom she lived when she was here before. They told her she was in prison, and Breshkovsky said she wanted to go to her, and they told her it was a long ways and she could not do it, and she felt very badly about it. When she talks to you she does not know what you think, at all, and you do not know what she thinks. You do not understand each other. You are not the same kind of people.

Senator OVERMAN. I know what she said. She said that in Petrograd, under the Bolshevik government, the people are all sad, depressed, and begging and starving to death.

Miss BRYANT. How would you people feel if somebody from here went over to Russia and asked them to send an army over here? If Emma Goldman would come out of prison and do so, now that would be just as reasonable, I think.

Senator OVERMAN. You have not much respect for the old lady?

MISS BRYANT. I have a great deal of respect for her. That does not prove disrespect.

Senator WOLCOTT. You think she is afflicted with senile dementia, do you?

MISS BRYANT. I think she does not understand. I would like to tell you a story about Tchitcherin, the minister of foreign affairs. At the time she was in hiding in Moscow, a Jewish editor came from New York and he went to Moscow, and the first thing he said to Tchitcherin, the foreign minister, was, "Can you tell me where Breshkovsky is? They have stories out in America that she has been killed." Tchitcherin said, "She is right down the street only a short distance from here, but do not tell her we know, because the old lady is under a delusion. She thinks we want to murder her, and it will make her much happier if she thinks that we do not know where she lives. If she intends to leave Russia, we will shut our eyes."

Mr. HUMES. Was it not published in the official organ of the Bolshevik government that the old lady was dead, and that they had given her a decent burial?

MISS BRYANT. She was reported dead several times.

Mr. HUMES. Was it not published by Nuorteva, the official representative of the soviets, over his own signature? Do you not know that as a matter of fact?

MISS BRYANT. No; I think you should ask Nuorteva about it.

Senator NELSON. You think the old lady is deluded yet?

MISS BRYANT. You see, Breshkovskaya said there were no books printed in Russia and that there was no furniture even, and no schools. You remember she made that statement here. She made the statement that no books had been printed in Russia. I could bring you books that have been printed since the soviets came in power, and I know that there were thousands of new schools established.

Senator NELSON. You need not go into that. It is sufficient that you just said that the old lady was deluded.

MISS BRYANT. I want to tell you about the conditions in Russia, to prove she is mistaken.

Senator NELSON. You have said the old lady is deluded; that is enough.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever read this article of Nuorteva, the official representative over here, in which he says the following:

Catherine Breshkovskaya has never been imprisoned by the soviets. When she died—not of privation but of old age—the soviet government, although she was its opponent on the question of tactics and principles, gave her a public funeral and hundreds of thousands of Moscow workers, members of the soviet, turned out to pay their respects to the "grandmother of the Russian revolution."

You say that an effort has been made by the enemies of the soviet government to misrepresent her in this country. Has not Nuorteva misrepresented her?

MISS BRYANT. Not at all. Our entire press has made the same statement that Mr. Nuorteva has made.

Senator NELSON. But do you not think the old lady is deluded because she would not stay dead?

MISS BRYANT. I think, Senator Nelson, it was very hard on some people that she did not stay dead, because they wanted to prove that the Bolsheviks had killed her.

Mr. HUMES. You testified that Nuorteva has been the official representative of the Bolsheviks since he came back to America. After reading that article of Nuorteva, do you think the information you would get from him is entirely reliable?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think any information you get from Russia is entirely reliable, because it is so hard to get it. The government makes it so difficult to get information about Russia. We do not really actually know about the Czecho-Slavs or anything else, because we can not get information.

Mr. HUMES. Nuorteva is apparently not reliable there.

Miss BRYANT. I think that the majority of the information he has is entirely reliable. I do not attach any importance to this mistake.

Mr. HUMES. When the information is satisfactory, when it serves his purpose.

Senator STERLING. Madame Breshkovskaya was a socialist, was she not, and is?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. And a revolutionist?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Did you not prove that she was working, up until the time that the Bolsheviks came into power, as a socialist and a revolutionist in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I thought she was a very great character in those days.

Senator STERLING. But she opposed the methods of the Bolsheviks; and because she did, you think she is deluded?

Miss BRYANT. Well, as you see, she stood for the provisional government and she is partisan. My point, as I said, is that I did not want to see America embroiled in a long war because of the opinion of an old lady, or the opinion of anyone—a Y. M. C. A. undersecretary or anyone else—because I wanted Russia to work out her own destiny.

Senator STERLING. There were thousands upon thousands of socialists in Russia, were there not?

Miss BRYANT. Russia is composed mostly of socialists.

Senator STERLING. There were thousands upon thousands of them who were not Bolsheviks?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Kerensky himself was a radical socialist, was he not?

Miss BRYANT. Well, I would consider him not even a radical socialist.

Senator STERLING. He was considered so, was he not, as a member of the Duma?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but the Duma, you see, was very reactionary, and he naturally would be considered radical as a member of the Duma.

Senator STERLING. Were there not a number of the leaders in the Duma who were socialists and revolutionists?

Miss BRYANT. Not many of them at that time.

Senator OVERMAN. Why did the Bolsheviks have such an antipathy toward Ambassador Francis, so that he could not get in communication with them except through the Bolshevik representative, who was Mr. Robins?

Miss BRYANT. I do not call Mr. Robins the Bolshevik representative.

Senator OVERMAN. Well, what was he?

Miss BRYANT. He was the head of the American Red Cross.

Senator OVERMAN. I will take that back. You called him the "go-between," I think.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; he went to the soviets whenever Ambassador Francis wanted him to, I believe, because it was easier for him to get in touch with them. For one thing, they liked his personality, and he seemed to be absolutely willing to find out what they wanted.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Francis is a very agreeable man. Why was it that they had such an antipathy to him?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know what it was, except that they did not seem to trust him the way that they did Col. Robins.

Senator OVERMAN. Was not propaganda circulated in the country that he represented the capitalists of this country?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think so, any more than Col. Robins and Col. Thompson, because Col. Thompson is a Wall Street man, as you know, and they liked him very well; and they liked Maj. Thacher, who is also a Wall Street man.

Senator WOLCOTT. He gave them a great deal of money, did he not—Col. Thompson?

Miss BRYANT. I know that he gave the Kerensky government money, and I do not think they questioned it. I think they thought he was a fine man all the way around.

Senator WOLCOTT. But he gave money also to the Bolshevik government, did he not?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know whether he did or not.

Senator WOLCOTT. You know he gave money to the Kerensky government?

Miss BRYANT. I know he did that.

Senator NELSON. Is it not true, Mrs. Reed, that the Bolshevik government or the soviet government has segregated the people into two classes, capitalists and the proletariat?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Are you a capitalist or a proletarian?

Miss BRYANT. Well, being a newspaper reporter and having absolutely—

Senator NELSON. Answer the question. Do you belong to the capitalist class or the proletariat?

Miss BRYANT. Well, I am very poor, so I belong to the proletariat. I have to be a proletarian.

Senator NELSON. You could not carry out your mission without being a proletarian?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know that I have a mission; but if you want to give me one, all right.

Mr. HUMES. Miss Bryant, in discussing Breshkovskaya a moment ago, you started to say that she was opposed to the constituent assembly, or was in favor of the constituent assembly and opposed to the soviet republic, or the soviets.

Miss BRYANT. No; she was not opposed to the constituent.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the opposition of the Bolsheviks to her is due to the fact that she is in favor of the constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. No; not at all.

Mr. HUMES. I asked her how she stood, in order to get a clear, correct diagnosis of her position.

Miss BRYANT. My only opposition to her is because she believes in intervention and I do not.

Mr. HUMES. She has always believed in a constituent assembly, has she not?

Miss BRYANT. That is not my business.

Mr. HUMES. Are not the Bolsheviki now opposed to a constituent assembly?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; they do not want a constituent assembly, and neither do the left social revolutionists or any of the other parties. Mr. Tchernov, the chairman of the constituent assembly, has accepted posts in the soviet government; so even he does not stand for a constituent assembly any more, and I do not see why we should.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is not very good logic.

Miss BRYANT. Why not? If the Russians themselves do not want a constituent assembly—the foremost champion does not—why should we bother ourselves about it?

Senator WOLCOTT. I understood you to say that some man who used to be in favor of a constituent assembly——

Miss BRYANT. He was the president of the constituent assembly.

Senator WOLCOTT (continuing). Now has a post in the soviet government, and therefore he is not in favor of a constituent assembly.

Miss BRYANT. Nearly all of them have done the same thing.

Senator WOLCOTT. That does not strike me as good logic at all. They may be just making the best of the situation as they find it, and still be in favor of the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. The distinction between the soviet government and the constituent assembly is the difference between the rule of a class and the rule of the people.

Miss BRYANT. It is the rule of 95 per cent, which is a larger representation than the masses have in any other country in the world.

Mr. HUMES. Do the Bolsheviki represent 98 per cent of Russia?

Miss BRYANT. No; but all the parties represented in the soviets do.

Mr. HUMES. Do you mean to say that all the other parties are represented in the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. I know there are quite a number of them in the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that in the control of the soviets the parties, other than the Bolsheviki, are not permitted to participate, but by terrorism they are kept out?

Miss BRYANT. Of course I do not. I have been in soviet meetings.

Mr. HUMES. Since January, 1918? Have you been in any since January, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. No; but I was present at soviet meetings during three months. The soviets have never been composed solely of Bolsheviki. They have always been composed of social revolutionists of all the parties, except the cadets and, for a time, the right socialist revolutionists and Mensheviki.

Mr. HUMES. Are you talking of their paper organization or their actual operation?

Miss BRYANT. Of the organization; and the soviet government has never been composed of just Bolsheviki.

Mr. HUMES. Then, anything that people have testified to with respect to other parties not being represented in the soviet is not true?

Miss BRYANT. It certainly is not; and if you will let me give my testimony on that here, I will prove that it is perfectly true that other parties have worked with the soviets right along.

Mr. HUMES. We have had testimony here that they worked with them because they had to do it.

Miss BRYANT. But it was my particular job. I had to follow the political situation. I worked very hard to get the political situation straight in my mind.

Mr. HUMES. But since January, 1918, no official documents have come from Russia.

Miss BRYANT. Some came to Nuorteva.

Senator WOLCOTT. But his official documents are not very reliable, apparently, because he put out one about the death of Breshkovsky.

Miss BRYANT. But he has documents that have come from Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. But anything that comes out from that man we can not depend on.

Miss BRYANT. Then we can not depend on anybody, for that matter.

Senator WOLCOTT. But he put out a story about the death of Mme. Breshkovskaya, and we have heard her talk here.

Miss BRYANT. If you would let me talk, I could contradict some of the testimony that has been given here. Even our most conservative papers gave out the same story.

Senator WOLCOTT. But this information that he gave out we know is not true, because the woman was here talking to us.

Miss BRYANT. Do you not think, in all fairness, it is right to ask the heads of the official organizations to tell what they have seen over there?

Senator WOLCOTT. We may have some of them later on. This investigation is not over yet.

Miss BRYANT. They have not been asked to come here so far.

Senator NELSON. Mrs. Reed, I will honestly tell you that I think you are more deluded than Mme. Breshkovskaya.

Miss BRYANT. Why is that, Senator Nelson?

Senator NELSON. And I am sorry for you. But you are young, and you may reform. Now, I want to ask you one question in all seriousness. The Bolshevik government of Lenine and Trotzky has been in control over there at Petrograd and at Moscow, I think, since November, 1917?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Over 14 months.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Have they during all of that time attempted to have an election in Russia and elect a constituent assembly, a representative body, such as the Duma was before, or such as we have in free countries?

Miss BRYANT. They do not want that sort of government.

Senator NELSON. Have they ever done that? Have they attempted to hold a representative election?

Miss BRYANT. They are against a constituent assembly. Why should they hold an election for it?

Senator NELSON. They constitute themselves a constituent assembly.

Miss BRYANT. They have a regular elective government within the soviets.

Senator NELSON. Then they hold such elections, do they?

Miss BRYANT. Do you know how a soviet government works? They can have an election any time they want it.

Senator NELSON. Are you familiar with the land system of Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Of what does it consist?

Miss BRYANT. The land system?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. There is only one system.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that the Russian peasants are settled in villages and do not live on their farms, by themselves, as the farmers do in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I do not see that that is a big factor, because each peasant has land.

Senator NELSON. They are floating around now, are they not?

Miss BRYANT. No; they have their own pieces of land, on which they live and work.

Senator NELSON. Has not that been the system up until this time—that they lived in villages?

Miss BRYANT. The great landlords—

Senator NELSON. No; answer my question. Has not that been the fact, that the Russian peasants have lived in villages, which they called mirs?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but the mirs went out of existence 40 years ago.

Senator NELSON. And the land has belonged to the mirs, or the communities?

Miss BRYANT. No; it has belonged to the great landlords.

Senator NELSON. And they allotted it from year to year, or after a period of years, to the peasants to work? Has not that been their land system?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Well, they have that land yet, have they not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. What is the Bolshevik government going to do with it; divest the community and then assume ownership of it, and then have the state own it?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. But it is the same thing, and they need not pay rent.

Senator NELSON. Instead of the community?

Miss BRYANT. Well, the community and the state are the same thing. You can understand that. The peasants themselves can work communistically, as they have done in the past.

Senator NELSON. And if the state owns the land, and if it continues to own it, what will the peasants be that are working there, other than tenants?

Miss BRYANT. What difference does it make?

Senator NELSON. They will not be any more than tenants. They will not be owners, will they?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Senator NELSON. You do not believe that the peasants should own the land?

Miss BRYANT. I think they should decide that themselves.

Senator NELSON. If the state owns it, if the soviet government or if the government of Tootzky and Lenine or the Bolshevik government, or whatever you want to call it—Beelzebub is called by different names in the Bible, as you know, but whatever you might call this government—they have confiscated all the land and said it belongs not to the rural communities, as heretofore, but it belongs to the state, and the state will continue to own it. Is not that so?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; that is the idea.

Senator NELSON. Then, somebody has got to cultivate that land, have they not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; the peasants will cultivate it, as before.

Senator NELSON. Then, the people that cultivate it will be nothing more than land tenants, will they not?

Miss BRYANT. Why——

Senator NELSON. Will they be anything more than tenants? They will not be owners?

Miss BRYANT. But they do not care anything about that.

Senator NELSON. They will not own it as you own the hat on your head.

Miss BRYANT. I would not care if it was owned by the government and they allowed me to wear it. It would not make any difference to me.

Senator NELSON. You think the Russian peasants should be nothing but tenants of the state, which should own all of the land?

Miss BRYANT. Public ownership is the socialist idea and always has been.

Senator NELSON. Then, it is your idea?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I am in sympathy with socialism. All socialists believe that.

Senator NELSON. You believe that, do you not?

Miss BRYANT. Every socialist in the United States and in every country believes that.

Senator NELSON. You believe that this country should take the land—condemn it—and the Government should possess all the land, and that the tillers of the land should be nothing but tenants; is that your belief? Answer my question.

Miss BRYANT. Well, you have just discovered socialism.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that? Just answer the question yes or no.

Miss BRYANT. I believe that; yes. That is socialism. You have discovered socialism just there.

Senator NELSON. Yes; I am aware that that is socialism. And that is what you are trying to preach in this country, is it not?

Miss BRYANT. Not at all. I am not a scholar on socialism. I have never preached it.

Senator NELSON. What are you trying to preach here?

Miss BRYANT. I am not preaching. I am trying to tell what went on in Russia while I was there.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe in the system there? They have taken possession of the banks, they have taken possession of all property in Russia, and they call it the property of the State.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. The people that use that property are nothing but tenants, and cotters, and you would reduce all the Russian people and all the Russian peasants to simply a state of tenancy and make them tenants and cotters.

Miss BRYANT. But under the circumstances——

Senator NELSON. You would throw civilization back a thousand years.

Miss BRYANT. They think it advances it a thousand years.

Senator NELSON. It has been the ambition—as you yourself should know, if you have read history—of all the tillers of the soil, who were originally serfs and tied to the land, almost like slaves, it has been their ambition for centuries to become owners of the land that they tilled, owners themselves, and you want to undo it and go back to the olden plan and make them simply tenants. Is that your gospel?

Miss BRYANT. It is not my gospel. It is the soviets' gospel.

Senator NELSON. You believe in that soviet gospel?

Miss BRYANT. I believe in socialism.

Senator NELSON. You believe in that gospel I have stated.

Miss BRYANT. If the government wanted the land; yes.

Senator NELSON. And you would make the bulk of the people simply cotters, and tenants, who cultivate the land?

Miss BRYANT. I do not call them cotters and tenants. I think they would be very free under such an arrangement.

Senator NELSON. You do not want the man who tills the soil, the man who handles the hoe and shovel and does the hard work, to be anything but a mere tenant? Is that your gospel?

Miss BRYANT. I want him to decide it himself.

Senator NELSON. Is that your gospel? Answer my question and do not equivocate.

Miss BRYANT. I do not want to force anything on any people.

Senator NELSON. Do not equivocate. Tell me where you stand. We want to know. You come here as the luminary of the Bolsheviks. Now, give us all the light you can.

Miss BRYANT. That is what they believe. They believe in government ownership; yes.

Senator NELSON. And you believe in it?

Miss BRYANT. I think it all right if they want it.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to make sure that I understood you a while ago, Mrs. Reed. I understood you to say that in your opinion this soviet form of government, as you got acquainted with it in Russia, would not be a good thing for our country.

Miss BRYANT. That is what I said. You see, it is very difficult to tell you, for you will not let me talk in order to explain.

Senator WOLCOTT. I will let you talk if, before you start, you will just confine yourself by my question and make your answer responsive to it.

Miss BRYANT. You see, all socialists believe in government ownership, and that is government ownership. But whether it would ever be worked out in this country as it worked out in Russia I am not able to say, and that is why I said I doubted very much if it would work out exactly as it did in Russia. Russia is more of an agricultural country. I have not been advocating it one way or the other in the United States. I have simply been telling how it worked in Russia, and I am telling the facts about it now.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you prefer that government to this?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. I have not thought about it.

Senator STERLING. Do you believe that the peasants of Russia believe in that system?

Miss BRYANT. I certainly do; the greater number of them.

Senator STERLING. You believe that they believe in that system?

Miss BRYANT. I believe they do. I know they do.

Senator STERLING. That the peasant who holds his land in the community of which Senator Nelson has spoken is ready to give up his land and let the state own it, and then be a tenant of the state?

Miss BRYANT. There have always been communes in Russia, and they like that way of living. They work that way with the state, and they get help from the state.

Senator NELSON. Do you know, Mrs. Reed, that there are two classes of socialists, which are generally designated as those who believe in socialism by evolution by peaceful methods and those who believe in socialism by revolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Does not the Trotzky-Lenine government belong in the latter class—to the revolutionary socialists?

Miss BRYANT. Well, they believe that—

Senator NELSON. Answer my question. Do they not belong to the revolutionary class?

Miss BRYANT. All socialists belong to it in a way, if there is no other method of bringing about their desires.

Senator NELSON. Well, I am asking you about this concrete case.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do they not belong to the revolutionary class?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They do not believe in securing it by evolution?

Miss BRYANT. They do if they can; but they could not do it in Russia.

Senator NELSON. But if they can not, it is by revolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. By blood and sword, rapine, murder, and fire. Do you believe in that?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not. I did not say that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then, if I got your point of view, it is that you are a socialist in that you are in sympathy with socialistic ideas?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You believe, however, in socialism obtained by lawful processes if, under the form of government in the particular country, it is obtainable in that way?

Miss BRYANT. That is it, exactly.

Senator WOLCOTT. Undoubtedly in this country it is obtainable by law if the people want it by law?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Therefore, in this country, you would be opposed to the use of violence such as its representatives have perpetrated in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am very anxious to get that from you, because it is commonly understood that you advocate in this country such a program as has been going on in Russia.

Miss BRYANT. At our meeting in Washington all of this came up, and that was the statement gotten out by the Washington Post, because they are in sympathy, as I understand it, with the old Czar's régime; so they wanted to discredit our meeting as much as possible; so they said we advocated the violent overthrow of the United States Government, and I did not say anything about it at all. The Secret Service has a full report and they will verify this statement.

Senator WOLCOTT. You want to go on record as being opposed to violence in carrying out this program in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I am opposed to violence; and I am also opposed to the right of free press and free speech being taken from the American people. I am opposed to all kinds of curtailments of free press and free speech.

Senator OVERMAN. Would you be opposed to the circulation through the mails of those papers that advocate murder and assassination to overthrow the Government?

Miss BRYANT. No, I would not be; but I do not think there are such papers—certainly not socialist papers—that advocate the violent overthrow of the United States Government.

Senator OVERMAN. I am not asking you if there are such, but if you would be willing to support a law to stop such papers from going through the mails?

Miss BRYANT. Most of our laws are made in such a way that they curtail all kinds of things that they are not supposed to curtail. Take the espionage act, for example.

Senator OVERMAN. I asked you if you would want to stop this propaganda that advocates the overthrow of the Government by force from going through the mails?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. I am glad to hear you say that.

Miss BRYANT. But I believe that the wisest course at the present time is tolerance, and I do not think we show any tolerance at all. We exhibit nothing but hysteria. When I came into this room, simply because it was to give a sympathetic view of the soviet rule, I was attacked in a manner that no one else has been.

Senator WOLCOTT. You were not attacked, Mrs. Reed, when I was here.

Miss BRYANT. You were not here.

Senator WOLCOTT. You mean in the very beginning, when you were asked these questions about your beliefs?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are questions that are commonly asked in court when a witness has taken the stand, when it is desired to have information in answer to the questions that will be pertinent.

Miss BRYANT. But they were asked in a rather cutting tone, and with a certain rough manner that was not used with any other witness.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, those questions were not asked of any other witness.

Senator OVERMAN. I believe Senator King asked those questions. He is a judge, and I believe those questions are not infrequently asked when it has been testified that a person has certain beliefs. Of course, it has been testified that the Bolsheviki do not believe in the Christian religion, and we wanted to know whether you had the same doctrine as the Bolsheviki. You could not complain of that.

Miss BRYANT. It does not matter now. I am very glad I could tell you anything. I told you that I was at the service of this committee.

Senator OVERMAN. We did not want to show you any disrespect, but these questions were asked you—

Miss BRYANT. If I recollect, you asked no other witnesses those questions, because they are against the soviets.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been reported to us by other witnesses that the Bolsheviki did not believe in God, and we asked those questions because if you did not you would not be a competent witness.

Miss BRYANT. I see.

Senator OVERMAN. I will ask you that question, since we have come to it. Does the Bolshevik government believe in the Christian religion?

Miss BRYANT. You do not understand what the soviets did? They did as the French did in 1910, they separated the church and state, and that is the basis of all French politics to-day. You can be a member of any church or you do not need to be a member of any. It is just as it is under the American Government, do you see? You may belong to this church or that church. They allow freedom of religion.

Senator WOLCOTT. If that is all it is, nobody is opposed to that.

Miss BRYANT. That is all it is.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, in regard to this Washington Post article you spoke of, did that article state—and I am asking you because my recollection is that it did—that anyone at that meeting you spoke of advocated the overthrow of government by force?

Miss BRYANT. I tell you it did. I had the clippings and I went over them. In the first place, a man by the name of Brown called me a female Trotzky and made all sorts of accusations against me which were not true in any way. I do not know whether I am a female Trotzky or not, but I know the other accusations are not true.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not recall that it stated that anyone advocated the overthrow of government by force.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and it even put in certain delicate little touches about our camping a block from the United States Treasury, but I do not know that that had any significance.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever attend the trial of a case in a soviet court?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I followed the revolutionary tribunal as long as I was in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Was the death penalty ever administered while you were there?

Miss BRYANT. I think they did administer it afterwards, but not during the time that I was there.

Mr. HUMES. The death penalty was abolished by Kerensky, was it not?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Then, after the Bolshevik government came into power, they restored the death penalty?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; there are three conditions under which you can receive the death penalty. I have them here.

MR. HUMES. Under what three conditions was the death penalty imposed?

MISS BRYANT. One for speculation in the necessities of life, that is, in food and other products that are needed by the starving population; for grafters inside of the soviet government itself; and for people who tried to take up arms against the government or to bring in foreign troops.

MR. HUMES. That was equivalent to treason?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. People trying to take up arms against the government?

MISS BRYANT. Well, that is what I have tried to explain to you.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You could not call that equivalent to treason, because there was no established government as yet.

MISS BRYANT. But they considered it established.

SENATOR NELSON. But they did not apply that doctrine to the Germans?

MISS BRYANT. Do you think they treated the Germans delicately? They forced the Germans out of Russia.

SENATOR NELSON. No; they kept them there—German officers; plenty of Germans in the Soviet Red Guard.

MISS BRYANT. That is not so.

SENATOR NELSON. You do not know anything about it. You did not see the Red Guard, hardly. You left over a year ago, about.

MISS BRYANT. But you were not there at all, at any time. How can you say it is true?

SENATOR NELSON. You do not know what the Red Guard is to-day?

MISS BRYANT. But I can imagine it is not true. I can tell you how you can see what it looks like right now, if you want to. Mr. Humes knows that the military intelligence or the naval intelligence, I do not know which, has a film owned by the soviet government, in their possession, which was brought over here by a newspaper enterprise association man.

SENATOR NELSON. We have had testimony here that they had many Germans and German officers, from people who have come from there since you were there and have seen the guards.

MISS BRYANT. All right; but I do not believe that it is so. It is not true that that film does exist and you have it?

MR. HUMES. Did you ever see the film that you are talking about?

MISS BRYANT. I did not see it, but I know it exists.

MR. HUMES. Do you know what is on that film?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Is there anything in that film to picture the industry of the soviet government in the construction of buildings?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; it shows the construction of the new station at Moscow, for one thing.

MR. HUMES. That is the same station, is it not, that was under process of construction when the war broke out and was abandoned by the government because of the lack of labor and materials; and is it not in the same state, practically, that it was in at the time of the outbreak of the war, and the soviet government put that in this film in order to try to point out, so to speak, soviet industry; is not that the fact?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think that is quite true.

Mr. HUMES. Did you see that station in Moscow?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Were they working on it when you saw it?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Mr. HUMES. When you saw it it was just in the state that it was in when the European war broke out, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. I suppose so. I do not know what state it was in when the war broke out.

Mr. HUMES. It is still in the same state it was in at that time?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know, I am sure. But I know they show public play grounds for peasant children on the former great estates of the landlords; and I know they show new schools, new hospitals; and I know they show the Red Guard army on parade with all kinds of equipment that they have, and all sorts of things like that.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that that whole film is a fake film in order to misrepresent the situation?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think so at all.

Mr. HUMES. Well, if it represents that this station in Moscow has been constructed by the Bolsheviki, it is a misrepresentation, is it not?

Miss BRYANT. They may show what they have done on that station, and that they have completed it.

Mr. HUMES. But the station, when you saw it, was practically the same station it was when the war broke out.

Miss BRYANT. I did not see it when the war broke out, so I do not know what condition it was in then.

Mr. HUMES. But there was nothing whatever done with it at that time.

Miss BRYANT. At that time they were having a frightful civil war and they could not do anything. It must have been long before this film was taken.

Senator STERLING. You spoke about three instances in which the death penalty was inflicted?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Let me ask you if one of the conditions of inflicting the death penalty in those three instances was first a trial and a judgment of the court?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. It was?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Are you sure about that?

Miss BRYANT. It always was so. I do not know why it should not have been in these cases.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear the testimony here to the effect that members of the Red Guard came into the prisons and took men out and shot them without any trial at all or chance to be heard?

Miss BRYANT. I heard witnesses testify that the Red Guard had come and taken people out, but they did not know what happened to these men. They did not say that there was no trial. They could not testify to that.

Senator STERLING. Have you any reason to believe that there was a formal trial?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I believe there was a trial.

Senator STERLING. Do you believe there have been many cases of trials of that kind since you left, in January, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you not believe that many death penalties have been inflicted without trial?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not.

Senator STERLING. Have you reason to believe that the death penalty has been inflicted on men suspected of being anti-Bolshevik without trial?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know.

Senator STERLING. You do not know?

Miss BRYANT. No; I can not say. I was not there.

Mr. HUMES. Do they have a jury in those trials?

Miss BRYANT. They have a revolutionary tribunal, who sit in front of a table, just as these people sit along here [indicating the members of the committee], and hear the testimony of various people.

Mr. HUMES. It is more like a court-martial?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; it was more like a court-martial. In the cases that I saw tried the penalties were very mild, indeed. We were rather surprised, because we anticipated that in the fervor of the moment perhaps the guillotine would be set up, like in the French Revolution, and we were very much surprised to see that they dismissed these people often with a sentence like, "We turn you over to the contempt of the people," and things like that.

Senator NELSON. They had plenty of cases to mention?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Is it possible that the guillotine has been established in Russia as a means of inflicting the death penalty?

Miss BRYANT. No; I have never heard of it. Because in the French Revolution they had the guillotine, I wondered if they would.

Mr. HUMES. Do you speak Russian?

Miss BRYANT. A little, and I can understand it.

Senator STERLING. The matter of establishing the guillotine was discussed, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. I suppose it was.

Senator STERLING. It was discussed by some of the Bolshevik leaders, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. It was discussed, but nobody ever was in favor of it.

Senator STERLING. Nobody ever was in favor of it?

Miss BRYANT. People spoke in heated moments of establishing it, but then everyone said "No, we will not countenance that."

Senator STERLING. Did some of the leaders speak about establishing it?

Miss BRYANT. There was a newspaper story, when I was in Russia, to the effect that Trotzky said, "If conditions get any worse, if there is any more terror on the part of the White Guard, we will establish the guillotine."

Mr. HUMES. Did not conditions get worse, and did they not establish the guillotine?

Miss BRYANT. No; they never have. Did any witness testify that they had?

Mr. HUMES. No; I asked you if they did.

Miss BRYANT. No; and I do not believe anybody testified to that.

Mr. HUMES. I am just asking you if they did.

Miss BRYANT. I do not believe so.

Mr. HUMES. Did you use an interpreter?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; sometimes.

Mr. HUMES. Who was the interpreter?

Miss BRYANT. I had various ones. I sometimes had this man Gumberg, who was also used by Sisson; but as there were always Russians that spoke English, like all these leaders, we did not need them even at first.

Mr. HUMES. You said something about the schools.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Will you give us the exact location of any school that you know of being in operation?

Miss BRYANT. I can do better than that. I can give you the name of a witness who can tell you all about it.

Mr. HUMES. I mean the location of one that you saw when you were there, a school that was in operation.

Miss BRYANT. I was there in the winter, and the schools were not going at that time, even in Kerensky's time. Later on some opened in Petrograd—the ordinary schools—and the new schools were just being established.

Mr. HUMES. Up to the time you left they had not gotten the schools organized and opened yet?

Miss BRYANT. No; some of the schools were running, but they had not established the new ones. But I know that many new ones were established, because Mrs. Tobenson, whose husband was head of the far-eastern soviet, and who started the workers' institute in Chicago—a Russian—told me a great deal about the schools, and she is in New York, and I am sure would be glad to testify, and she told me much about the schools; in fact, she even taught in one of them.

Mr. HUMES. Is Tobenson a member of the government now in Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and he was the head of the far-eastern soviet.

Mr. HUMES. He came from Chicago?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You did not mention him a while ago as one of the members of the government who had been in the United States?

Miss BRYANT. You said those that I saw, Russians that I saw, and I never saw him in my life. I could not say that I had seen him when I had not seen him. I only know his wife.

Mr. HUMES. All right; but he came from Chicago?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, you say you were in Petrograd and in Moscow?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You were not out among the peasants, were you?

Miss BRYANT. I never spent much time among them.

Mr. HUMES. You spent a great deal of time in Petrograd and Moscow?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You never went out in one of those mirs and saw them there?

Miss BRYANT. There were no mirs.

Mr. HUMES. So that the only peasants you know about are the ones that came into Petrograd and Moscow, and you saw in that way?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and at the great peasant congresses.

Mr. HUMES. The ones that came into Petrograd and Moscow were connected with the Bolshevik government in some way, were they not?

Miss BRYANT. Not always. Even after the Kerensky government they came in to the great peasant congresses. They met there all the time.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it proposed by the Bolshevik government to nationalize their government all over, in all countries, in this country and others; and have you heard about their sending propaganda to this country?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I have heard a good deal about that. It is the socialist idea to have a socialist world.

Senator OVERMAN. Part of their program is sending missionaries here and all through the world?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know whether it is or not. I have said there is a great deal of talk about it in our American press.

Senator OVERMAN. In talking with Trotzky, was that his purpose?

Miss BRYANT. He did not ever discuss anything of that kind with me.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is in some of their decrees, showing that that is their purpose.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Senator STERLING. You speak about these peasant congresses.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. How many of these peasant congresses were held at the time while you were there at Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. Two, and the peasants came from all over Russia.

Senator STERLING. You say you attended those congresses?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator NELSON. How many were there?

Miss BRYANT. Two.

Senator NELSON. How many people attended, I mean?

Miss BRYANT. Thousands of peasants from all over Russia.

Senator NELSON. Thousands?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; delegates from all over Russia.

Senator STERLING. What did they discuss there?

Miss BRYANT. They discussed land, peace, and bread, and showed great dissatisfaction that under the Kerensky government the land was not distributed; that the land committees were not distributing the land, and they protested against it all the time.

Senator STERLING. Yes; then they were protesting against the failure to distribute the land to the individual peasants, were they not?

Miss BRYANT. No; they were not.

Senator STERLING. They were not?

Miss BRYANT. They were not asking for individual ownership, and at each of those congresses I would like to point out that they went off to Smolny to make their declarations, and at one time Lenine came down and spoke to them—just after the soviets came into power over the Kerensky government—and they marched with Lenine up to the Smolny Institute, where the Bolshevik headquarters were, to show their approval and their solidarity.

Senator STERLING. When was that?

Miss BRYANT. That was in November, just after the revolution.

Senator STERLING. Before the revolution?

Miss BRYANT. After; you see, at that time they were not all in favor of the Bolsheviks; they were social revolutionists. Many of the right wing—

Senator STERLING. They were with the Whites?

Miss BRYANT. No; right, not white.

Senator STERLING. They were not Bolsheviks at that time?

Miss BRYANT. No; and they are not now. They are simply working with the soviet government; just as you could not say that the Republicans here are Democrats. But the majority are now left wingers.

Senator STERLING. I understood you to say a while ago that all the peasants were Bolsheviks.

Miss BRYANT. No; I said they were in the government of the Bolsheviks; that the Bolsheviks are just a political party; that they are just a political party.

Mr. HUMES. What percentage of the provinces of Russia comes under the control of the soviet government? By that I mean what part does the present government control?

Miss BRYANT. All except the Cadets.

Mr. HUMES. No; you misunderstand me.

Miss BRYANT. Yes?

Mr. HUMES. All Russia, geographically speaking, has not accepted and recognized the present soviet government, has it?

Miss BRYANT. Well, it could not if it wanted to.

Mr. HUMES. Why not?

Miss BRYANT. Because part of it is under allied control, and they have destroyed the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. The part that is not under allied control?

Miss BRYANT. The part that is not under allied control I should certainly say was under soviet domination, all of it.

Mr. HUMES. All of it?

Miss BRYANT. All of it, so far as I know.

Mr. HUMES. In your opinion it is?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; it is largely.

Mr. HUMES. Except where there are allied troops?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; all of great Russia.

Mr. HUMES. It is under the control of the present soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You said all of great Russia. You are excluding Siberia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; because a good part of Siberia is under the control of the allied troops. They have overthrown the soviets.

Senator WOLCOTT. The allied troops are not covering much territory at this time.

Miss BRYANT. Apart from that. I suppose it is all under the soviets. It was.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that not to exceed one-fourth of European Russia is under the control of the present government and recognizes the present government in any way?

Miss BRYANT. What part of it does not?

Mr. HUMES. I say, is it not a fact that only about one-fourth of it does recognize the present government?

Miss BRYANT. All of great Russia does recognize it.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know that?

Miss BRYANT. No; I do not know any more than that it did when I was there.

Mr. HUMES. You are just assuming.

Miss BRYANT. Assuming; yes.

Mr. HUMES (continuing). That because the soviet government is in control of Petrograd and Moscow, therefore the soviet government controls the whole of Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; because you see they send delegates in from local soviets from every part of Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that there is testimony that it has only about one-fourth of Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I never understood that. I do not understand it. I do not believe it at all.

Senator OVERMAN. There is a roll call on the floor of the Senate, and we will have to adjourn now.

Senator WOLCOTT. Before we adjourn, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask just one question.

Senator OVERMAN. Very well.

Senator WOLCOTT. In order to get it clear in my mind.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. The so-called Bolshevik revolution was in November, 1917?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is when they came in power?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You left Russia in January, 1918—the latter part of January?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; the latter part. Yes; about the middle or the latter part. I do not remember the exact date.

Senator WOLCOTT. November, December, January—

Miss BRYANT. November, December, and January; probably three months.

Senator WOLCOTT. More likely two and a half months?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. What day of November was it; November 7th?

Miss BRYANT. The very first part of November, I think—about the 6th.

Senator WOLCOTT. November 7th, I think, was the date, when the Bolsheviks came in.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; about then.

Senator WOLCOTT. So that your information regarding Russia that you have of your own knowledge that was gathered under the Bolshevik régime was gathered in that two and a half months?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; the first-hand knowledge was; yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is that?

Miss BRYANT. The first-hand knowledge was, of course.

Senator OVERMAN. We will take an adjournment until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow.

Miss BRYANT. I am to come back at 10.30?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes. Is there anything else you want to say?

Miss BRYANT. There are a few things that I would like to show you. I thought you would like to see them, and a few things I want to say.

(Thereupon, at 5.40 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 21, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 11 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, in Room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Wolcott, and Sterling.
Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF LOUISE BRYANT—Resumed.

Mr. HUMES. Miss Bryant, yesterday you testified that when you went to Russia you had credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger. Was that correct?

Miss BRYANT. Why, if you want to go into the whole arrangement, you probably know it very well yourself, that I had credentials from the Bell Syndicate, which was taken over by the Ledger, and I also had credentials from the Metropolitan Magazine and the other magazines in America, so I do not think there is any point to that at all.

Mr. HUMES. I am not arguing about it, but I am trying to get the facts; that is all. You said yesterday that you had credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger when you went to Russia, did you not?

Miss BRYANT. I will tell you—

Mr. HUMES. Did you not say that yesterday?

Miss BRYANT. I am supposed to be the Philadelphia Public Ledger's correspondent, for which I wrote articles.

Mr. HUMES. You said you had credentials from them?

Miss BRYANT. It is not customary to go into the whole arrangements with a newspaper.

Mr. HUMES. Well, did you have credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger?

Miss BRYANT. From the Bell Syndicate, and when I came back I found that Mr. Wheeler, the manager, had gone to the war, so I switched to the Public Ledger and made a contract with them, and I did write my articles for them when I came back, and was advertised as their correspondent.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, when you came back they bought a story from you?

Miss BRYANT. They did not buy a story from me: they bought the whole series of stories, 32 articles, of 3,000 words each, which were printed in about—I do not know—perhaps 100 newspapers.

Mr. HUMES. Well, it was a war story which was written serially in a number of assignments, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. No; it was not one story; they were 32 separate articles. They were featured everywhere.

Mr. HUMES. Inasmuch as you made the statement yesterday that you had credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger, I want to call your attention to a statement appearing in the Philadelphia Public Ledger this morning, and then ask you whether the Ledger is correct, or whether you were correct in your testimony yesterday. The title of the editorial is "Miss Louise Bryant's wrong start," and it reads as follows:

Miss Louise Bryant erred in her testimony before the Senate propaganda investigating committee when she said that she went to Russia as a correspondent for the Philadelphia Public Ledger or that she had credentials from this newspaper. The first knowledge that the management of the Public Ledger had of Miss Bryant was when, upon her return from Russia, she offered for sale a manuscript recounting her observations in that country. The manuscript was bought and published under her signature.

Miss Bryant, now a propagandist for the Bolsheviks, forgets that in her professional work it is essential that errors of statement should be so carefully selected that they can get at least 24 hours' start of truth to be even moderately effective.

Is that statement in the editorial correct, or is the statement you made yesterday, that you went to Russia with credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger, correct?

Miss BRYANT. I did not go with credentials from the Public Ledger, but the Public Ledger made me change my passes which I had from the soviet government and write in the name of the Public Ledger, so that it would appear that I went with credentials from the Public Ledger; so I had to cross out the name of the Bell Syndicate and put the name of the Public Ledger in there. I wanted to protect the Public Ledger as much as anyone else; that is why I did not go into it yesterday. I would just as soon be known as the correspondent of the Bell Syndicate, which is just as worthy an organization. I went to France for the Bell Syndicate.

Mr. HUMES. I am not questioning that. I am only trying to find out just what the fact is. You said yesterday that you went as a war correspondent to Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I did.

Mr. HUMES. And that you went with credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger. Now, the fact remains that the credentials you had were from the Bell Syndicate, and that you had no credentials from the Philadelphia Public Ledger; and that all your relations, contractual and otherwise, with the Public Ledger were entered into after your return to this country; is not that true?

Miss BRYANT. As soon as I got back to this country the Philadelphia Public Ledger telegraphed me and said, "Do not write any articles until you have seen us. Come to Philadelphia to see our representative," and I went there at their instance; and when I got there they were very anxious that I should not write these articles for the Bell Syndicate, but should write them for them.

MR. HUMES. Well, there is no question but that you wrote articles for the Public Ledger, but that is not the issue. The issue is as to whether or not, when you were in Russia, you had credentials from the Ledger. You did not, did you?

MISS BRYANT. No. Mr. Humes, may I make a statement here without being interrupted? It will take me only a minute. Will you give me that permission? You have let every other witness do this. I ask that permission. I knew that was what you were doing yesterday, but I did not know whether I ought to go into the whole arrangement or not.

Senator OVERMAN, I want to know if I will be permitted to speak a whole sentence before this committee without being interrupted?

Senator OVERMAN. You may.

MISS BRYANT. Then, I want to know why, after my testimony yesterday, you sent a telegram to Mr. Williams, whom you accused of spreading Bolshevik propaganda, and said, "Disregard telegram of February 19. Subpœna withdrawn." And if it is also true that you withdrew the subpœna to Col. Robins because you were afraid too much truth would come out here?

MR. HUMES. I do not know that I am on the witness stand, or that it is a matter with which the witness is concerned.

MISS BRYANT. This telegram is signed by Lee S. Overman, chairman. Is that correct?

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Humes has authority to sign my name to all subpœnas to witnesses and to discharge witnesses. He has the authority to sign my name. I did not sign it personally. Mr. Humes sent it personally, I suppose.

MISS BRYANT. Mr. Williams was continually under discussion here.

Senator OVERMAN. We telegraphed him to come here.

MISS BRYANT. He will be here at 4.30 this afternoon.

MR. HUMES. We wired Mr. Williams to come, and we got no response, so I canceled the telegram I sent to him.

MISS BRYANT. Did you not also cancel the one to Col. Robins?

MR. HUMES. Col. Robins has never been subpœnaed, so you are quite in error there.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to say that we have under discussion what we are going to do, on account of the shortness of the time before this session of Congress expires. The committee has not yet decided.

MISS BRYANT. I see. But, nevertheless, you have given about two weeks to undersecretaries of the Y. M. C. A. and bank clerks.

Senator OVERMAN. Will you let me talk, and I will let you talk. You will let me talk, will you not? I was going to say, and explain to you, that we have under discussion whether or not we want to adjourn this over for two weeks in order that the Senators may attend to their business in the Senate.

MISS BRYANT. And so that they can pass a law first?

Senator OVERMAN. Pass what law?

MISS BRYANT. Pass a law about free speech and free press which is pending in the Senate?

Senator OVERMAN. I do not know what may be done about that. I do not know whether we are going on with this investigation or not. That is a matter for discussion and decision hereafter. The Senators have been kept from the Senate Chamber while all these great measures have been considered, and we have under discussion whether or not we want to continue.

MISS BRYANT. Senator Overman, I object to Russian politicians coming here, and people with all sorts of picayune little grievances, that can talk all they want about Russia, but if any one gets up and says he does not believe that American troops ought to be kept in Russia, or he believes in self-determination, that American is treated as a traitor. I object to that.

Senator OVERMAN. Nobody has treated you as a traitor.

MISS BRYANT. I think you did yesterday.

Senator OVERMAN. In what way? What complaint have you got? I would like to know what complaint you have.

MISS BRYANT. Well, I was not allowed to speak; I was only asked questions.

Senator OVERMAN. I told you to come back this morning and I would hear your statement, did I not?

MISS BRYANT. Then, will I be allowed to go on?

Senator OVERMAN. Certainly. Now, you have complained to this committee, and I want to know what complaint you have. You seem to want to make a martyr of yourself, when you have not been treated unfairly that I can see. You are a woman and you do not know anything about the conduct of an examination such as we have in hand here. We are going to treat you fairly and treat you as a lady.

MISS BRYANT. I do not want to be treated as a lady, but I want to be treated as a human being.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to treat you not only as an American citizen, as a witness, and as a lady, but I want to know what complaint you have got. Because I closed this meeting the other day and sent the people out, is that your complaint?

MISS BRYANT. No; it was the whole conduct of the meeting that I objected to.

Senator STERLING. Miss Bryant, let me just tell you that you are managing, it appears to me, or trying, to create a whole lot of sympathy. You are trying to work yourself up to believe that you are being martyred here. Now, you have been treated most kindly and considerately. The chairman of this committee could not treat you in any other way than that, and I am sure that is also true of the other members of the committee.

MISS BRYANT. Do you call Senator King's treatment particularly gentle?

Senator STERLING. I did not hear a word of Senator King's examination, but from what I heard about it I do not think there was anything in it about which you can complain.

MISS BRYANT. I think everybody in this room would testify that it was not very gentle. It was a sort of third degree.

Senator OVERMAN. I tried to explain to you that Senator King has been a judge on the bench and has had these matters come up, frequently, of witnesses who were charged with having no faith in the Christian religion, and not believing in God, and he had to go through that cross-examination and ask you those questions.

Miss BRYANT. How would he have treated me if I had been a Jew?

Senator OVERMAN. He would have asked you the same questions, if anybody had charged that you did not believe in God, as it has been charged with respect to these Bolsheviki. Whether you do or not I do not know, and therefore I am not accusing you. I do not know whether I would have asked you those questions or not, myself, but he did it, and I do not think he intended any disrespect to you. I do not think so. I am sure I want to treat you with the greatest respect. You told me yesterday that you had been asked questions, and you complained that you had not been able to make your statement. I told you that if you came back in the morning I would see that you did make your statement, and I want you to go on and make what statement you have to make. But I would like to know why you complain that you have been treated so badly. I do not know what your complaints are except that you were asked a few questions preliminary, by Senator King. If you have any other complaint to the committee, I ask you to state it so that we may know.

Miss BRYANT. My principal complaint is that the witnesses who know the most about Russia are not called; people who know most about Russia. People who were sent there in official capacities are not called.

Senator OVERMAN. That does not affect you personally.

Miss BRYANT. But it affects me a great deal, because I have been asked what they think.

Senator OVERMAN. We have given you every opportunity, and we want you to go on and make your statement, and I will hear any statement you have got to make. But this refusing to call other witnesses is a question to be determined. I do not know whether we are going to call them or not. So if you do not know what we are going to do, why do you say that?

Miss BRYANT. I have this telegram, and I also heard other rumors to-day.

Senator OVERMAN. As far as you are concerned personally, we have not mistreated you, have we?

Miss BRYANT. I am not admitting that at all, Senator.

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to know what your complaint is.

Miss BRYANT. I do not want to go into it.

Senator OVERMAN. Will you not tell us?

Miss BRYANT. It was perfectly obvious to everybody that was in this room. I will not go into it.

Senator OVERMAN. If you do not explain what your complaint is, I can not correct it. I would like to correct any mistreatment of you, and I want to treat you with the utmost fairness. Now you can go ahead and make your statement. You know you will be treated fairly by me; you know that. I am the chairman of this committee; and I think the other Senators will agree with me that you shall be treated with the greatest respect. Your main complaint is, as I understand it, that we have not called other witnesses. When you came here and asked to be heard, I told you you should be heard, did I not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; you did the first day; and the second day you did not promise me.

Senator OVERMAN. I did give you a hearing, whether I promised you or not.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; you did afterwards.

Senator OVERMAN. I told you I could not promise any certain particular day. Mr. Williams has never asked to be heard, that I know of.

Miss BRYANT. He came up here to the public hearing and asked to be heard.

Senator OVERMAN. You are the only witness that I know of who has asked to be heard, except for a number of letters that I have received from people asking to be heard.

Miss BRYANT. But it is the same thing if people have sent letters when they could not come here.

Senator OVERMAN. Now we understand each other.

Mr. HUMES. Who have sent letters asking to be heard?

Miss BRYANT. Miss Beatty did, for one; and Mr. Reed did.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. That is your husband?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. I have never seen that letter.

Senator OVERMAN. He sent me a note while you were testifying; but I thought if I could put you on the stand it would clear up some of these matters. That is all that I can recollect.

Mr. JOHN REED. I have written you a letter, too, Senator Overman.

Senator OVERMAN. All right; I will not deny it. I may have received it, and my secretary may have it on file. I do not know. Mr. Reed, Miss Beatty, and who else?

Miss BRYANT. I am sure that Mr. Keddie and different officials in Philadelphia have sent letters.

Senator OVERMAN. Is that the man you spoke of—Mr. Keddie?

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Keddie has not asked to be heard.

Miss BRYANT. Some of those people have, because they published statements in papers saying they ought to be heard.

Mr. HUMES. Many letters have come suggesting that certain people could prove this or prove that, but there has been no direct request from Mr. Keddie.

Miss BRYANT. The general impression is, nevertheless, Mr. Humes, that you are only calling one side here. You must know that that is the general impression.

Senator OVERMAN. Under the resolution, we are investigating the Bolshevik government in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. The fact that you are permitted to testify is a complete answer to your statement. That shows there is nothing one-sided about the matter. You are here as a champion of the Bolshevik government.

Miss BRYANT. I am not. I have nothing to do with that at all.

Mr. HUMES. You say there are two sides. It is only a question of fact. How do you happen to say that? How do you happen to be talking about "two sides"?

Miss BRYANT. Because these people who have testified before me are absolutely against everything in revolutionary Russia, and I am neither for nor against. I am trying to tell it as an observer.

Mr. HUMES. You have not heard their testimony, have you?

Miss BRYANT. I have been right here in this court and heard it. As long as they testified about people starving and people falling down in the streets, and all that, and about there being perfect chaos in Russia, it was all right; but the minute anybody began to testify that Trotzky was an extraordinary person, or anything like that, they were dismissed.

Mr. HUMES. Have you heard any witness testify here that favored the restoration of the monarchy in Russia? Have you heard them say that they were in favor of the restoration of the monarchy, or any such thing as that?

Miss BRYANT. I heard Kryshstofovich, and you know he worked for the Tsar's Government. I think he is quite in favor of the Czar. He talked as a monarchist.

Mr. HUMES. You had better read his testimony, if you think that.

Miss BRYANT. He has not been in favor of either the provisional government or the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. He was not expressing his own opinion on anything. He told the conditions under all of the governments.

Senator STERLING. Your testimony here, taking it as a whole, whatever you may have said in regard to one or another particular matter, has put you in the position of a partisan and friend and defender of the Bolsheviki. You know that. Anybody gets that impression from your examination.

Miss BRYANT. Surely. Why not?

Senator STERLING. Both the examination in chief and the re-examination. You are defending them all the while.

Miss BRYANT. Of course. Any fair statement appears so to you. And I was given lectures.

Senator STERLING. You were not given lectures. You were cross-examined. You must submit to cross-examination when it comes. After you have testified we have to ask you questions on cross-examination, and because we have done so you have gotten the impression that we were hostile to you.

Miss BRYANT. Even my morals have been suggested by Senator Nelson. He has given me regular lectures as to what I ought to think, and how I might, somehow, come out of this terrible slump that I have gotten into.

Senator STERLING. Senator Nelson asked you questions that were perfectly proper, and that were material.

Miss BRYANT. He did not ask me questions. He lectured me. May I go on?

Senator OVERMAN. I am sorry. I had great respect for you. I thought highly of your ability, and was rather impressed with you yesterday; but now you come in this morning, and from what you say I want to say that I am impressed with the fact that you are trying to make yourself out a martyr.

Miss BRYANT. No; I am not. Don't you believe it.

Senator OVERMAN. I have asked you to state in what way the committee had treated you badly, and you said that you would not state.

Miss BRYANT. May I go on with my testimony? That is my principal business here, and I wish that I could.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes, you may go on.

Miss BRYANT. Yesterday, when I offered to read various things out of soviet decrees and other things, Mr. Humes objected and said that those things were not trustworthy; but you will agree that the Congressional Record is trustworthy and fair, will you not? [Laughter.]

Senator OVERMAN. No, I would not admit that, I think. Now, let us come down and be serious.

Miss BRYANT. On January 29 certain statements were made by Senator Johnson, and some of those statements concerned myself, although he did not mention my name. He said the State Department allowed cable messages to be sent to Russia [reading]:

The messages were sent not only with the approval of the Government, but through the Government's agencies and at the Government's expense. * * * These messages were gathered by a person designated by the authorities and were sent to Washington to be forwarded through the State Department to Petrograd.

I was given permission to do that, and I collected messages, and these messages were sent over to Russia—this was just after Brest-Litovsk—urging the Russians to come back into the war and stay by their old peace formula. At the same time Mr. Steffens came to me—

Senator OVERMAN. State who Mr. Steffens is.

Miss BRYANT. Lincoln Steffens. He came to me from Mr. Creel.

Senator WOLCOTT. That does not give me any information.

Miss BRYANT. If you will let me finish my sentence, you will get it.

Senator WOLCOTT. All right.

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Steffens came to me and said that he wanted me to sign a cablegram to Mr. Reed, who was then in Stockholm, to go back to Russia and try to persuade Lenine and Trotzky that Mr. Wilson is sincere. I think if you will call Mr. Reed he will tell you about that, too.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am still waiting for you to tell me who Steffens is.

Miss BRYANT. Lincoln Steffens?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. He is one of the best known writers in the United States—probably the best known writer in the United States.

Senator STERLING. A Socialist?

Miss BRYANT. Will you please tell me why it makes any difference whether a person is a Socialist or not?

Senator STERLING. I am not on the witness stand.

Miss BRYANT. But you say "Socialist" as if it was a condemnation of him.

Senator STERLING. I ask you a civil question, and I do not want you to go out and complain about that, when I asked you whether he was a Socialist. You pretend to be. That is what has led you to your association with the Bolsheviki, the fact that you are a Socialist.

Miss BRYANT. How do you know that it is?

Senator STERLING. You can not parade before the public the fact that you are a martyr when you are refusing to answer a civil question. I asked you if Steffens is a Socialist.

Miss BRYANT. I think he is a Socialist; I am not sure.

Senator STERLING. Then, why did you not answer that he was?

Miss BRYANT. Did you ever ask me if a man here is a Republican or a Democrat?

Senator STERLING. I am not here for the purpose of answering questions, but we are here to investigate these allied organizations to some extent.

Miss BRYANT. You see, Mr. Steffens came from Mr. Creel. You probably know his politics.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is it? I do not know.

Miss BRYANT. I suppose he is a Democrat.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he a Socialist?

Miss BRYANT. He is not, I am sure.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, you could have answered that in regard to Mr. Steffens, whether he is or not. You say you do not know.

Miss BRYANT. I did answer, but he shouted "Socialist!" to me.

Senator OVERMAN. That was a perfectly civil question.

Miss BRYANT. When I brought certain papers up here yesterday, the minute I started to read them you would say, "Those are printed in a Socialist paper?" and surely this implied that there was something wrong about them if they were printed in Socialist papers.

Senator OVERMAN. No; we wanted to know the source from which they came.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed with your statement.

Miss BRYANT. I sent these messages out, and at that time President Wilson had sent his very friendly message to the congress of soviets that were meeting in Moscow.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was July 3?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; that was one message, and we were given to understand that America was about to recognize the soviet government, and that is why I sent those messages; and those messages appeared in the soldiers' and workers' papers on the front page, and the Committee on Public Information, of course, could not have gotten that sort of publicity, because they were discredited in Russia on account of Mr. Sisson's activities.

I would like also to speak about the so-called Sisson documents, that were published in this country. If I thought that Mr. Raymond Robins was to be called, I would not go into that, because it would not be necessary to; but since I do not know, I think it is necessary.

Raymond Robins had these documents, most of them, a long time before Mr. Sisson came to Russia. He gave them to Mr. Sisson as an interesting sample of forged documents. Mr. Robins told me that himself. In the presence of a good many other witnesses.

Senator OVERMAN. Let me suggest this to you—

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know that of your own knowledge?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; absolutely.

Senator OVERMAN. From whom?

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Robins himself, in the presence of witnesses.

Senator OVERMAN. That is not competent testimony. Mr. Robins can speak for himself. But I have told you to state what you know. You are on the stand, and we want you to tell what you know.

Miss BRYANT. I do know that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Apparently you do not know that.

Miss BRYANT. Why do I not know it?

Senator WOLCOTT. You know that Mr. Robins told you that.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I know he told me that.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is all you know.

Miss BRYANT. I know more than that. When these documents began to be published I wrote a letter to Mr. Creel, saying that I would stake my life on the fact that these documents were fakes, and Mr. Creel wrote back to me and said—

Senator OVERMAN. Have you got that Creel letter?

Miss BRYANT. I have not got it here, but it was published in the New York Evening Post, and you can get it. I can give you that letter.

Senator STERLING. Of what date was it published?

Miss BRYANT. It was just at that time, about the third day after the Sisson documents began to come out in the press.

Senator WOLCOTT. They were published by our State Department.

Miss BRYANT. No; by the Committee on Public Information.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were they given out by that committee as trustworthy documents?

Miss BRYANT. They certainly were. Mr. Creel wrote to me and said that he believed in them, but he admitted that a number of them could easily be faked, and then he went on to say that the Government was behind this, and for me to remember it; and I do not think that Mr. Creel was any better American, printing something he was not sure of, causing great hostility between two great countries, than I was because I did not think these things were genuine, and therefore should not be given out as genuine.

Senator STERLING. When you say "hostility between two great countries," you mean between the United States and what other country—Russia?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Russia as a whole, or do you mean simply the Bolshevik government?

Miss BRYANT. You see, I consider the soviet government—there is no Bolshevik government, and I consider the soviet government—as the real government of Russia; and certainly representing the majority of the people.

Senator STERLING. Is this not a fact, that the soviet government of Russia is dictated by the Bolsheviks? They are in control, are they not?

Miss BRYANT. They are a political party. You could say that the Democrats, by the same logic, dictated the American Government in the same way. It is not really true.

Senator STERLING. Just one word about this soviet government. The members of the different soviets in Russia are not necessarily residents, are they, of the districts which they may be sent there from?

Miss BRYANT. They can not be sent there to those districts. That was an absolutely erroneous statement.

Senator STERLING. You heard the statement of several witnesses to that effect, did you not?

Miss BRYANT. I only heard the statement of one to that effect, that of Madame Breshkovskaya. She really does not know about the soviet government.

Senator STERLING. Do you know anything particularly about it since you left there in January, 1918?

Miss BRYANT. I know the principle it is founded on, and it does not permit that.

Senator STERLING. Do not get agitated over the matter. but just answer the question. Do you know, as a matter of fact, whether or not all members of the soviets have been residents of the districts for which they were members, since you left there?

Miss BRYANT. Certainly.

Senator STERLING. You know it, do you?

Miss BRYANT. They could not change that.

Senator STERLING. They could not change that? Have not men been sent from Moscow to other districts to act as the soviet representatives in those other districts?

Miss BRYANT. No; it does not work that way. They are sent from the local soviets into Moscow. That is the way it works.

Senator STERLING. Of course, the local soviet may——

Miss BRYANT. It must send its delegate in.

Senator STERLING. Yes; it may send its delegate in; but are not delegates to local soviets sent——

Miss BRYANT. No.

Senator STERLING. And members of the local soviets sent out?

Miss BRYANT. No; that is not the way it works. The delegates are sent in to the contral body.

Mr. HUMES. Is there anything in the soviet constitution that requires residents of the districts to be sent as members of the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. You understand exactly how it works, do you not? It has been explained how the soviets work and all that?

Mr. HUMES. Is there anything in the constitution that requires a member of a soviet to be a resident of the district that he represents in the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. Why, surely——

Mr. HUMES. Just answer that question.

Miss BRYANT. I can not answer a question like that, yes or no. That is where you take advantage of me, or try to take advantage of me, all the time, Major. You ask me to answer yes or no.

Mr. HUMES. I do not care whether you answer yes or no, but I want an answer that is responsive to the question.

Miss BRYANT. Is there anything in the constitution that requires a man to be a member of the soviet in which he lives?

Senator STERLING. To be a resident of the district?

Mr. HUMES. Is there anything in the constitution that requires that a man be a resident of the district which he serves in the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. I would have to look that up in the constitution. I am not sure about that; but I know perfectly well that that is the whole principle of the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. You are talking from the principles of the soviet government yourself, and you do not know what the application of them is?

Miss BRYANT. I do know the application.

Mr. HUMES. Do you?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; of course.

Mr. HUMES. You are assuming——

Miss BRYANT. Yes; and all the time that I——

Mr. HUMES. You are assuming that the application is in compliance with the principles?

Miss BRYANT. Yes, of course; and that is the same way—

Mr. HUMES (continuing). And you do not know what the application is, of your own knowledge?

Miss BRYANT. Why, any more than I could say that I do not know of my own knowledge that Senators do not come from the States that they are elected from. I say that the whole principle of our country is such, but I could not say that I know it as a fact. I did not see each one come.

Mr. HUMES. You know that the Constitution of the United States requires that the Members of the Senate be residents of the States from which they are elected, do you not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Well, does the soviet constitution require a member of the soviet to be a resident of the district for which he serves in the soviet?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, I do not know, but I feel sure it does.

Senator STERLING. Have you read the constitution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I have read it, but I do not remember that particular point. But we have the constitution here, and you can easily find that out.

Mr. HUMES. I have read it very carefully and I can not find any requirement of residence in the constitution.

Miss BRYANT. Why did you think that they did not reside there, because Babushka said that they were all sent out—

Mr. HUMES. Because people have testified here that they were present when members of the soviet were elected and that they were people from outside of the district in which they were elected. That is why.

Senator STERLING. More than one witness has testified to that.

Miss BRYANT. You have several witnesses who worked in the soviet government and are expert on it who can give you very expert evidence on that.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is not a case for expert testimony; it is a case of observation.

Miss BRYANT. I want to go back, since it has taken up so much time, to this nationalization of women. I am very much interested in this. In the first place, they have equal suffrage in Russia, and I can not imagine how anybody would suppose that women would vote for their own nationalization.

In the second place, women have always been very important in Russia. I consider that Russian women are even more belligerent than Russian men. I think that Russian men would not dare to suggest such a thing to Russian women, and I know the place and the importance of women under the soviet. Madame Kollontay, who is head of the department of welfare, has set up all sorts of splendid reforms for women in Russia. She has established, for one thing, what she calls palaces of motherhood. Women, two months before confinement, are paid their full salaries and are allowed to rest. They do not have to go to work for two months afterwards and their doctors and nurses are paid for by the State. That is one of the reforms.

Senator OVERMAN. Right here let me ask you a question.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. It was stated here by one witness that they believed in taking the children away from the mothers.

Miss BRYANT. That is not true, and I wanted particularly to go into that. In the first place, Madame Kollontay's whole idea is to do away with the dismal charitable institutions like orphan asylums. Her idea was to put the children of peasants back into peasant homes, where they would have individual care and be made a part of the family, and she was working on that and had gotten along a good ways on that when I was there. She had gone a long ways toward working that out. They do not have child labor in Russia. Women are accepted on an equal basis with men, getting equal pay for equal work. They have an equal place in the labor unions. They are not excluded from any kind of work. I never have been in a country where women were as free as they are in Russia and where they are treated not as females but as human beings. When a woman gets up at a public meeting and makes a speech nobody thinks about her being a lady or about what kind of a hat she happens to wear. They just think of what she says. It is a very healthy country for a suffragist to go into. They asked me when I was in Russia about how many women we had in Congress and in the Senate. I would like to tell you this, if I may be permitted.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. I told them about Jeannette Rankin, that we had one in Congress, and that we had made quite a fuss over her, and we did not know whether we would ever have another one. They were quite surprised. They could not understand, when we had had democracy here so long, that our women, most of them, were not even enfranchised. So that you see they criticize us in many ways just as we criticize them. But they never went to the extent that they said that everybody in the United States was a Mormon because there is Mormonism in the United States. They never went to the point where they said all Congressmen and Senators are Holy Rollers because we have Holy Rollers here. They read our marriage laws and understood them, although they consider them ridiculous. But we in United States have taken a little bit of a decree printed by an anarchist club and made it the expression of all Russia; and that is what I want to speak of, because I can not believe that any man on this committee can be so gullible that he can believe that the women of Russia are nationalized.

Mr. HUMES. Was there not something else besides that decree introduced in evidence here?

Miss BRYANT. No. Mr. Simmons said it was printed in a paper there. That does not prove anything. I would like to tell you about that.

Mr. HUMES. No; it was not with reference to a decree published in a paper, or not published, but it was with reference to another decree than the anarchist decree.

Miss BRYANT. Did you say it was anything else but an anarchist decree?

Mr. HUMES. Absolutely. Now, let me ask you, where is Kronstadt, and what is Kronstadt?

Miss BRYANT. It is the naval base.

Mr. HUMES. A naval base. Just where is Kronstadt?

Miss BRYANT. It is near Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. And is it not the center of much of the Bolshevik revolution?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; the Kronstadt sailors are Bolsheviks.

Mr. HUMES. Did you not know that the soviet or the soldiers and sailors of Kronstadt also took action in this matter?

Miss BRYANT. I know that is not true, because a woman who was the head of the soviet there——

Mr. HUMES. What is that?

Miss BRYANT. There was a woman at the head of the soviet in Kronstadt, a Madame Stahl, a very splendid woman, who believed in the equality of women, and she certainly never put over anything like that on her own sex.

Mr. HUMES. Then, you say that the sailors at Kronstadt never passed such a decree?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And that the statement to that effect is the anarchist decree, the authenticity of which, you admit, is not correct?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I believe it is not correct.

Mr. HUMES. You believe it is not correct?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I am sure it is not correct. How could it be?

Mr. HUMES. Do you believe that the Izvestija——

Miss BRYANT. Have you the Izvestija? You said this was in the Izvestija, and I found out by looking up my notes that it was never printed in the Izvestija but in this [indicating paper]. I will tell you——

Mr. HUMES. You receive the Izvestija in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I see it in this country.

Mr. HUMES. How many issues of it have you seen?

Miss BRYANT. I have seen quite a few.

Mr. HUMES. Is it a daily paper?

Miss BRYANT. It has been printed daily. I do not know whether it has always been or not.

Mr. HUMES. Can you read Russian?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; slowly.

Mr. HUMES. Since you came back, in January, 1918, how many copies of the Izvestija have you seen?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, my, I have piles of them that were brought back. Mr. Williams brought back a whole trunkful.

Mr. HUMES. How many?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know the exact number.

Mr. HUMES. When did Williams leave Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know the exact day he left Petrograd, but he has been here less than two months.

Mr. HUMES. He came out through Siberia, did he not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. He left Petrograd in the middle of the summer, did he not?

Miss BRYANT. He left after all this came out.

Mr. HUMES. How do you know when this came up?

MISS BRYANT. It was supposed to be in July, was it not, or something like that?

MR. HUMES. How do you fix the time of it? I thought it never came up at all.

MISS BRYANT. I fix the time by the fact that Jerome Davis, who was head of the Y. M. C. A., said that he personally investigated the Vladimir story, the one that you are particularly anxious to prove was a soviet affair, and he said that he went there, and it was not true. He is head of the Y. M. C. A., and I should not think that he would make a false statement.

MR. HUMES. When did he go there?

MISS BRYANT. He went there when he heard this rumor, and he found that there was nothing in it at all; that it had nothing to do with the soviet.

MR. HUMES. Did he say when he made the inquiry?

MISS BRYANT. I mean that he made the inquiry after it came up. He does not say how many days after, or how long after, but he is very willing to testify, and he can tell you.

did yesterday.

MR. HUMES. It did come up in Russia?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; of course, it was printed as an anarchist decree; but if you will let me go on I can tell you more about it than I did yesterday.

Senator WOLCOTT. You will get to tell about it.

MR. HUMES. We will let you tell anything about whatever you have knowledge of. You say they investigated there this anarchist decree that was published?

MISS BRYANT. Yes.

MR. HUMES. And did he ever tell you of the publication of the decree in the Izvestija? Did he say anything about that?

MISS BRYANT. It is not a very large story, but he wants to testify here. He can tell you all about it. He says he has absolute knowledge about it.

MR. HUMES. Do you mean to say he has asked to testify?

MISS BRYANT. I hope that he is asked to testify. I believe he has—I hope he is called, because he has all this knowledge; and surely, if you are particularly anxious to know——

MR. HUMES. I have in my pocket his official report to the Government.

MISS BRYANT. Well——

MR. HUMES. I assume that he would testify to the same things that he put in the official report; do you not suppose he would?

MISS BRYANT. I do not know. I suppose so. But I should think he would be the one to testify.

MR. HUMES. To judge whether his report to the Government is correct or not? Do you not think that the official report that Mr. Davis made to the Government would probably answer the purposes of the inquiry?

MISS BRYANT. Not at all. I should think there would be no objection to asking Mr. Davis what he meant by making a public statement that he had investigated this matter, and found it to be false.

MR. HUMES. Mr. Davis is not under investigation.

MISS BRYANT. He made an investigation, I said.

Mr. HUMES. Did Mr. Davis say anything about investigating the action of the soviet at Kronstadt?

Miss BRYANT. He said that there were some anarchist societies at that time, but they were afterwards suppressed by the Bolsheviki; and that the anarchists of Moscow had to have machine guns brought out to put them out of business. This happened, as you may know, around in a great many places in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever see it happen?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; I saw them fighting with the anarchists.

Mr. HUMES. How frequently?

Miss BRYANT. Whenever it was necessary.

Mr. HUMES. How frequently; twice, a dozen times, or how frequently? This is a very material fact in relation to Russia.

Miss BRYANT. Whenever the anarchists tried to confiscate property without the plan of the soviets, which was very definite; and if they went to live in the palaces or acted in any other way than that approved of. The palaces were turned into people's museums, and they were full of precious art, and the Russians love their art, and they did not want it destroyed in any way, so they turned these palaces into people's museums as the French did.

Mr. HUMES. How many people did you see shot at and killed or wounded?

Miss BRYANT. Well, there were street battles when I was in Petrograd, and there was firing going on all the time.

Mr. HUMES. There was firing going on all the time?

Miss BRYANT. Of course; it was civil war, as I have said.

Mr. HUMES. Usually, when that firing was going on, some one was killed, was he not?

Miss BRYANT. Not always. By no means.

Mr. HUMES. Half the time?

Miss BRYANT. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. How many times did you see people killed under those circumstances?

Miss BRYANT. I told you. I told you all about that and how many I saw killed yesterday.

Mr. HUMES. You said there was only one case where you saw any one killed.

Miss BRYANT. No; I said two cases.

Mr. HUMES. One was when a motor car came down the street and did the firing?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. The other was simply an isolated case of the shooting of an individual?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You have just stated that these fights with anarchists were a common happening.

Miss BRYANT. Well, they were; you see——

Mr. HUMES. And you saw them?

Miss BRYANT. This is the way it was. When you were going through the streets sometimes there was shooting; I mean we could hear firing; and then again we would ask for reports and the officials told us about various things and what was going on, and in that way we found out and knew what it was. We did not see people actually being killed, but we found that there was fighting going on.

Mr. HUMES. This shooting was going on on the streets?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. I understood you to say yesterday that it was very seldom that there was any shooting on the streets, and here you say——

Miss BRYANT. I did not mean you to understand that. I said that there was a state of civil war. I said no one bothered me. I was not armed.

Senator STERLING. I got altogether a different impression. I want to ask you the question if you did not seek to convey the impression in your testimony of yesterday that it was quite orderly in Petrograd, and that there was very little destitution?

Miss BRYANT. I said there was no more destitution in the soviets than under Kerensky; that it was always disorganized since the beginning of the war. Will you let me finish with this decree? You asked me a question.

Mr. HUMES. We will confine it to this one subject of the nationalization of women.

Miss BRYANT. About Vladimir. The first four paragraphs of that decree of Vladimir are the original decree. The rest were added as a satire by a comic paper, the Moocka, which means the fly. It was published in the late spring of 1918 in Moscow, and it was considered nothing but a great joke in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. The material that was added, then, in the comic paper in Russia was such material as we in the United States consider obscene matter, was it not?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, no; not at all. Not anyway in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Do you mean to say that the contents of this decree, after the first four paragraphs, is not of an obscene nature that would never be permitted in public print in this country?

Miss BRYANT. I will explain to you first——

Mr. HUMES. Just answer the question and then explain. You can make any explanation you want.

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but——

Mr. HUMES. It would not be permitted in this country?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. Now, let me explain.

Mr. HUMES. Let me ask you, is it not a fact, then, that the respect for women and respect for morals was not at the high point that you have undertaken to convey, if material of that kind was being printed in the comic papers of Russia as a joke, and looked upon as a joke, rather than as a serious infringement of any moral code of any civilized race?

Miss BRYANT. The same thing was printed in France as a comic thing. You see, the Russians and the French, and all European peoples do not have our puritanical ideas about what they should print and what they should not print. They think these things are very funny. We in America would not allow a single line or illustration printed in a paper of the ordinary French comic illustrated sheet to pass through our mails. We do not believe in these things, but those people think they are humorous; they think they are funny.

Mr. HUMES. Then, the moral code of America is very much higher than that of the Russians?

Miss BRYANT. I would not say it is higher. It is very different; not so flexible. I would not say it was any higher. I would say that we were more puritanical and less sophisticated than they are over there.

Mr. HUMES. You think that the Russian and French practice of printing this obscenity in a humorous vein is preferable to our code of morals which disapproves of such practices?

Miss BRYANT. I do not say it is preferable, but like all European things, I think it is not my business as an American to tell the Russians or the French what to print in their papers, so I have looked at it just as a neutral observer, not taking a stand on it one way or another.

Mr. HUMES. Do you think we are puritanical when we disapprove of that sort of thing?

Miss BRYANT. I think we are, as compared to what other countries allow to be printed in their papers. My whole point about Russia is that we are interfering too much in her affairs. In a little while we will be telling the Russians what they shall put on in their theaters. We do not allow them to do what they desire.

Mr. HUMES. You approve, do you, of the decreets, the so-called legislation, or dictatorial legislation, that has been enacted by the Russian government?

Miss BRYANT. I told you yesterday that I neither approve nor disapprove. The one point that I have made right straight along, and that I am not going to be swerved from, is that I do not believe in intervention, and I do not believe America has any right to go into Russia and send a force of American boys there to fight and settle the internal affairs of Russia; because no one came into our country during our Civil War, even during Sherman's march from Atlanta to the sea, which was certainly considered a little ruthless by the European world.

Mr. HUMES. Then you believe that Russia should have absolute self-determination?

Miss BRYANT. I certainly do.

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve, then, of the Russian government making an appropriation for the purpose of trying to control the political action and political activities in other countries other than Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know that it has, any more than the kind of work our Committee on Public Information does in foreign countries.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that there was an appropriation of a large sum made by the soviet government for the purpose of undertaking to influence the political action in other countries than Russia?

Miss BRYANT. I know——

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that as a fact?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know that as a fact; but I will tell you what I do know as a fact.

Mr. HUMES. Do you deny that?

MISS BRYANT. I will explain it. I neither deny it nor affirm it. I will explain it.

MR. HUMES. You explain it?

MISS BRYANT. I will, because you can not deny nor affirm certain statements without confusing your testimony.

MR. HUMES. You have not seen the act or decret that made an appropriation for that purpose? Have you not admitted here that there was money being sent over to this country for propaganda purposes?

MISS BRYANT. Will you let me explain? Mr. Nuorteva told you that he got money, and he wanted to come here and explain why he got it, and you have not called him.

MR. HUMES. Answer my question now.

MISS BRYANT. That is in answer to your question. He said he would explain the whole reason why he got the money.

MR. HUMES. Let me ask you again, Miss Bryant: Do you approve of the Russian appropriation of money for the purpose of influencing and dominating political action in the United States as to its internal affairs?

MISS BRYANT. Let me say—

MR. HUMES. Just answer the question.

MISS BRYANT. I have got to answer it in my own way. I can not answer it in any other way. I said that I am principally concerned about what happens in America. I am an American. I do not approve of many things that happen in Japan or many things that happen in Russia, but that is not my particular business.

MR. HUMES. Now, you are concerned, then, about what happens in Russia, in so far as it concerns the activities of the United States?

MISS BRYANT. Of course, I am an American, and I have a lot of faith in these United States.

MR. HUMES. But you are not concerned about what happens in Russia if it is intended to influence political action in the United States?

MISS BRYANT. Why, Mr. Humes, you must know that the monarchists are allowed to buy whole half sheets in all our papers to carry on their propaganda. I do not approve of that either, and I would not approve if the soviets did; but that goes unhindered.

MR. HUMES. Do you mean to tell me and tell this committee that the soviet newspapers are permitting the publication of any material criticising or opposing the activities of the Bolshevik government?

MISS BRYANT. Why, there are other political papers being published there.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know that all of the newspapers in Russia were taken over, under the constitution, by the soviet government?

MISS BRYANT. Do you know how they were distributed? I can tell you that.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know that they were taken over?

MISS BRYANT. I know they were taken over, and for this reason: In our country one rich man can own perhaps 20 papers and can control their policies and can form public opinion, and they decided in Russia that they did not want that state of affairs, so they changed it and made it a government force; and it is according to how many members you have in your party, the various printing arrangements that you are allowed. That is the way it is run. The social revolutionists have their own paper.

Mr. HUMES. Then you think the proper practice for Russia, and consequently it will be the proper practice in the United States, is to take over and control all of the newspapers; is that true?

Miss BRYANT. You see, Mr. Humes, I told you yesterday that I am very sympathetic toward socialism. I have never been a member of any party, but I am very sympathetic toward socialism, and the Socialists have believed in government ownership for 100 years.

Mr. HUMES. You believe in the government ownership of newspapers?

Miss BRYANT. Of course, if I believe in government ownership I must believe in it for newspapers.

Mr. HUMES. Then you believe that the Government should control all of the newspapers; and you say the Bolshevik is the only political power in power in Russia; and therefore in this country if the Democratic Party was in power the Democratic Party would dominate all the newspapers, and if the Republican Party was in power the Republican Party would dominate all the newspapers of the country?

Miss BRYANT. You did not follow me. I just said that the majority would have their own press, you understand? If the Democratic Party was a bigger party than the Republican Party it would have more papers, but if it was not a bigger party and if the Republican Party split, as it did at the time of the Bull Moose, then it would not have.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know David Leavitt Hough?

Miss BRYANT. I do not believe I do.

Senator OVERMAN. Nevsky, 1, Petrograd?

Miss BRYANT. 1 Nevsky, Petrograd—Nevsky Prospect? I know the street, but I do not think I know the man.

Senator OVERMAN. I have a letter from him this morning, and I just wanted to identify him if I could.

Miss BRYANT. I do not know him at all.

Senator OVERMAN. He says:

I know and understand so well the Russian character that I know how hopeless it is that they will ever be able to "self-determine" until the opportunity is made for them so to do by policing the country from the outside under the direction of some such wise and generous man as Gen. Wood, who did so well in Cuba.

Miss BRYANT. No; I don't know him. I have never met him.

Senator OVERMAN. He says he spent a part of his time in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Miss Bryant, in order that we may get your viewpoint—because the viewpoint of a witness is always important in weighing the testimony—you feel that when the United States interfered in Cuba in order to maintain a stable government, it was interfering with the free self-determination of the people of Cuba, and that it was a mistake, and that Cuba ought to have been permitted to conduct a civil war and settle its own affairs without the assistance of anyone else; is that true?

Miss BRYANT. I can not answer you that, because I know very little about Cuba. I could not possibly answer it without speaking unintelligently. I am glad to tell you, however, that I think that Mexico ought to settle its own affairs.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, if the situation in Cuba——

Miss BRYANT. I do not know anything about Cuba. I will tell you that from the beginning.

Mr. HUMES. Wait until I ask the question. If the conditions in Cuba at the time of the American intervention were similar to the conditions in Mexico at this time, or the conditions in Russia, it was wrong for this country to assist in the organization and establishment of a stable government and the restoration of peace?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think it is synonymous at all, from what little I know of it; but I am not going to discuss it, because I said I do not know anything about Cuba, and you would put me on record as saying something about a country which I do not know anything about.

Mr. HUMES. You say it is not analogous, and yet you say you do not know anything about it?

Miss BRYANT. I have not concealed my opinion about Russia, and you know that perfectly well, so why drag in Cuba?

Mr. HUMES. I am trying to get your viewpoint.

Miss BRYANT. I said I actually believed in self-determination. But a little bit of an island like Cuba can hardly be compared with a country like Russia, with 180,000,000 people.

Mr. HUMES. You believe that Russia should have self-determination——

Miss BRYANT. I do.

Mr. HUMES (continuing). Without interference from this country, to establish their own government; but it is proper for them, during the time they are trying to establish their own government, to undertake to interfere with the political affairs of other countries than their own, and to appropriate money for that purpose?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know whether they are doing that or not. You can find out from Mr. Nuorteva. I do not know what they are doing with their funds, or if they are allowed to use funds.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I interject a remark there? I thought I understood you to say yesterday that you knew they were interfering with the political affairs of another nation, to wit, Germany?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes; in Germany.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, why do they not let Germany alone? Why do they not apply their doctrine there——

Miss BRYANT. You do not object to the fact that they brought about the German revolution and stopped the war long ahead of time? It was one of their ways of fighting.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is absolutely not worth while for me to undertake to try to question you. I make the same complaint against you that you make against this committee. You will not let me finish what I am asking. Go ahead and make your statement.

Miss BRYANT. That was one of their ways of fighting, by destroying Germany from the inside. They did it, and they did it very effectively; and any military man will tell you that if it had not been for them the war would have lasted a great deal longer than it did.

Senator WOLCOTT. I doubt if a military man would say that. I think a military man would say that the Germans were beaten on the west front, and that is what caused the war to end.

Miss BRYANT. But beating the Germans on the western front did not necessarily mean that the Kaiser had to abdicate. A military defeat does not always mean a change of government.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think it does.

Miss BRYANT. Ebert always stood for the Kaiser, and so did Scheidemann, so why should they be against him at any time?

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not think you are very well qualified to discuss military problems, and neither am I.

Miss BRYANT. I agree with you, Senator Wolcott; I am not; and that is why I do not think that bank clerks and Y. M. C. A. secretaries, or very old ladies, ought to come to you and tell you that we should have a thousand troops in Russia, or 10,000 troops in Russia, because I do not think they know anything about military affairs. I would not presume to tell this committee how many troops ought to go to Russia to overwhelm the Bolsheviki.

Senator OVERMAN. You are opposed to any troops going there at all?

Miss BRYANT. Yes. I am opposed to it, surely, because the people in Russia do not want them there. I have two brothers in the Army, who volunteered and went to France to fight for democracy. They did not volunteer to fight the Russians; they volunteered to fight the Germans.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to say that this committee has to be in the Senate in five minutes, as the appropriation bill is coming up today, and so we will have to take a recess. I do not know whether to take a recess until half past 3 or not. Senator Wolcott has agreed to stay and conduct this examination and hear Miss Bryant's statement, and I hope, Mr. Humes, you will let her make her statement and not ask too many questions; but Senator Wolcott will conduct the hearing. I am sorry I have to go, but we will just let Senator Wolcott stay here, as he has kindly agreed to do it. I will turn this letter from Mr. Hough over to you, Mr. Humes, as he wants to be heard. I am sorry I can not stay, but I have got to go.

Senator WOLCOTT. All right, Miss Bryant, you may proceed.

Miss BRYANT. One point I want to make particularly clear is that in all the time I was in Russia I did not hear Russians denouncing America and saying they hated America. On the other hand, they seemed to have a more friendly feeling toward us than they did toward any other nation.

Before I left Russia I went to see Marie Spirodonova, who is the most politically powerful woman in Russia, and the last thing that she said was, "Try to make them understand in great America how hard we over here are striving to maintain our ideals." They always had the feeling that we alone would stand out against intervention, would stand out against any real bad conduct of other nations toward Russia; that if Russia was hard pressed, as it was at that time, that we would not stand for going in there and trying to crush the people.

Another point I wanted to bring out was that in all this reign of terror these men here have told you about, it is well to remember that not one American citizen was killed in Russia during all of that turmoil.

Mr. HUMES. May I ask you right there, has not this woman you spoke of been since imprisoned by the Bolsheviki?

Miss BRYANT. No, sir. If you will ask Gregory Yarros about that—he is the Associated Press man—he can tell you the whole story. She had a fight with the Bolsheviki. She is a very belligerent person. She was one of the people who planned the death of Mirbach. She is a terrorist, and she did that; and the soviets at the time, while they were organizing their army and wanted to push the Germans back, still felt that terror was a very bad thing for any country, because it really works against you, as you know, and stirs up all the radicals, and everybody gets blamed for it; and they did not want the Germans in Moscow as a consequence, and they thought it was not a good plan; but she really did help plan that assassination, and yet she is still working with the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. Just let me catch that. She planned the death of Mirbach?

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore, she was fighting the Germans?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, yes.

Mr. HUMES. Yet she was put in jail because of her interference with the soviets in fighting the Germans?

Miss BRYANT. I did not say she was put in jail; but you see what they were trying to do was to prevent terror there, so that they could go on with the regular warfare and put them out. For myself, I do not blame Spirodonova for helping to plan the death of Mirbach. I am not denouncing her for that. I like her better than any other woman I know.

Mr. HUMES. Go on with your statement.

Miss BRYANT. Well, the point that I was going to make was that not one American was killed in Russia. I mean by that civilians, people who were not carrying on actual warfare.

Senator WOLCOTT. Men were thrown in jail, however.

Miss BRYANT. I know, but don't you understand that if they had gotten in the way of the army they should have been put in jail? Americans were put in jail in France and other countries, correspondents and others, at the beginning of the war.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were they not put in jail by the civil authorities, as distinguished from the military authorities?

Miss BRYANT. When a country is under military control, and in actual civil warfare, the military authorities, of course, are the only authorities.

Senator WOLCOTT. The American consul was put in jail, and is still in jail.

Miss BRYANT. Yes, because they accused him of starting a counter-revolution, and I believe there is some good evidence of that.

One of the witnesses said that an American negro was one of the commissars, and that showed his complete ignorance of Russian affairs. There was one American negro in Petrograd, and this American negro was a professional gambler.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was that the man that they called Prof. Gordon?

Miss BRYANT. I think that is the man they called Prof. Gordon, I don't know. This negro was arrested by the provisional government and put in jail because they did not want him around there; and after the soviets came into power they were always having trouble with this negro, but he would not go home, and stayed around there and was always gambling, and they arrested him and took him up to the American consulate and asked him to send him home. He certainly did not get any place in the government.

Senator WOLCOTT. That was up until January, when you left?

Miss BRYANT. Why should they?

Senator WOLCOTT. That is the point, and I made that same inquiry, why should they?

Miss BRYANT. I want to read something written by a man from the French military mission in Moscow, on July 14, 1918—a man by the name of Sadoul. He says, "We will not win the war by killing the Russian revolution." This was at the time we began intervention.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is his nationality?

Miss BRYANT. French.

Senator WOLCOTT. He is a Frenchman?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; a member of the military mission there.

Senator WOLCOTT. You personally know him?

Miss BRYANT. No; but I knew he was there, and I have seen him. He continues:

By committing such a crime we shall not accomplish the task toward civilization which the allies have set before them and we shall not realize a democratic and just peace, the principles of which have been enunciated by our socialist party and so eloquently developed by Wilson.

The ministers of the entente, misinformed through the blindness of their intelligence service, were in a position to easily delude the masses of workingmen and direct them against the power of the Soviets. But the day will come when the allies will be swept aside and the truth proclaimed. What bitter reproaches will then be addressed to the guilty governments for not having known better or not having wanted to know better?

What resentment, what hatred will accumulate, and what terrible and unnecessary fights are in store for the future! But the crime will be irreparable! New ruins will not make old ruins look less ugly.

Mr. HUMES. When was that statement made?

Miss BRYANT. July 14, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know where this man is now?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know where he is now. He was with the French military mission.

Mr. HUMES. You do not know what his attitude is now, do you?

Miss BRYANT. I suppose it is the same as it was.

Mr. HUMES. You suppose that?

Senator WOLCOTT. The substance of what he said was that he would not advise intervention.

Miss BRYANT. He thought it would be almost irreparable for the allies to start out with such high ideals and then to smash them.

Senator WOLCOTT. His statement throws no light on the conditions in Russia.

Miss BRYANT. I will tell you of another man who did throw light on conditions in Russia, and he knew Russia very well.

Senator WOLCOTT. His statement is simply the announcement of his opinion that intervention would be unwise, and he gives the reasons for having that opinion.

Miss BRYANT. Yes. Well, he is a military man, and I should think he would have some idea about it. And then, you see, Arthur Ransome was another man who was brought up here in the testimony, and I believe one witness said he was "at large in the United States." Of course, I think that is a rather peculiar way to speak about a man like Ransome.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not recall that.

Miss BRYANT. That was printed in one of the papers. I was not here at the testimony.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not recall it.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think that is a better sort of humor than the sort which you say is so frequent in Russian and French papers?

Miss BRYANT. As I say, I am not a censor of European morals at all.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed with your statement.

Miss BRYANT. Arthur Ransome was a correspondent of the London Daily News and also of the New York Times; and I want to say, Mr. HUMES, that the New York Times did to Arthur Ransome very much the same thing as the Public Ledger did to me. Arthur Ransome was their correspondent, but as soon as Arthur Ransome came out and gave his opinion about what would happen in case of intervention they no longer wrote of him as their regular correspondent, whose articles they had printed from daily cables. They called him the "mouthpiece of the Bolsheviks." And that is one of the things that I want to bring out here, that newspaper reporters who try to honestly tell what is happening in Russia are intimidated always when they make their statements, and they are intimidated to the point where they not only lose their jobs, but they lose their reputations, and they lose their chance to make a living. That is why most of them can not afford to tell the truth. They remain absolutely silent, or else they tell how many people fall dead in the streets and how many horses they see fall dead in the streets.

Mr. HUMES. Which particular witness are you applying that to?

Miss BRYANT. I am referring now particularly to Mr. Herman Bernstein.

Senator WOLCOTT. Miss Bryant, I want to read you a clipping from the Philadelphia Ledger.

Miss BRYANT. They read that here to me to-day, I think.

Senator WOLCOTT. This one?

Miss BRYANT. The one about myself?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. They read that to me when I first came in, and there was a long discussion about it. That is why I mentioned it just now again.

Senator WOLCOTT. I was not present.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed with your statement.

Miss BRYANT. The head of the Y. M. C. A. printed in the February 8, 1919, Survey an article telling about how easy it was to cooperate with the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. What is his name?

Miss BRYANT. His name is Davis.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the date of that?

Miss BRYANT. February 8, 1919.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the title of it?

Miss BRYANT. "Cooperating with the Commissars."

Senator WOLCOTT. By whom?

Miss BRYANT. Jerome Davis, the head of the Y. M. C. A. for two years in Russia. I understood he was the chief secretary and that he had charge. We understood that in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. He had charge of a particular district, did he not?

Miss BRYANT. I am not sure about that, but we always understood he was at the head of the Y. M. C. A. in Russia. He says:

National Soviet leaders at almost every interview emphasized their desire for the continuance of our work, their wish that America would send more men and other experts to help in all phases of educational, economic, and relief work. Time after time they spoke of how much they wished an American railroad commission would come to Russia. My personal experience, after having had charge of the relationships with the Bolshevik government during almost the entire period that the Y. M. C. A. was in Soviet territory, justifies me in stating that we always received every cooperation from the national Soviet government.

* * * * *

The great majority of those who have worked in Soviet Russia under the organization mentioned above will agree with me that it is possible to help the Russian people under the Bolshevik government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did we not send a railroad commission to Russia?

Miss BRYANT. We did; but you probably know what happened to it.

Senator WOLCOTT. We sent one, did we not?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but it is not working with the people at the present time.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Davis says in there that the Russian people wished we would send a railroad commission.

Miss BRYANT. He means the soviets, of course.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Russian people wish we would send one there to help the soviets?

Miss BRYANT. That was his impression.

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not think we ought to do that, do you?

Miss BRYANT. Well, I think we ought to decide that for ourselves. I think a great deal of our unemployment in America is due to the fact that we do not have an open avenue into Russia now, because they need all sorts of supplies, and I think it would be helpful for both countries if we really had more amicable relations.

Senator WOLCOTT. I thought your idea was that the Russian people did not want our business men around. Why should we send anything over there to help them in any way.

Miss BRYANT. For one reason; it is good business; if for no other reason. Every country wants to trade with Russia. You will agree with me on that.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; but this proposition is to send a railroad commission over there to work with the soviets. Do you favor our going over there and helping the soviets?

Miss BRYANT. I think you are the people who ought to decide that. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. HUMES. I thought Russia ought to decide that. I thought they ought to determine these things themselves. Your position now is that the United States Government ought to settle the question as to whether they will send anything over there to help the soviet government, and yet you question as to whether any intervention shall be undertaken against the soviets; that that is a matter for Russia to settle. How do you reconcile those two positions?

Miss BRYANT. Mr. Humes, I am perfectly consistent. I think we ought to settle what action we should take, and I said the Russians ought to settle their own affairs—their own actions. If we decide now whether we shall send a commission or shall not send a commission, that is our business. That is what I said from the beginning.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that interfering with their self-determination? Do you not think that they ought to determine whether we shall send anyone over there to help or not?

Miss BRYANT. If they ask us for it, it is for us to decide whether we will do it. Of course, we are not going to send a commission in there just willy nilly, without their asking for any of these things or without it being to our advantage to comply.

Mr. HUMES. You quoted Jerome Davis. I want to read you two sentences from an official report of Jerome Davis to the American Consul General. You have quoted him as an authority. [Reading:]

The legitimate criticism of Government acts was stifled by the suppression of all except Bolshevik papers, and the opposite parties were either under arrest or in hiding. At the same time the Government gave up all hope of printing to represent all classes and parties of workers and peasants, but thereafter busied itself in trying to keep the power.

Miss BRYANT. Well, that was during the first days, was it not, in the transitory period? Everybody knows that when a people first take over the government, and a city is under martial law, there is not much free press at that particular time.

Mr. HUMES. This was after the assassination of Mirbach.

Miss BRYANT. That was also in a critical hour.

Mr. HUMES. This was subsequent to that?

Miss BRYANT. I would like to read you an explanation of Lenine's attitude toward the press. He wrote this:

In the serious, decisive hour of the revolution and the days immediately following, the provisional revolutionary committee was compelled to adopt a whole series of measures against the counter-revolutionary press of all shades.

At once cries arose from all sides that the new socialistic authority was violating the essential principles of its program. The workers' and soldiers' government draws attention to the fact that in our country behind such a shield of liberalism is hidden an attempt to poison the minds and bring confusion into the consciousness of the masses. It was impossible to leave such a weapon as willful misrepresentation in the hands of the enemy, for it is not less dangerous than bombs and machine guns.

That is why temporary and extraordinary measures have been adopted for cutting off the stream of calumny in which the yellow press would be glad to drown the young victory of the people.

As soon as the order will be consolidated, all administrative measures against the press will be suspended. Full liberty will be given within the broadest and most progressive measures in this respect; even in critical moments the restriction of the press is admissible only within the bounds of necessity.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that policy being invoked more strongly to-day than it was at the time that statement was made?

Miss BRYANT. I do not think so.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know?

Miss BRYANT. You understand—I have not been there, but they are still publishing other papers.

Mr. HUMES. Will you name some other papers that are being published in Russia than Bolshevik papers or papers that are controlled by the government?

MISS BRYANT. If you want to bring me the files, I do not know the names, but I can get the papers.

MR. HUMES. I will be glad to have you furnish me with Russian papers printed in Russia that are opposing the Bolshevik government. You can give me those papers later.

MISS BRYANT. I will be glad to do so. Mr. Nuorteva will give them to you first hand.

There is also another thing that I want to bring out, and that is about terror. The white terror in Finland was perhaps the worst terror of the whole war in any country. You know that the White Guard Finns attempted to establish a German king on the throne, and the White Guards fought in the German trenches from the beginning of the war. I have some pictures which I want to give you showing the White Guards, and these [indicating] are Red Guards that they shot by machine gun fire.

MR. HUMES. Did you take those pictures?

MISS BRYANT. They were taken just after I had gone through Finland. These were brought over to Mr. Nuorteva by a man who escaped. These are people shot down by machine guns.

MR. HUMES. That was the terror in Finland?

MISS BRYANT. Yes, as I said, the terror was not always on one side. I just want to prove a point. This is white terror.

MR. HUMES. How do you tell whether these are White Guards or Red Guards?

MISS BRYANT. By the white arm band, and because the only ones that were killed by machine guns were the Red Guards.

MR. HUMES. Did not the Bolshevik guards use machine guns?

MISS BRYANT. They did not take bunches of people out in fifties and shoot them with machine gun fire deliberately.

MR. HUMES. They did not?

SENATOR WOLCOTT. What you mean is that they did not do it while you were there.

MISS BRYANT. They would not do it because they are not organized against the people. They don't have to shoot great masses.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You think they would not do it, because what they have on paper is their practice?

MISS BRYANT. They are championing the poorer classes of people, and they do not get great masses of people and shoot them generally.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You mean that they would not do that if they had been carrying on their principles, but you do not know whether that is so.

MISS BRYANT. We do not know that they have done that.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Witnesses have been here and testified.

MISS BRYANT. But they did not see them.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. They saw them led out by the firing squads.

MISS BRYANT. They did not see them.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. They saw them led out, but could not see them shot.

MISS BRYANT. I did not see any either, but I am discredited when I say that.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. I am pointing out the unreliability of your information. When a man sees the firing squad take out prisoners and hears shots, he is justified, I think, in his opinion that they have been shot.

MISS BRYANT. I tell you that I know very well that this man, Jacob Peters, who was supposed to be the head executioner of the Soviet, was not that sort of man. Peters told me at various times that the only people whom he believed in killing were traitors in his own ranks, people who were grafters and who tried to steal everything, people in a time like that who did not stick to the high moral principle of revolutionary discipline. Those are the people in many cases who were executed by the soviet, people in their own ranks.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. That is what Peters said?

MISS BRYANT. That was his whole principle of belief, and I believe that is what he would do.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Let me ask you a question: Is it your idea, because a man says that he believes so-and-so, that he never acts contrary to that?

MISS BRYANT. But you see my idea was that—I knew this man Peters, and he is an idealist, a very esthetic young man, not the kind of man who is a real butcher. And because I knew this man and knew what he did or tried to do in Russia, I do not believe that he would permit any butchering.

MR. HUMES. You knew that Peters was a member of a big anarchist organization in White Chapel, London, did you not, before he went back to Russia?

MISS BRYANT. I can not imagine him being an anarchist, because he is a socialist. It is impossible to be both.

MR. HUMES. You deny that he is a member of the anarchist group in London?

MISS BRYANT. I can not deny it. I did not know him in London.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know that the testimony that has been taken by the committee has established that he was in London? You said yesterday he was in London?

MISS BRYANT. Oh, yes; he was in London. I know that.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know that the testimony here shows that he was a member of an anarchistic group?

MISS BRYANT. Wasn't it a socialist club?

MR. HUMES. That barricaded themselves in White Chapel after the commission of some crimes?

MISS BRYANT. I never understood that Peters ever took any part in political activities in London. I knew he was a clerk in a commission house.

MR. HUMES. The reason he did not take a part in political affairs in the sense that we generally use "political affairs" is that anarchists are opposed to political activity or participation in politics, and they believe simply in the use of force in the overthrow of the government. That is the sense in which you say that he took no part?

MISS BRYANT. I do not think that is the anarchists' doctrine. I am not particularly interested in their doctrine, but their doctrine is that all governments are founded by force—which, of course, is a fact—and therefore they are against all government; but I do not believe they believe in force at all. I do not know that many of them are terrorists.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think that the anarchists and the I. W. W. are both opposed to participation in political affairs?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; because they do not believe in governments.

Mr. HUMES. These pictures are on post cards?

Miss BRYANT. They were reprinted.

Mr. HUMES. They were made for propaganda purposes?

Miss BRYANT. Oh, no; they were not; not that I ever knew of.

Mr. HUMES. Are they on post cards?

Miss BRYANT. They were reprinted. They only had one copy, so I could not have brought it up to show you unless it was reprinted. You would not call that propaganda.

Mr. HUMES. They are simply in the state that they are sold in public places.

Miss BRYANT. Are they sold in public places?

Mr. HUMES. Is not that the form in which they are put on sale?

Miss BRYANT. Yes; but that is one of the easiest ways to print photographs.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, it is not a private picture.

Miss BRYANT. That has nothing to do with it, because it is printed on a post card. That is not logical.

Mr. HUMES. You have seen very many German propaganda pictures in just that same form, have you not? Was it not the practice of the Germans to put out pictures of that kind?

Miss BRYANT. I do not know. You mean the post cards?

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Miss BRYANT. I do not know what that has to do with it. When you have a camera of this size you usually print them on these cards, because they are very handy. It has nothing to do with the picture at all.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed with your statement, Miss Bryant.

Miss BRYANT. Well, you mean that I should continue by myself?

Mr. HUMES. Go right on.

Miss BRYANT. I do not care to say any more, except that I hope other witnesses will be called who have been mentioned by me in this testimony.

Mr. HUMES. Then, there are just two or three questions that I want to ask. In the first place, you have said something about equal suffrage.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Was not equal suffrage granted by Kerensky in his régime?

Miss BRYANT. Kerensky did not grant it; it was granted by the revolution.

Mr. HUMES. When I say Kerensky, I am only distinguishing between the ending of the old régime and the Bolshevik régime.

Miss BRYANT. It was granted before the time of the Kerensky government, during the time of Miliukov.

Mr. HUMES. It was immediately after the March revolution?

Miss BRYANT. No, no; I will explain that. At the time of the first revolution women were enfranchised. The Russians could not conceive that they did not have equal suffrage. The subject was not discussed, even.

Mr. HUMES. It was not a new thing after the Bolsheviki came into power?

Miss BRYANT. No; but it continued after they came into power.

Mr. HUMES. You said something about Madame Kollontay.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Had she not, since you were there, broken with the soviet republic, the soviet government?

Miss BRYANT. Why, she went to Stockholm. There had been a very short misunderstanding, as usually occurs between politicians; but she went back into the soviet government afterwards.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why do you think she went to Stockholm?

Miss BRYANT. She went there, I suppose, because they were always trying to carry on the work there.

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not think she went because she was afraid she would be put in jail?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Mr. HUMES. She was married?

Miss BRYANT. She was, and that will explain—that was one of the reasons for her quarrel with the soviet leaders. Dybenko, who was at one time the head of the navy, took back into service some old Russian officers, because they had promised him that they would be faithful to the revolutionary government, and they were fighting at that time against the Germans. Well, these same old officers promptly turned over the port of Narva to the Germans without any resistance. Dybenko, as head of the navy, was held responsible for it, because he had trusted these old-régime men, and for a short time they put him in jail. That is an example of how impossible it is to trust the old officers.

Mr. HUMES. The fact is that she and her husband both fled?

Miss BRYANT. She did not flee.

Mr. HUMES. They left Russia?

Miss BRYANT. They came back again. They are still in the soviet.

Mr. HUMES. When did they come back?

Miss BRYANT. They did not stay in Stockholm very long.

Mr. HUMES. About when; while you were there or since that time?

Miss BRYANT. Afterwards.

Mr. HUMES. How long afterwards; in the summer or just this last fall?

Miss BRYANT. They left about March, 1918, and they went back probably in March. I do not know, some time around there. I do not think they stayed away very long.

Mr. HUMES. What is the source of your information about their return?

Miss BRYANT. Well, I heard some of it from various sources.

Mr. HUMES. And your information that you have heard in that country—

Miss BRYANT. I heard it from some one who came from Stockholm and knew about it—saw them there.

Mr. HUMES. You said something about the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Miss BRYANT. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Who was the man representing the Public Ledger that asked you to change your credentials so as to make it appear that you represented it?

MISS BRYANT. You see, Mr. Spurgeon has charge of the Public Ledger, he is the editor in chief, and Mr. Watkins has charge of the syndicate; and when I went up there and they told me to write these articles for them I said, "Well, how about these passes? They have on them 'The Bell Newspaper Syndicate,' and what will I do about it?" Mr. Watkins said, "You can fix that up. Put the Public Ledger in."

MR. HUMES. What is Mr. Watkins's position with the Public Ledger?

MISS BRYANT. He is head of the syndicate.

MR. HUMES. What syndicate?

MISS BRYANT. The Ledger syndicate.

MR. HUMES. And Mr. Watkins was the man that asked you to change your credentials?

MISS BRYANT. I do not remember the exact conversation. It was not extraordinary.

MR. HUMES. I understand that you did not represent yourself in Russia as representing the Public Ledger at all.

MISS BRYANT. No; as a representative of the Bell Syndicate. I went on the Metropolitan credentials almost all the time.

MR. HUMES. Is it not a fact that Dr. Harold Williams represented the New York Times rather than Mr. Ransome?

MISS BRYANT. He did not write any more dispatches than Ransome did. They both appeared daily in the New York Times.

MR. HUMES. Were they both representatives?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; they were certainly considered such.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Just a minute. You have said, have you, all that you want to say?

MISS BRYANT. Yes; except, as I said, I want to urge that the people who were at the head of organizations like the American Military Mission, the American Red Cross, and the Y. M. C. A., and the Friends (Quakers), and various other official organizations, should be called instead of underlings, because I have had to make in my testimony a statement as to what I thought they would say, and I had to give their opinion, and I wish they would be called to verify these statements.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. You have not had to do that. You have chosen to do that. I am particularly interested to know whether there are any facts about Russia that you want to state in addition to what you have given.

MISS BRYANT. No; just simply to say that, as I stated before, my whole idea is that I believe in self-determination, and I do not think the Russians are such beasts and fanatics as many of the witnesses have tried to make out.

MR. HUMES. Just another question. What witness do you know has attempted to say that the Russian people are beasts? Has any witness referred to the Russian people in any but the most kindly way?

MISS BRYANT. When they say that people are murdered by thousands, and that people are starved, and all those conditions exist, I would consider it just exactly the same thing.

SENATOR WOLCOTT. Certainly they were killed to an extent.

MISS BRYANT. Of course, they were in our Civil War and in all civil wars.

Senator WOLCOTT. I notice by the morning's paper the official announcement by the Commissioner of the Interior Litovzky, who says that not more than 13,700 were shot by the orders of the extraordinary commission up to the 1st of last January, and the article also states that there were no figures for those that were killed——

Miss BRYANT. I think it would be absolutely impossible to find correct figures like that.

Senator WOLCOTT. That there was no record made of the numbers shot in small towns and villages, as the local authorities have avoided all bureaucratic methods and often acted on simple intuition.

Miss BRYANT. You see, they do that in the south when they lynch people.

Senator WOLCOTT. So the soviets are to be compared to the people in the south that lynch?

Miss BRYANT. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why did you make that statement unless you wanted to infer that comparison?

Miss BRYANT. I only wanted to infer that in all countries events occur which other countries do not approve of, and that we have been prejudiced against the Russians. We think that everything they do is bad and immoral, and I have wanted to protest.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not think that impression has been created here.

Miss BRYANT. I hope it has not, but it seems to me that it had, when I was listening.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee took a recess until 3.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The subcommittee met at 3.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of the recess.

Senator WOLCOTT. The meeting will come to order. Senator Overman is detained in the Senate for a short time and has asked me to start the hearing. I look for him to come in at almost any moment.

Major, you have a witness?

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN REED.

Senator WOLCOTT. Hold up your right hand.

Mr. REED. I prefer to affirm.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you any scruples against taking an oath?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You are not a Quaker, are you, Mr. Reed?

Mr. REED. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. What is the nature of your scruples against taking an oath?

Mr. REED. I just do not care to take an oath. I have not taken an oath for a year. I prefer to affirm.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you state that you have conscientious scruples against taking an oath?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. Hold up your right hand. Do you solemnly affirm that the evidence that you shall give shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and so you do affirm?

Mr. REED. I do solemnly affirm.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed, where do you reside?

Mr. REED. 1 Patchin Place, New York.

Mr. HUMES. How long have you resided in New York, approximately?

Mr. REED. Since 1911.

Mr. HUMES. Prior to that you were a resident of Oregon, I believe?

Mr. REED. Yes; a resident of Oregon. I have not been there for a long time, but I was a resident there.

Mr. HUMES. You were born in Oregon, were you not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. But you lived in Oregon, or that was really your home until the time you came to New York, was it not?

Mr. REED. Yes; that is to say, I was in Boston for four years, and around New York, in school, for two years, and two years abroad.

Mr. HUMES. But you have been in New York since 1911?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Reed, when did you first go to Russia; after the outbreak of the European war?

Mr. REED. I went in 1915; sailed in March for Italy and Greece; went up to Serbia and Roumania, I suppose it was in April or May, 1915.

Mr. HUMES. You were in this country at the time of the outbreak of the war, were you?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When did you first go to Europe after the outbreak of the war?

Mr. REED. I went to Europe immediately after the outbreak of the war. I was out on the coast the day the war broke out and sailed immediately. I got to Paris just at the Battle of the Marne.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you stay in France at that time?

Mr. REED. I stayed there three or four months.

Mr. HUMES. Where did you go from there?

Mr. REED. I went to Germany.

Mr. HUMES. How long were you in Germany?

Mr. REED. About a month and a half or two months.

Mr. HUMES. Were you on the firing line during that time?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. In what capacity were you there?

Mr. REED. As a reporter for the Metropolitan Magazine.

Mr. HUMES. And where did you go from Germany?

Mr. REED. I went from Germany to England. I bought a ticket to London on the Unter den Linden, went to England, and went back to France.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you stay in France?

Mr. REED. A few days. Then I went back to England and sailed for home.

Mr. HUMES. And then when did you make your second trip to Europe?

Mr. REED. Well, I got home about February and I started again about a month or so later.

Mr. HUMES. And what countries did you visit on that occasion?

Mr. REED. I visited Italy, Greece, Serbia, Bulgaria, Roumania, Turkey, and Russia.

Mr. HUMES. You were not in Germany on that trip?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Nor France?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. About when did you land in Russia?

Mr. REED. Well, I was saying—I can not remember exactly. I think it was about the end of April or May.

Mr. HUMES. 1915 or 1916?

Mr. REED. 1915.

Mr. HUMES. 1915?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you stay in Russia?

Mr. REED. Well, I stayed there about two months.

Mr. HUMES. Then you came back to this country?

Mr. REED. Then I came back through Roumania, Serbia, and Bulgaria, and sailed to this country.

Mr. HUMES. When did you get to this country, the fall of 1915?

Mr. REED. The fall of 1915.

Mr. HUMES. When did you next go to Europe?

Mr. REED. I next went to Europe—sailed August 17, 1917, I believe.

Mr. HUMES. August 17, 1917? That was the trip on which you took your wife?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You secured passports for that trip, I suppose?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Were there any assurances given to the State Department incidentally to the issuing of these passports?

Mr. REED. Yes; there were. I do not exactly remember the phrasing of it, but I remember that I was asked to give it so that I would not represent the Socialist Party at the Stockholm conference. However, the thing was so much on my mind that after I did get to Petrograd, I was asked to make a lot of speeches at different places around—a lot of political speeches—so I went and asked Consul Treadwell what I should do about it, and he said he would not do it if he were I, and so I did not do it. I refused to participate in any political conferences or conventions.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were these assurances under oath?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir; I think they were.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you not know?

Mr. REED. I do not remember. I did not have so many conscientious scruples then as I do now. I think that I took oath at that time.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you any objection to stating the nature of your scruples against taking an oath?

Mr. REED. I do not like to swear because I think it is undignified to have to commit yourself. I trust my own word, and I expect other people to trust it, and I do not intend to tell lies.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then your desire not to be sworn is rather more from a sense of pride than from conscientious scruples.

Mr. REED. Well, I have conscientious scruples against swearing. I do not see why I should swear on any particular book, or anything of that kind. The whole thing is mixed up with religious dogma, which I do not approve of.

Senator WOLCOTT. We do not swear witnesses on any particular book.

Mr. REED. That is what is in my mind. That is all there is to it.

Senator WOLCOTT. Suppose you put yourself in the same class with the other witnesses.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. If you will hold up your right hand, then, I will swear you.

(The witness was sworn by Senator Wolcott.)

Mr. HUMES. Did you, or did you not, engage in any political activities when you were in Russia?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. You were engaged in political activities?

Mr. REED. Yes; I suppose you might call them political activities.

Mr. HUMES. Then you did disregard on that occasion the oath that you took to secure your passports in doing the thing that you had promised under oath not to do?

Mr. REED. No; I do not concede that at all, because I promised for a very definite purpose; and, as I say, I always asked advice. I was thinking of it entirely in a political gathering and not as doing any political work for the Russian soviet government against Germany. And even in that work, I asked advice about that. Possibly I should not have asked advice. I did not consider it part of my oath, any more than when I was invited to go back to Petrograd as a representative of the American Government, or something of that sort. I consider that political work, but it was not a violation of my oath.

Mr. HUMES. You did make speeches over there, did you not?

Mr. REED. I made a few speeches, but not in a political sense. I did not make them as a politician and I did not make them as a representative of anybody or any political organization.

Mr. HUMES. You made a speech before the third congress—

Mr. REED. Of soviets.

Mr. HUMES (continuing). Of the council of soldiers and workers' deputies, did you not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You and Mr. Williams and Mr. Reinstein all spoke on that occasion?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What other political activities did you engage in over there?

Mr. REED. I was a member of the bureau of international revolutionary propaganda attached to the commissar for foreign affairs.

Mr. HUMES. That is the organization of which Mr. Reinstein was the head?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. For how long a period of time were you connected with that?

Mr. REED. About two months.

Mr. HUMES. Can you give us a more definite account of the period covered by those two months?

Mr. REED. I left Petrograd—February 7. January 7, December 7—perhaps about December 1. I am not quite sure.

Mr. HUMES. You commenced that work about December 1?

Mr. REED. I think so; yes.

Mr. HUMES. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. REED. February 7.

Mr. HUMES. That was February 7, 1918, that you left?

Mr. REED. Yes. I am pretty positive of the date.

Mr. HUMES. It is my understanding—I may be wrong about it—that you left there about the 20th of January. Possibly that would be on the Russian calendar.

Mr. REED. That is my recollection of it. I am not quite sure. I think I was trying to make a boat that sailed February 12 on our calendar. Of course, the two calendars are more or less mixed up, but that is my impression. I am basing it on my wife's testimony. She left on the 20th of January and I left 10 or 12 days later.

Mr. HUMES. You did not leave together, then?

Mr. REED. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. My understanding was that you left together.

Mr. REED. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. She was not in Stockholm when you got there?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. She had left before you got there?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What was the official status of this propaganda bureau with which you were connected?

Mr. REED. The official status? I do not know exactly how to answer that question. It was one of the departments of the commissariat of foreign affairs.

Mr. HUMES. What was the business of that organization, to publish newspapers or literature, or—

Mr. REED. We collaborated in the publication of newspapers, and my particular job was—that is, as far as the English language was concerned, it was—to see that the decrees and the actions of the soviet government were translated into English. The translation was not my job, but as far as English was concerned. I also collaborated in the gathering of material and data and distributing of papers to go into the German trenches.

Mr. HUMES. I call your attention to decree No. 8, dated December 23, 1917, and ask you if that is one of the decrees that you translated into English [handing paper to the witness]?

Mr. REED (after examining paper). No; I did not translate that into English.

Mr. HUMES. You saw it translated into English?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. That is one of the decrees that was issued during the time that you were working there?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. This is the decree appropriating 2,000,000 rubles for the needs of the revolutionary international movement and for the purpose of carrying on the work of the soviet governments in other countries than Russia. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. REED. I think so; yes; if I remember. That, however, had nothing to do with our department.

Mr. HUMES. You said you were translating these decrees, and this is one of the decrees, and I thought that was one of those you translated.

Mr. REED. No; I did not translate that decree.

Mr. HUMES. How many newspapers were you publishing or collaborating in at that time?

Mr. REED. I was a very small cog in the machine. I merely got material and handed it over to these various groups. I have an article here that tells about it, the press bureau which Radek was the head of and which was publishing those papers. The press bureau edited the papers. They published one paper in German, which changed its name from Die Fackel to Der Völkfriede, and we got out half a million distribution a day of that, and then we got out half a million of a Hungarian paper, and a quarter of a million of a Bohemian paper, and a quarter of a million of a Roumanian paper, and a quarter million of a Turkish paper; and then we translated all the decrees, etc.

Mr. HUMES. Is that a copy of one of the papers that you were publishing [handing paper to witness]?

Mr. REED. Yes. I was not publishing it.

Mr. HUMES. Well, I do not want to put words in your mouth. I mean, you were collaborating in the publication of it?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did you furnish the material in connection with the article on the front page of that paper?

Mr. REED. On Wilson's speech?

Mr. HUMES. Yes; with reference to Wilson's speech.

Mr. REED. No; that was a mighty curious thing. You see, Robins used to go to the soviet government, and ask the soviet government to distribute American propaganda, which they did. They distributed the Wilson speech. They put their own billposting service at his disposal and posted it. He wanted to get his stuff into the German trenches otherwise than by the way he was carrying it, which was sending it down free by the soviet, and also having it distributed by some soldiers' committees, so that he asked me to get Wilson's fourteen points into this paper if I could.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who asked you?

Mr. REED. Robins.

Senator WOLCOTT. Oh, yes.

Mr. REED. So as to get it down. As a matter of fact, I took it to the Smolny and had it telegraphed to Trotzky, who was at Brest at that time, and Trotzky gave it publicity at Brest. But I tried to get it into this paper. Radek was away, and there was nobody in charge except a subeditor, and he evidently made this thing out of it and put it in. I was very much annoyed when it came out just this way.

Mr. HUMES. Then that was published in the paper without your knowledge or consent?

Mr. REED. Yes; I had nothing to say, anyway, about it.

Mr. HUMES. And yet that is one of the papers that you were collaborating on?

Mr. REED. Yes. I can show you two, here, that have fierce attacks on German militarism, and tell the German people to revolt, and so forth and so on.

Mr. HUMES. When you got into Russia, it was along, probably, two months before the Bolshevik revolution, was it not?

Mr. REED. Yes, just about; a little more.

Mr. HUMES. What was the condition of affairs in Russia?

Mr. REED. At that time?

Mr. HUMES. When you got there.

Mr. REED. It was just after the Korniloff affair. Korniloff had raised an army and marched on Petrograd and tried to seize the military dictatorship, and the Kerensky government had split. Half the Kerensky cabinet were immediately revealed as partisans of Korniloff. Kerensky issued a decree declaring Korniloff an outlaw, and armed the citizens to repel him. The moment that Kerensky armed the citizens, something happened that he did not expect, because the democratic revolutionary organizations arose and took full control. After about five days they dominated the provisional government entirely. With their own propaganda and their own organizations, not the governmental organizations, they destroyed Korniloff's army. I have copies of the proclamations with which they did it; and when Kerensky attempted again to assume control after the democratic organization had smashed Korniloff, it was a little too late, because the democratic organizations had proved that they were stronger than the provisional government, and much more determined on smashing Korniloff. Do you want me to go on and tell the situation?

Mr. HUMES. I want you to state the actual conditions as to there being peace or civil war, terror or anarchy, or whatever it was.

Mr. REED. There was civil war. Korniloff was marching on Petrograd; and as time went on, under the Kerensky government, things got very bad. Then, when I arrived there, the Ukrainian government, which is now considered very patriotic by the allies, was dickering for a separate peace with Germany. Vinnitchenko declared that he was going to make peace with Germany if it suited him, and the Finnish senate had declared Finland autonomous. Russia was breaking up, as it has never broken up since. The provisional government was quite powerless. The provisional government included a lot of Socialist ministers, who had entered the cabinet promising certain things. Tchernov promised that some disposition would be made of the land question, and when he got in there he was unable to act, because the bourgeois ministers, the propertied-class ministers, would not play. So that when he started out by making a valuation of the land, all he could do after three months, just at the time I arrived, was to propose a small bill, proposing that committees be sent around to make valuation of these landed estates, and these commissions were promptly arrested by the landowners and put in jail; the landowners would not obey the provisional government, and the peasants got mad and began seizing the land themselves, and the government could not bring any pressure to bear on the landowners, but they could on the peasants, and so they sent Cossacks to restore order.

Mr. HUMES. The object was to ultimately secure a constituent assembly which might enact the laws providing that the lands might be distributed and that the socialistic measures that he advocated might be carried out?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And he wanted to do that through the constituent assembly elected by the people, and the people became restless because of the delay in the calling of that constituent assembly.

Mr. REED. Yes; that is so. That is just one of the reasons for which they became restless.

Mr. HUMES. Where were you at the time of the Bolshevik revolution? Were you in Petrograd?

Mr. REED. I was in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Will you just describe what took place at that time as you saw it?

Mr. REED. Why, yes. You see, I will have to go back just for a moment. During the democratic conference held in Petrograd, which I believe was financed by Col. Thompson, of the American Red Cross, which at any rate the American Red Cross at that time was upholding—I am not sure about it financing, but I have been told on very good authority that the Red Cross was cooperating in every way with the Kerensky government; this was just after the Korniloff revolt—the democratic conference voted one night to have a representative assembly and that the propertied classes should not have any votes in it. It was a pretty democratic affair.

Mr. HUMES. Can you give us the date of that?

Mr. REED. It was the middle of September. The moderate Socialist leaders hurried to the Winter Palace, and they said that this thing was getting quite serious; that it was going to split all Russia in half. Kerensky declared if the propertied classes were not admitted, he would resign; he said that everything was going to the devil and the Germans were landing, or supposed to be landing; so his spokesmen went back to this democratic conference and said that there must not be a representative assembly without representation of the propertied classes, or the whole government would fall. So the moderate Socialists managed to swing the delegates in the voting in favor of admitting the propertied classes, the very people who had been backing Korniloff. The Bolsheviki were for an all-Socialist government, and they declared that this was a trick, so that they walked out and called for a congress of soviets, of workers' and soldiers' deputies, to meet in October. This congress should have been called in September, according to the soviet constitution, but the Kerensky crowd—I mean the representatives of the moderate Socialists—refused to call this congress. The moderate Socialists were not going to call this congress if they could avoid it, because the soviets had been becoming one by one Bolsheviki.

Mr. HUMES. When had the First All-Russian Soviet met?

Mr. REED. That was in June.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the only requirement was that that should meet twice a year?

Mr. REED. No; every three months. The second congress should have been held three months later.

Mr. HUMES. All right; proceed.

Mr. REED. As the day approached for the meeting of this congress of the soviets, not only the government opposed it but all the moderate Socialist leaders, who had been losing their constituents to the Bolsheviki. It soon became evident that either the soviet would meet and declare that the provisional government did not represent the people and take over the government themselves, and the provisional government would resign, or else there would be a fight between the two. That strife between the provisional government and the soviets of soldiers' and workers' deputies had been going on for a whole year. There were two governments existing in Russia.

Now, the congress of the soviets was to meet November 7. On the night of November 5 the Kerensky government—well, there are several details in that story, one the formation of the military revolutionary committee. The Kerensky government, knowing that the garrison of Petrograd was all Bolshevik, had ordered it out of the city, in spite of the will of the soldiers' committees. The garrison did not want to leave without being sure of the regiments that were coming to take their places, that they should be composed of soldiers who could be trusted to preserve the revolution; and if they left they did not know what reaction there might be. So that this strife between the provisional government and the military revolutionary committee, which represented the Petrograd garrison, became very severe, and finally came to an open clash; the military revolutionary committee declared that it would not obey the provisional government until it had representation in the general staff. The Kerensky government, on the night of the 4th of November, sent a general to the Smolny Institute to say that he would grant this representation, and then Gen. Manikoffsky revoked that offer of Kerensky himself at 2 o'clock in the morning. The next night Kerensky sent regiments of troops to close down the Bolshevik newspapers, and issued warrants of arrest for the soviet leaders. The next day, of course, the garrison gathered around the soviet, and that night the Pavloff regiment, which was on duty at the general staff, heard the general staff drawing up plans for the surrounding of the Smolny Institute and the dispersal of the soviets. The Pavloff regiment decided that they ought to take things into their own hands, and their committee met, and they decided to arrest the ministers; they did arrest them and took them to the Smolny Institute, and the Bolsheviks who were meeting there said, "We do not want anybody arrested. This is premature. Nobody has done anything to us yet"; and they released the ministers, and at 6 o'clock in the morning the military committee got conclusive, indisputable evidence that warrants had already been issued for the arrest of Lenine and Trotzky and all the others, and they sent out detachments from the garrison to seize and hold all the principal points of the city. The soviets met that night and decided to assume the government in the name of the people of Russia, of which they claimed that they were the true representatives, representing the great mass of the people, and the Winter Palace fell, under bombardment, at 11 o'clock.

MR. HUMES. Was that at night or in the daytime?

MR. REED. At night; and from that time on the movement spread in almost identical form with almost identical results practically all over Russia, and also all over Siberia.

MR. HUMES. How much blood was shed and how much rioting and how much disorder was there in the fall of the Winter Palace, or in the taking over of the government?

MR. REED. I know that the chief of the militia—that is, of the city militia—was shot when he was trying to arrest the editors of Bolshevik papers. Somebody shot him.

In the taking of the Winter Palace there were 11 men killed on the side of the Bolsheviks, and, as far as I know, in the fighting—I was there all the time—I could not find any further casualties. There was not one man killed of the people defending the palace. That was 11 men killed in the taking of the Winter Palace.

When they arrested the junkers, the officer cadets, who were defending the Winter Palace, they let them go. I saw the red guards come out with them, armed, under arrest, and they brought them to the door and said, "Will you take up arms any more against the risen people?" The junkers answered, "No," and they were allowed to go free.

Four days later those same junkers went down and captured the telephone station, and they were again taken prisoner, and this time, owing to the intervention of Albert Rhys Williams, they were released again. They were asked again if they would take up arms, and they again said no, and they were disarmed and sent off.

Mr. HUMES. Each time they were disarmed?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. No; the first time they were not disarmed, did you not say?

Mr. REED. Yes; they were disarmed both times.

When the Cossacks came up from the south these same junkers came out and joined Kerensky, after having given their parole twice not to do so, and this time about 20 of them were killed.

Senator WOLCOTT. How many were there defending the Winter Palace?

Mr. REED. There were about 250 of them. When the ministers were arrested they were taken on foot to Peter and Paul Fortress, and there were three attempts by the crowd on the street to lynch them—this was after midnight—but they were defended by the Kronstadt sailors, and none of them were killed.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Kerensky officials were in the Winter Palace, were they not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was Kerensky himself in there?

Mr. REED. No; Kerensky escaped to the front in the morning—early that morning—before things happened; he went down to the front and tried to raise an army.

But there is another point that ought to be cleared up here, because it will probably reappear over and over, and that is about the so-called rape of the woman's battalion which was defending the Winter Palace. I took particular pains to verify that, and I have also a report on that from the anti-Bolshevik commission which was sent to Levashovo to investigate. The woman's battalion found itself in the Winter Palace. It was asked to swear allegiance to Kerensky. There was only a very small force there, just about 250 of these women, and 200 junkers; and the junkers locked the woman's battalion in the back of the palace so that nothing would happen to the women. They were locked down in the cellar there, and the Bolsheviks, the Red Guards, after they came into the Winter Palace, looked all around, and they thought there might be junkers hiding down there, and they opened the door and saw this woman's battalion, and they did not want to hurt them, nobody was very hot at that time.

The Red Guards said, "What shall we do with these people?" They could not get the women to go out of the place; they were afraid that they were going to be murdered; so that finally the Red Guards went and got a neutral officer of a certain regiment, who had not joined the Bolsheviki, but who was considered an honest sort of fellow, and he told the women that he was not a Bolshevik, and he would see that they were treated fairly. Most of them were carried to the Finland station and sent to Levashovo; but many of them wanted to stay in town, and the Bolsheviki walked around with them almost all night, looking for some place to put them, and finally found a place to put them, and three weeks later all the women were brought into town, and they were given civilian clothes and disbanded as a regiment.

The reports were that a great many of these women had been violated, and that some of them were thrown out of windows, and that four of them had committed suicide. The report to the Duma of Petrograd—which was against the Bolsheviki—was that one woman had evidently been violated. No women had been killed; no women had been thrown out of a window; and one woman only had committed suicide, and she left a note in which she said that she had been disappointed in her ideals.

Mr. HUMES. You heard about the deaths in this woman's battalion, Mr. Reed. Whom did you find in Russia that had formerly been residents in the United States, and what were their names?

Mr. REED. I found quite a lot of people, but I do not remember all of their names. I will tell you what I can think of.

Mr. HUMES. As far as you can remember.

Mr. REED. Shatoff.

Mr. HUMES. When had he been in the United States?

Mr. REED. He went back at the beginning of the Kerensky revolution.

Mr. HUMES. How long had he been here?

Mr. REED. I think a couple of years.

Mr. HUMES. He was a Russian, was he not?

Mr. REED. Yes; he was a Russian.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Mr. REED. Then there was a man named Petrovsky.

Mr. HUMES. Was he a Russian?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Where did he live?

Mr. REED. I do not know where he lived. I met him in New York, but I am pretty sure he did not live there. I met him before. He was practically the only one that I had met before.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know how long he had been in the United States?

Mr. REED. About four or five years, I should say, maybe longer.

Mr. HUMES. He was a Russian, was he?

Mr. REED. He was a Russian.

Mr. HUMES. What was his correct name? Did he have another name?

Mr. REED. I think he had another name. All Russian revolutionists have other names, everyone of them.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. Nelson.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Mr. REED. George Melnichansky.

Mr. HUMES. Where did he live in the United States?

Mr. REED. Bayonne, N. J.

Mr. HUMES. How long had he been here?

Mr. REED. I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. Melcher. He changed it because no one could pronounce it.

Mr. HUMES. Was he a Russian?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Mr. REED. Of course there was Trotzky, but Trotzky was only here about a year; and Reinstein, and Zorin, who was commissar of posts and telegraphs.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. Gumberg.

Mr. HUMES. Was he a Russian?

Mr. REED. He is a Russian Jew.

Mr. HUMES. How long had he been in this country?

Mr. REED. I think he was only here a few months; I am not sure. I know he can hardly speak English at all.

Mr. HUMES. Go on; who else?

Mr. REED. Manyinin, who was a Russian business man here.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. That is all, I think. He had nothing to do with the fighting at all.

Mr. HUMES. Was he a Russian?

Mr. REED. He was a Russian. He was mayor of the town of Sestroretzk under the Bolsheviks. He was primarily a mechanic and manufacturer.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Mr. REED. Well, Alexander Gumberg, the man who got the Sisson documents for Sisson.

Mr. HUMES. What was his position over there in the government?

Mr. REED. He did not have any position in the government.

Mr. HUMES. Who else?

Mr. REED. I am not saying all these people had positions in the government. Is that what you mean?

Mr. HUMES. Confine it to the ones who had some position with the government.

Mr. REED. You could confine it to Trotsky, Reinstein, Zorin, and I think that is all.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever come in contact with the man who is the head of the Nicolai Railroad? What was his name?

Mr. REED. His name was Krushinsky.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was he from America?

Mr. REED. No; he was not. I will tell you how this story about Shatoff came to be told.

Senator WOLCOTT. There was some fellow there at one time as the head of that railway, according to a witness who testified here, who was very familiar with New York and the island and Brooklyn.

Mr. REED. Of course, a man who comes through the train and asks you for your passport is not the head of a railway.

Senator WOLCOTT. The witness said he was.

Mr. REED. I take issue with the witness, and I will tell you why. I think it is a natural mistake, because every American that came to Petrograd was told that Shatoff was a great demon, and a most terrible anarchist, etc., so there have been people who have written magazine articles who have described that they met some Russian from the East Side who had some obscure little position—perhaps he was a ticket agent, and he talked about New York—and they put the name Shatoff to him. This Shatoff who was talked about I know intimately, as I know most of the fellows from America in prominent positions there.

Senator WOLCOTT. You left there, I think you said, in January.

Mr. HUMES. February 7.

Mr. REED. Yes; but I know pretty well what Shatoff has been doing since then.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have not been back since that time?

Mr. REED. No; but Shatoff was not the man to put in charge of a railroad, and they never had him do that. You can look in Izvestija and find out what Shatoff is doing.

Senator WOLCOTT. Was he ever put in charge of the Nicolai Railroad?

Mr. REED. Not so far as I know. I think everybody knows Shatoff and what he was doing.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Humes, did not a witness testify here that the man who was the head of that railroad was Shatoff?

Mr. HUMES. I do not recall what the name was. That may have been the name. He said he was the commissar or superintendent of some work in connection with that line of railroad.

Senator WOLCOTT. He seemed to be boss of the situation, they said.

Mr. HUMES. Who else, now? Give us the names of the rest.

Senator WOLCOTT. The point I wanted to make was that the man you refer to, who was talked about, never was the head of the railroad, as you said?

Mr. REED. Not so far as I know; and I am sure he could not be. His whole job was in another direction.

Mr. HUMES. There might be some other Shatoff.

Mr. REED. There might be some other Shatoff, although I do not know. Then, there was a man, as I said—this is connected with the government, you mean?

Mr. HUMES. Yes; connected with the government.

Mr. REED. There was a man named Meshkovsky.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. I do not remember. I do not know whether I knew it or not.

Mr. HUMES. Was he a Russian or a Russian Jew?

Mr. REED. A Russian.

Mr. HUMES. Who else? Just go right down the list.

Mr. REED. I have not got any list.

Mr. HUMES. You have in your mind, probably?

Mr. REED. Well, every once in a while people would come there. There was a fellow that I knew who used to call himself Eddie.

That is all I knew about him. He came as the representative of the soviet of Kharkoff, which is away down in the south. Almost every small soviet in the industrial districts throughout Russia had some fellow who had been in America. I know another one also—although I did not know him when I came there—Voskoff, who was the organizer of the carpenters' union in America and did a tremendous work organizing a government arms factory just outside of Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. What was his other name?

Mr. REED. That is all I knew.

Mr. HUMES. Where were his headquarters?

Mr. REED. I think in New York.

Mr. HUMES. He was a Russian, was he?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Was he naturalized in this country?

Mr. REED. I do not think so. I do not know. I know he was a very marvelous organizer.

Mr. HUMES. Among the commissars in Petrograd, how many of them had been to the United States?

Mr. REED. You mean the council of people's commissars?

Mr. HUMES. Yes; the council of people's commissars.

Mr. REED. Only one; Trotzky, I think.

Mr. HUMES. Trotzky was the only one?

Mr. REED. So far as I can remember. If you will prompt, probably I can tell you.

Mr. HUMES. Have you a complete list of them?

Mr. REED. Of the council of commissars?

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. REED. Not at this moment. I can work it out in a few moments without any trouble.

Mr. HUMES. Will you make a list and hand it to us this afternoon? I do not want to take the time now.

Mr. REED. Surely.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who was the commissar of the northern Petrograd commune?

Mr. REED. At the present time?

Senator WOLCOTT. Who was when you were there?

Mr. REED. There was no such thing when I was there. That was established afterwards; it was established in about April, I think; April or May.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know who he was?

Mr. REED. Zinoviev.

Senator WOLCOTT. My recollection is that some witness testified who he was, and, as I remember, he was secretary to Mr. Robins.

Mr. REED. Zorin was meant. Zorin may have been chief commissar of the northern commune at one time. Zorin is the man whose name I said was Gumberg; but, of course, it was his brother who was working with Robins. And that Gumberg was not working with Raymond Robins at that time; he was translator to Sisson.

Mr. HUMES. When had he been secretary to Robins, before or after he became engaged by Sisson?

Mr. REED. Before.

Mr. HUMES. When did Sisson go to Russia?

Mr. REED. Sisson turned up there—let me see—the end of December, I believe; I think just about the middle of December.

Mr. HUMES. December, 1917?

Mr. REED. Probably.

Mr. HUMES. Well, December, 1917.

Mr. REED. Yes; sure.

Mr. HUMES. Prior to that time Gumberg had been secretary to Robins?

Mr. REED. Translator, not secretary.

Mr. HUMES. Well, employed by him?

Mr. REED. Of course I do not want to comment on Mr. Robins's or Mr. Sisson's personal affairs in regard to Gumberg, but that is my understanding.

Mr. HUMES. We are only trying to identify the man, that is all.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Reed, during the period from the November revolution up until you left, on the 7th of February, what was the condition of affairs in Petrograd?

Mr. REED. Well, in order to tell you that I will have to tell what it was like at the end of the Kerensky régime.

Mr. HUMES. You did.

Mr. REED. No; I did not.

Mr. HUMES. I thought you covered that. I asked you some time ago, I think.

Mr. REED. You did not ask me that. You asked me what it was like when I arrived in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Just go on and tell us what the condition was from the time you arrived up until the revolution, and then tell us what the condition was during the revolution and up until the time that you left.

Mr. REED. Well, the last month of the Kerensky régime was marked first by the falling off of the bread supply from 2 pounds a day to 1 pound, to half a pound, to a quarter of a pound, and, the final week, no bread at all. Holdups and crime increased to such an extent that you could hardly walk down the streets. The papers were full of it. Not only had the government broken down, but the municipal government had absolutely broken down. The city militia was quite disorganized and up in the air, and the street-cleaning apparatus and all that sort of thing had broken down. The cooperative distribution of food had broken down—milk and everything of that sort.

The first five nights of the Bolshevik revolution were marked by an utter absence of crime of any kind. It was probably the most orderly time there has ever been in Petrograd, because the streets were patrolled by patrols of red guards and soldiers who were fired by a certain kind of idealism.

Mr. HUMES. I do not want to interrupt you, but you say the first five days of the revolution. You mean the five days following the success of the Bolshevik revolution, I assume.

Mr. REED. No; because for two or three weeks it did not succeed. There were counter revolutions in the beginning, and it was not entirely successful the night that the Winter Palace fell.

Mr. HUMES. Five nights following the fall of the Winter Palace?

Mr. REED. Including the fall of the Winter Palace. After that things settled down to normal—well, no. I will withdraw that and say that for the first three weeks of the Bolshevik régime the city was excellently policed and excellent order was kept in it.

After that time several factors entered into the situation, and one of them was the wine riots. The soldiers of certain regiments got on to the fact that there were wine cellars, and telephone messages were sent to the barracks and also notes were sent to the barracks saying where these wine cellars were, and I think a few of those provocateur notes declared that the soldiers should go and get the wine in the various places. Well, it was very cold, and these soldiers were out on the streets most of the time fighting, etc., and they yielded to temptation—some of them—and broke into the wine cellars. For about two weeks you would hear of a sudden in the night a terrible crash—somebody would smash a window in—and the soldiers would go in and pass out the bottles, and there would be a crowd of about 200 soldiers around the wine cellars, and they would drink this wine and go around town firing off guns in the air. They did some damage, but it was very inconsiderable.

Mr. HUMES. I understood you a moment ago to say that there was very little disorder and everything was quiet after those first three weeks. Now you have said that the soldiers were on the streets fighting all the time, and consequently they wanted the wine. Now, suppose we reach an understanding about that.

Mr. REED. I am not talking about civil war; I am talking about crime; I am talking about unlicensed crime—holding up people and shooting them. I am not talking about two armed forces fighting each other. There were no houses robbed and no hold-ups. I am not talking about civil war.

Mr. HUMES. But there was fighting on the streets all the time?

Mr. REED. No; there was not fighting on the streets all the time.

Mr. HUMES. To what extent was there fighting?

Mr. REED. There was only fighting to this extent. There was fighting on the day of the fall of the Winter Palace, that is one day, that was Wednesday. There was fighting the following Sunday and the following Monday, when the junkers made a counter-revolution. There was fighting the following Tuesday at night, and Wednesday morning when Kerensky's army was reported to be 4 miles from the city and coming in.

Mr. HUMES. Was it?

Mr. REED. No, it was not; but that was the rumor. It was 8 miles from the city.

Mr. HUMES. That was the result of a false rumor as to the location of the troops?

Mr. REED. The point is that a lot of people rose, thinking that he was coming in, and it upset affairs.

Mr. HUMES. Go on.

Mr. REED. The soviets stopped the wine pogroms themselves. They sent first the Kronstadt sailors and tried to stop the looting of the wine cellars by argument, and they also made speeches about it in the soviets, and they published proclamations, etc., and so on, and they kept that up for about two weeks; but the plundering of the wine cellars still continued, especially by two regiments—the lowest element of the regiments—so the soviets saw that something had to be done immediately. They took a vote on the use of force in the central executive committee of the soviets, and the debate lasted about four and a half hours, at the end of which time they sent out trucks with machine guns strapped on them, and they stopped this business. The commissars would go on and give three warnings to the men who were looting the wine cellars, and if the men left the wine cellars, the commissars would go in and smash all the bottles out in the street and let the wine flow. That is what they did with the Winter Palace wine cellar, which was worth about $4,000,000, and they poured the wine into the Neva. If the soldiers did not leave the wine cellars, they would shoot.

Mr. HUMES. When did that take place with reference to the revolution? Was that at the end of the three weeks' period after the fall of the Winter Palace?

Mr. REED. I think it began—this lasted for quite a while.

Mr. HUMES. How long did it last? Was it still in vogue when you left?

Mr. REED. No; it had been stopped.

Mr. HUMES. How long?

Mr. REED. It lasted for about two weeks and a half, because the soviets could not get their minds made up to use force on these people; and they had to be more or less careful politically, too, because they had to educate everybody to this revolution and see that the wrongdoers were punished.

Mr. HUMES. What change was made in the method of furnishing food to the population when the Bolshevik government came in?

Mr. REED. Of course, the Kerensky government had dropped out without leaving any resources at all in the city, or supplies, and the soviet government was faced with strikes in all the ministries. The employees of all the ministries went on strike, the bank clerks went on strike, the employees of large business houses—clerks, etc.—went on strike, even the telephone girls went on strike against the Bolsheviks; and not only that, but the cooperative associations refused to provision the city unless the Bolshevik government was overthrown.

Mr. HUMES. The Bolshevik government?

Mr. REED. Well, at that time it was the Bolshevik government for a few days.

Mr. HUMES. This was before the Bolshevik revolution, though, was it not?

Mr. REED. No; you asked me what happened after the Bolshevik revolution:

Mr. HUMES. Pardon me. I wanted to locate the time. Go on.

Mr. REED. They suspected that the food speculators had great stores stored away in the city, which were being held for high prices, so they went around to the great warehouses which had been reported, to find out if food was being held, and as there was a desperate emergency they proceeded to take this food and distribute it to the people. During all the time I was there under the soviet government there was never so little bread as there had been in the last week or week and a half of the Kerensky régime. When it came to the end of December we were put back to a pound and a half a day again, and the way the soviets did it was very interesting. You see, it was an emergency government, without the possibility of using the government machinery, because the government machinery was paralyzed. They could not depend on the higher officials, but only on the organized will of the working people. So they closed the trans-Siberian to all passenger traffic for 24 days, and then they got 13 trains, and they got the shop committees in charge of the different factories to load up these trains with things that the peasants needed, and took a government commission with those things—clothing, implements, and everything the peasants needed, and sent them out to exchange these articles for food, because the Kerensky government money was not worth anything.

Mr. HUMES. Where did they get this clothing and these commodities that they were taking out to trade with the peasants for food supplies?

Mr. REED. They got them from the factory workers.

Mr. HUMES. They were requisitioned?

Mr. REED. They were requisitioned.

Mr. HUMES. Had those factories been nationalized at that time?

Mr. REED. Well, a great many of them had practically been nationalized. That is to say, the owners had fled away six or eight months before and the workmen had continued them. I know several factories that were operated that way. The workmen continued to manufacture after the factories were officially shut down. The owners had left for foreign parts.

Mr. HUMES. In effect, they simply requisitioned or confiscated enough material for those 13 trains that were sent out. They were sent out into Siberia or the interior, and took that stuff to the peasants and traded that stuff to the peasants for supplies, which they brought back into Petrograd for the feeding of the people.

Mr. REED. Not only that, but for the government of Samara and the government of Tambov and other Provinces where famine was threatening.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did they take any of those things from stores?

Mr. REED. No; this was a pure cooperation of the factory shop committee in the factories to get together all things that they had manufactured. At that time they did not touch anything in the stores.

Mr. HUMES. Are there textile mills in Petrograd?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, when they got this foodstuff, how was it issued?

Mr. REED. It was issued by bread cards from the special food committee. At that time the special food committee started to strike; but they happened to remember that they themselves would starve, so they decided to go on working.

Mr. HUMES. How was the population divided, if at all, for the purpose of issuing this food?

Mr. REED. Well, every citizen at that time was given the ordinary food cards, such as were in use in every country in war time. That, of course, was a government measure, but it had been carried further.

Mr. HUMES. They gave those cards to all the people?

Mr. REED. To all the people at that time.

Mr. HUMES. Now, subsequent to that time, and while you were there, were the decrees issued dividing the population into classes for the purpose of provisioning?

Mr. REED. No; it was not necessary at that time.

Mr. HUMES. Subsequently, however, that was done, was it not?

Mr. REED. I believe it was. I have seen the decree.

Mr. HUMES. And the people were divided into four classes, according to their business or standing in the community, as viewed by the government?

Mr. REED. No; according to their usefulness and their need. You know, the people that did the least——

Mr. HUMES. The usefulness was determined by the government?

Mr. REED. The people that got the least food——

Mr. HUMES. They were arbitrarily classified according to their alleged usefulness into four classes?

Mr. REED. And the members of the government got the least food, you will notice that.

Mr. HUMES. I have not seen any evidence of that.

Mr. REED. You will notice it in the degree.

Mr. HUMES. We will get to that after a little while. Now, that all happened?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. So you do not know how it worked out in practice?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Did you see any starvation in Petrograd while you were there?

Mr. REED. Well, food was not so easy to get.

Mr. HUMES. Any starvation?

Mr. REED. I have never seen any actual starvation. I have seen people very hungry. There is no doubt about it. I have been very hungry myself.

Mr. HUMES. But the conditions had not become disturbed when you left?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Were there any pilfering and holdups on the streets up to the time that you left?

Mr. REED. There was very little in comparison with the last week of the Kerensky government. You might also say that the city was about as orderly as it had ever been. There was really very strict policing in Petrograd at that time. Of course, it would be foolish to say that there was no crime in the city.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Reed, is there anything else that you want to say in connection with the things that you saw in Petrograd as to the conditions there. If there is, just make the statement.

Mr. REED. I would like to say one thing about the way that a factory is run, because I think very few people understand that. But first I want to speak just for a moment about this classification. In most countries, you see, when there is a time of famine—and that was true in Europe during the war—the people who suffer the most are the families of the working people; while in Petrograd, of course, the thing was quite opposite. The working people in their unions had a preference in food, and the working people, the people who did actual work—I do not mean by that manual labor; I mean any kind of labor—the food was distributed in this classification entirely according to the necessity for food. That is to say, people engaged in heavy manual labor needed more food, and they got more, and the people who needed less got less, and the government employees, who worked with their brains, as it is called, got very little, as compared to the workers.

The whole industrial machinery in Russia is controlled by what is called the council of workers control, and that council of workers control consists of delegates from the all-Russian trade unions, which determine wages, hours, and conditions of each industry, and the all-Russian council of factory shop committees, which controls production at the source. And I would say here that there are 304 industries nationalized, in Russia, and all the rest are in private hands. They are controlled, however, by the workers entirely.

Mr. HUMES. Then all of the factories have not been nationalized?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMES. That is in disregard of one of the principles of the government, not to nationalize them?

Mr. REED. The government is not one of those theoretical dreams that everyone seems to think it must be. The government is extremely practical in Russia. The government knows itself perfectly well that it is impossible to ignore the capitalist. It knows that if the capitalists do not attack them with arms they would with capital.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is that the philosophy of their international program, to try to make all the world socialistic, and thus, so to speak, make the world safe for socialism?

Mr. REED. I should say it was. I may say that they are not going to do it with an invading army, but by the advertisement of their doctrine. That is international socialism, which has existed for the last 40 or 50 years.

Senator WOLCOTT. People in charge of the soviet government favor that, do they not?

Mr. REED. I should think they did.

Senator WOLCOTT. You said there were 304 industries nationalized?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That, of course, means more than 304 factories?

Mr. REED. Yes; it means much more than that. None of those industries are completely nationalized. There are one or two factories that are not in every case.

What I wanted to say was that the Russian republic has offered, the soviet government has offered to foreign capital inducements to come to Russia, even as it is. They offered it to the American ambassador at a certain time. They have offered it to all the European countries, especially the allied countries, in the same way they offered to keep on fighting Germany if they should be given certain aid by the allied countries, which offer was in some cases refused and in other cases ignored.

The Russian government, as soon as a man who owns a factory is interested in developing and is interested in the work, and can do something to keep the factory going, and has a definite place in it, and is willing to work, under workers' control, does not nationalize the factory. In other words, it guarantees him an income.

Now, as regards the figures for industry, everybody seems to think that there is no industry going on in Russia. But, as a matter of fact, practically 63 to 68 per cent of the textile business of Great Russia is under control of the soviet government, and it is almost normal in production.

Senator WOLCOTT. Where do you get that information from?

Mr. REED. I got it from the official report of the ministry of commerce and industry, which also gives all the industries in which production is not normal, in which the industry has fallen off. In some industries it has absolutely ceased.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is a Bolshevik soviet ministry?

Mr. REED. That is a soviet ministry.

Senator WOLCOTT. That puts out this information?

Mr. REED. It does not put it out primarily for the outside world.

Senator WOLCOTT. From which you got your information?

Mr. REED. Yes. I have never seen that questioned, by the way. I have a copy of the Survey.

Senator WOLCOTT. The witnesses have questioned it here.

Mr. REED. I have a copy of the Survey of February 1, 1919, with an article called "A new Era in Russian Industry," written in the summer of 1918 by Clara I. Taylor, who is an industrial investigator in this country, and who investigated Russian industry in the summer of 1918, in the worst period of Russian industry, when it was most disorganized; and the picture she paints in many instances shows that the soviet government has not lived up to what it said it was going to do. It shows, however, that there is an immense industry, especially textile industry, around Moscow. She knows what the factories around Moscow are doing; she has investigated them.

I have seen two or three very interesting examples of factories worked by the workers. One was at Sestrovetzk, the government arms factory. It may not be believed here when I tell these figures. They can be verified. I think Prof. Ross might verify them. Of course, it was a government-owned factory under the old régime, and therefore full of grafters and very inefficient; but the workers have reduced the expenses of running the factory 50 per cent, have reduced the hours from 11½ hours to 8, and have increased production 45 per cent. They not only have done that, but they have taken over the town and have built the first sewer system they ever had in the town, and they have built a three-story school building and hospital. I will grant that that was a model factory and a model town, and the people at the head of the soviet had a great experience in organization, as most of the leaders of the soviet were men who had been in America and had gone back and were able to render valuable service.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say that you saw that yourself?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. That had been a government institution organized to make war material during the war?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And it had been organized by and under the control of the government prior to the revolution, and the activities there were continued by the Bolshevik government after they came into power?

Mr. REED. It is a little more complicated than that.

Mr. HUMES. It was not a plant that had been nationalized and taken over in the sense that private enterprises were nationalized, was it?

Mr. REED. Yes; it was absolutely the same system of management.

Mr. HUMES. It was a government plant all the time?

Mr. REED. Yes; but the nationalized government plant and nationalized private plant are on an equality as regards management.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did they use the same personnel when they took it over?

Mr. REED. That was an interesting thing. These government factories were built by the old régime, and, of course, when the Czar fell most of the managers ran away. When the Czar abdicated the old managers left or were kicked out by the workmen, who hated them anyway, so the government factories in Russia had practically one year's jump on the private factories in working out workers' control. The Kerensky government had never been able to get control of the factories. They really ran themselves by the workers and not under the domination of the ministries of labor, and commerce, and industry at all.

Mr. HUMES. There was a feeling in Germany and a general belief that under the Czar's régime many of those that were employed in the service of the government were pro-German and not in sympathy with the war against Germany?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. But is it not true that that was an arms and munition factory of the government, and is not that one of the reasons—the inefficiency and ineffectiveness of that plant—which account very largely for the want of equipment of the Russian Army in the field, and their being unable to supply themselves with the necessary implements of war?

Mr. REED. I think that is very possible. But you must remember there is another factor, too, and that was not only the inability to get munitions but the deliberate manufacture of munitions that did not fit the guns. That was done, of course. The trial of Gen. Soukhomlinoff showed very well that the Minister of War under the Czar had had those munitions manufactured so that they did not fit the guns, and that thing was carried on in some parts of Russia even under the Kerensky government. I do not mean to say that Kerensky knew the situation, but his chief of staff, Kornilof, compelled the fall of Riga in order to compel the fall of the soldiers' committee.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, the gross mismanagement in the munition factories was not rectified when Kerensky came into power, but was continued under Kerensky.

Mr. REED. That is practically true, except at the places where the workmen took things over.

Senator WOLCOTT. The point proves this, does it not, assuming all the facts you have stated, that soviet management of the munitions business was more efficient than government operation as it manifested itself in Russia?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. I do not think a capitalist government can be efficient in managing anything.

Senator WOLCOTT. The extent of the proof about this factory is that the government management under the Russian régime was less efficient than the soviet management. It does not prove, that particular incident, any excellence of the soviet management, for instance, over private industry?

Mr. REED. That particular incident does not. I believe there is an American, of the American Railway Mission, who was interviewed in New York—I am not at liberty to give his name, but he is in Washington now—who testified as to the results of the soviet management as compared with private management.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say he was a railroad man?

Mr. REED. I think I can get him and get his name for you.

Mr. HUMES. How many newspapers were being published in Russia when you left?

Mr. REED. About 10,000,000, I should imagine.

Mr. HUMES. Were there any being printed that were not being printed under the control of the government?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long was it after you left that the government took over the control of all the newspapers?

Mr. REED. I think my wife was not quite able to get that over to you. There seems to be a misunderstanding. I want to explain what the soviet government did. They sought to destroy the monopoly of the press by the propertied classes. They took over the monopoly not of the newspapers but of the ink-printing presses and paper in Russia. A commission was elected, a nonpartisan commission, a commission composed of proportional representatives of all the political parties, to decide upon the distribution of this paper and ink and presses. The municipal elections determined what proportion of constituents each party had, and the proportion of constituents of each political party determined the amount of ink, paper, and presses which were awarded to that party; that is to say, if the Cadet Party had a third of the votes, it got a third of the available printing facilities.

Mr. HUMES. There is no Cadet paper that is being printed in Russia, is there?

Mr. REED. There are two there, and I think I can get them for you.

Mr. HUMES. Where are they printed?

Mr. REED. One is Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. What is the name of it?

Mr. REED. I do not know that. I have seen the papers of several other parties. There are papers of even the opposing parties published in Moscow at the present time.

Mr. HUMES. Can you give us the names of any papers that are being printed in Russia that are not controlled by or not supporting the Bolshevik government?

Mr. REED. Volia Naroda, a socialist revolutionary paper.

Mr. HUMES. Where is that brought out?

Mr. REED. In Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. When did you last see that?

Mr. REED. Just the other day.

Mr. HUMES. What was the date of it?

Mr. REED. I think it was about December, last December.

Mr. HUMES. December, 1918?

Mr. REED. I think so. I know I have seen many papers.

Mr. HUMES. Was that a paper opposing the government?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. In what way was it opposing the government?

Mr. REED. Well, the socialist revolutionary party never did make up its mind to go in with the soviet government, and never let up for one minute opposing the dictatorship of the proletariat theory which the Bolsheviki advanced. Now, I have here an account of the meeting of the Mensheviki, which took place in Moscow. This is in a Bolshevik paper, and it devotes space to the three days' session. A great many of the speakers said that they would not have anything to do with the Bolsheviki under any circumstances.

Mr. HUMES. When was that meeting, the date of the meeting?

Mr. REED. December 10, 1918.

Senator WOLCOTT. You saw the paper yourself?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You made the translation?

Mr. REED. I did not make the translation; no. This is published in the Northern Commune, a Bolshevik paper, December 12, 1916 [reading]:

At the meeting of the Mensheviki that took place at Moscow Abramovich pointed out that the entire democratic element is now fluctuating between two sentiments. Let us have anything rather than the Bolsheviki; let us have a union of all living forces of the revolution. Martov, at the end of his speech, declared that the entire democracy of the west, even its most right elements, should protest against the plans of foreign imperialists, not only in the name of the people of Russia, but also in the name, chiefly, of the preservation of the accomplishment of the revolution, "whatever may be the result of this Bolsheviki experiment on the revolution."

And the decisive resolution practically amounted to this, that they would join together, whatever might be the result of this Bolsheviki government. It is evident that they did not agree with the Bolsheviki.

Now, at Sestroretzk, the town of which I was speaking, when I was there after the Bolshevik insurrection, and at the time of the insurrection, when there was fighting with Kerensky and shooting around Petrograd and Moscow, all the halls had been confiscated by the soviet government. The opposition political parties were going around and asking the Bolshevik soviet government for permission to use the halls to talk against them, and they were given to them. According to late newspaper reports this is still the case.

Senator WOLCOTT. When was that?

Mr. REED. January, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. Now, I call your attention to one of the decrees, as follows [reading]:

The following organs of the press shall be subject to be closed: (a) Those inciting to open resistance or disturbance toward the workers' and peasants' government; (b) those sowing confusion by means of an obviously columnatory perversion of facts; (c) those inciting to acts of criminal character, punishable by the penal laws.

Now, is it not a fact that pursuant to that decree no newspapers that are not supporting the Bolsheviki are permitted to be published?

Mr. REED. That is not true.

Mr. HUMES. Then, they have not carried their decrees into effect?

Mr. REED. Yes; they have; but you do not have to excite to violence against the government to oppose it. The papers that incite to violence against the Government of this country are suppressed.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think they should be?

Senator WOLCOTT. As a matter of fact, I do not think they are.

Mr. REED. That is the theory of the Post Office, at any rate.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think that newspapers that advocate the forcible overthrow of the Government should be suppressed?

Mr. REED. I think it is perfectly natural that they should be.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think they ought to be?

Mr. REED. It depends upon what you mean by the forcible overthrow of the Government.

Mr. HUMES. I mean the overthrow of the Government other than such changes in form as may be brought about under the Constitution, in the way that is provided.

Mr. REED. Well, I believe that our Declaration of Independence says something about the inalienable right of the people to change the form of government whenever they see fit.

Mr. HUMES. And following that, the Constitution provides the means by which that should be accomplished, does it not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Do you think that any newspaper or any public speaker has a right to advocate a change in the form of government in any other way than the inalienable way that is provided for in the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution itself?

Mr. REED. I do not think that—I would rather make a broader question of this.

Mr. HUMES. Just answer the question, and then explain.

Mr. REED. I can not answer the question without making it in my own way. The way I want to answer that question is this: That I think no changes ought to be made in the form of government until a majority of the people are in favor of such change, and I do not think that any obstruction ought to stand in the way of the will of the majority of the people.

Mr. HUMES. And you believe that when the majority of the people want that, they are justified in disregarding—that justifies any means by which it can be secured?

Mr. REED. If it can be secured by legal means, I do not think there is any justification or excuse for force.

Mr. HUMES. Now, under the Constitution of the United States the people of the United States can change the form of government in the manner provided for in that document.

Mr. REED. That is the theory of the government.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that a fact?

Mr. REED. If I did not believe it was a fact, I would not vote, and I do vote.

Mr. HUMES. Then you must believe that any agitation advocating a change in the form of government in any other way than that manner provided by the Constitution is improper and should be suppressed. Is that true? Do you believe that?

Mr. REED. No; there are a great many matters—

Mr. HUMES. You do not believe that. You believe that the people have a right to advocate the overthrow of the Government in a manner other than the manner provided for in the fundamental law itself, do you?

Mr. REED. I prefer to answer that in my own way.

Mr. HUMES. I want you to answer the question and then explain.

Mr. REED. I can not answer—

Senator WOLCOTT. Let him answer in the way he pleases.

Mr. REED. I am trying to answer everything and not trying to evade anything. The fact is that the constitutions and governments of modern nations—the western liberal nations—were established when industrial era was young, and there were not many conditions of industry which required change. We have found that there are certain cases where purely political action seems to be inadequate; that is, where workers with rising prices for food have tried to get a raise in wages and perhaps do not get it. The strike is perfectly legal, and yet the strike is not provided for in the Constitution. That is an instance of what I mean; different conditions come up at different times in the history of a people which require different methods of changing the form of government. The rights of workers to organize is not provided for in the Constitution, and was at first bitterly opposed, but it is now legally recognized. That is what I mean, and as long as a people of a country are really responsive, or the government is responsive, to the will of the people there is no necessity for any violence whatever. I do not see any necessity for violence in the United States.

Mr. HUMES. The question of the legality of the organization of labor is not a question of the form of government.

Mr. REED. I do not see why it is not. It is a matter for government.

Mr. HUMES. We are talking about the form of government. You are discussing a subject that is a question of possible legislation. You are not discussing the matter that goes to the form of government.

Mr. REED. I am discussing the matter of laws and legislation.

Mr. HUMES. That has nothing to do with the form of government.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Then you do not question the right of the government to legislate on these subjects?

Mr. REED. Question the right of the government?

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. REED. No; I do not, but it is not provided for in the machinery. If you would look at the reconstruction of the British Empire at this time, the British Imperial Government is undergoing a complete change in form, proposed by the ministry of labor, proposed by Lloyd George to recognize self-government in industry and give industry a share in the government.

Mr. HUMES. You do not distinguish between legislation intended to carry into effect a form of government and the form of government itself, do you?

Mr. REED. No; I think the form of government, as composed of accretions—I mean, we have in some States the initiative and referendum, and we have a great many legislative reforms which are not provided for in the Constitution in any way, but respond to the needs of the people, that is all.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Reed, is it or is it not a fact that in the past you have advocated and been affiliated, directly or indirectly, with anarchistic movements? Have you not proclaimed anarchistic doctrines?

Mr. REED. I do not remember having done so. Anarchy means against—I do not understand what you mean by anarchistic doctrines.

Mr. HUMES. I mean the abolition of all government.

Mr. REED. No, never, not so far as I know. I am very much against that.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Reed, for how long a period of time were you on the German firing line and in Germany?

Mr. REED. Well, as I testified, a month and a half or two months.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that while you were in Germany and in the German trenches, you there, for amusement or some other purpose, participated in the handling of German machine guns?

Mr. REED. No; I never handled a German machine gun.

Mr. HUMES. Have you not so stated?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Have you not stated that while you were in the German trenches you fired a German machine gun?

Mr. REED. No; I never stated it. I think I had better explain this whole incident. You see, I have been brought up before the French Embassy, and have been pursued in every way for this alleged shooting on the French lines. I have denied it in the New York Herald and through the papers several times. I think I had better tell you what really happened. There was a man by the name of Robert Dunn, of the New York Evening Post. He and I went into the German trenches. We went in at night, while there was not anything doing at all. In the back of the trenches, the back lines, a German officer who was with us took a gun from a soldier, and he said, "Do you want to see how it works?" It would not have occurred to my mind to shoot at anyone. I am entirely opposed to anything of that kind. Besides, I have lived in France myself, and have more affection for the French than any other people except my own people. Dunn wrote an article in the Evening Post, in which he called himself and me Franc-tireurs in the trenches; he said that the Germans had offered us a gun to shoot through a peephole, and he took a gun, and he did not take it until after I, who was a pacifist—and that is not true, by the way—until I had shot it. He knew my aversion to such things, and, as a matter of fact, neither of us shot. I do not know how many times this thing must be contradicted, but I am perfectly willing to keep on contradicting it.

Mr. HUMES. That is one of the harrowing tales of the war correspondents that is mere fiction?

Mr. REED. Pure fiction, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HUMES. It is some satisfaction to get a light on war correspondents.

Mr. REED. Dunn is now, by the way, or was until recently, an ensign in the American Navy, attached to the French squadron, so that it could not have been very serious.

Senator WOLCOTT. Would you favor for this country the nationalization of industry and of land by direct action, after the fashion of the Soviet government in Russia?

Mr. REED. Why, I would favor the nationalization of industry and land, but the question of method is only a question of whether it can be done anyway. It never crosses my mind that it can not be done perfectly peaceably. I really still hold to the theory that when the majority of the people want that in this country they will get it.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think they will, too, by constitutional legal methods.

Mr. REED. Any way that they can get it.

Senator WOLCOTT. If they do not get it that way, if it does not come that way, it is proof that they do not want it.

Mr. REED. It may be or it may not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you not think it would be so?

Mr. REED. I do not know, when such reforms come up, whether our Government is flexible enough to permit them.

Senator WOLCOTT. We would have to change our Constitution before that could be done.

Mr. REED. We do not have to change our Constitution before we send troops in Russia without a declaration of war.

Senator WOLCOTT. No; we have the right to do that.

Mr. REED. We do not have to change our Constitution in the phrase which says that the right of free speech shall not be abridged and annulled; yet it is both abridged and annulled.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not know where it is. If you mean by the right of free speech that you can preach violence and incendiarism, it ought to be annulled.

Mr. REED. Why is not the Constitution changed?

Senator WOLCOTT. That is not free speech.

What I was interested to know is this: Whether or not you think that the taking over of private property without compensation to the owner—the so-called nationalization of property—should be tolerated in this country except through the ordinary legal processes provided by our form of government, our Constitution, and our laws.

Mr. REED. Well, as I was trying to answer you, I do not know how flexible our laws are and how flexible our Constitution is, and how flexible our form of government is. It never has been brought to a real test whether it is possible to follow the will of the people in such a gigantic result. I do not see any reason why it should not be.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you in the course of your trips over the country advocated the nationalization of industry and land in this country as the Russian soviet has done?

Mr. REED. No; I have said I thought it was a very good thing, and I point to the effect of it in Russia. I do not think, you know, that these changes have come about in all countries in exactly the same form. They will come about according to the different conditions that exist in all countries, but I think they will come about in all countries. That is why, when I talk of the Russian soviet government, although I think it is a great thing, and what they are doing is a great thing. I do not mean to say that I think it will come about like that in Germany, or that it will come about that way here. It will come about the way they work to make reforms. It will probably come about here the way the people want it. What that way will be I can not prophesy. The only thing I can say is that I would like to see labor organized; I would like to see the people educated in true economics, and to understand their interests and class interests, and taught to work together.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed, on February 8, 1918, you were quoted in Christiania, in an interview, as follows [reading]:

Conditions in the United States have long ago become worse than in Russia. Freedom of speech has been suppressed and every vestige of democracy has disappeared.

Mr. REED. That is slightly exaggerated. I denied it the next day. Have you my denial?

Mr. HUMES. No. You were so quoted, and you denied it?

Mr. REED. It was a misquotation.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed, did you or did you not make the statement at a meeting in Yonkers last Sunday that there were 3,000,000 rifles in the hands of 3,000,000 workmen in Russia, and that very shortly there would be 3,000,000 rifles in the hands of 3,000,000 workingmen in the United States, to be used in the same manner that they were being used in Russia?

Mr. REED. I never said such a thing in my life. How foolish! How could you get 3,000,000 rifles into the hands of 3,000,000 American workingmen?

Mr. HUMES. What was the reference that you made to rifles in that speech?

Mr. REED. I did not make any reference to rifles. I remember describing conditions in Russia, and I said that there were 3,000,000 men in Russia organized against the imperialists of the world in defense of the socialist fatherland.

Mr. HUMES. And you have no recollection—

Mr. REED. I could not say anything, Mr. Humes, of that sort. How could 3,000,000 rifles be gotten into the hands of 3,000,000 American workmen for that purpose? That is impossible.

Mr. HUMES. Well, did you intend to give the impression to the people there that that was a condition or a proposition to be attained in this country?

Mr. REED. I do not understand how I could have given any such impression. If you could quote my words, I could tell you whether I said them or not.

Mr. HUMES. Did you intend by anything that you said to convey any such impression?

Mr. REED. No. I may be misunderstood sometimes, because I am always talking to the working class, urging them to enforce their rights.

Mr. HUMES. What led you to discuss the arming of workingmen?

Mr. REED. In this country?

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. REED. I never did at all. I have not the slightest recollection of saying anything about arming the workmen in this country.

Mr. HUMES. Then there was no connection between your reference to the conditions in Russia and this country?

Mr. REED. I was talking about the general conditions in Russia, and talking about the Russian situation. I can not understand how that impression could be formed. It would never have crossed my mind to say anything about a revolutionary army of 3,000,000 American workmen now, because they are fairly contented.

Mr. HUMES. Have you in any of your public speeches advocated a revolution in the United States similar to the revolution in Russia?

Mr. REED. I have always advocated a revolution in the United States.

Mr. HUMES. You are in favor of a revolution in the United States?

Mr. REED. Revolution does not necessarily mean a revolution by force. By revolution I mean a profound social change. I do not know how it is to be attained.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not in your speeches leave the impression with your audience that you are talking about a revolution of force?

Mr. REED. Possibly.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you mean to leave that impression with them?

Mr. REED. No. My point is this, that the will of the people will be done; the will of the great majority of the people will be done.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is a sound point.

Mr. REED. That is my point, and if the will of the great majority is not done at the time of the American revolution, it will be done by law; it will be done by some other way, that is all.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you not know, Mr. Reed, that the use of the word "revolution" in the ordinary meaning carries the idea of force, arms, and conflict?

Mr. REED. Well, as a matter of fact, unfortunately, all these profound social changes have been accompanied by force. There is not one that has not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you not used the word "revolution" to mean force?

Mr. REED. No; I did not put it in there. It has been associated with that word.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you not think, as a matter of fairness to yourself, as well as to your auditors, that you ought to explain that you do not mean force when you use the word "revolution?"

Mr. REED. I mean, of course, that the will of the people will be done, and if it can not be done by law it will be done by force. It never has been done peaceably, but I do not see why it should not. I still do not see why it is not. As a matter of fact, if I am saying anything which is contrary to law, I am willing to answer for it.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am speaking only of the matter of fair dealing with the American people and with yourself in the use of a word which carries with it the idea of armed force, whether or not, if you do not intend that idea, you ought not to make it plain in your addresses.

Mr. REED. I have talked a good deal since the espionage act, and have done a good deal of explaining. I am a revolutionary socialist. But, as a matter of fact, in order to make myself perfectly clear, I have done a good deal of explaining in my talks around the country.

Senator WOLCOTT. By "revolutionary socialism," I suppose you mean the overthrow of the present—what you call capitalistic—system, by peaceable means?

Mr. REED. By peaceable means, by all means, if possible.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED. By peaceable means, and never before the mass of the people is ready for it. It is impossible. I mean—

Senator WOLCOTT. You have a perfect right to advocate that, so far as I can see.

Mr. REED. And I just want to state that anybody who advocates the overthrow of the majority by the minority is nothing but a criminal, because it means an abortive lot of bloodshed without any object at all, killing for no purpose. It means Napoleon after the French Revolution and everything else.

Mr. HUMES. In 1918 you spoke in a hall on East Fifth Street, did you not?

Mr. REED. When was this?

Mr. HUMES. June 20. In June, sometime.

Mr. REED. I probably did; yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did you not at that time make, and have you not since made, a statement that you were organizing the Bolshevik movement in America so systematically that you would not be surprised to see something doing before the year's end, especially in New York City, Rochester, Detroit, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Buffalo and Cleveland?

Mr. REED. No, sir; I never did.

Mr. HUMES. The Foreign League was already in existence?

Mr. REED. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. You never said that?

Mr. REED. No. I can not imagine myself saying these things. Such things are impossible.

Mr. HUMES. You were selected by the Bolshevik government as their consul general in New York, were you not?

Mr. REED. By the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Yes. You were appointed by Trotzky, I believe?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Are you at this time, and have you been since you returned to this country, an official representative of the Bolshevik government in the country?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. HUMES. Are you in communication with the officers of the Bolshevik government?

Mr. REED. Why, I see people that are going abroad sometimes, and I send notes by them.

Mr. HUMES. You keep in communication with them through volunteer couriers?

Mr. REED. No; I have never heard a word, personally, from any of the soviet commissars in the time that I have been here, and I have never sent them a word.

Mr. HUMES. Do you communicate with them through intermediaries?

Mr. REED. No. You mean to say, am I trying to evade your question? No; I am not trying to evade your question. I have sent word to Reinstein several times and I have sent word to Vorovsky, who is in Sweden. I have never sent any other. That has been done through the State Department.

Mr. HUMES. You have never undertaken to represent the soviet government officially in this country?

Mr. REED. No; I never have.

Mr. HUMES. I think that is all.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say you never have represented them?

Mr. REED. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you aware of anyone representing that government in this country?

Mr. REED. No; I am not. Albert Williams has an authorization to open a soviet information bureau.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know who bears the expense of the conducting of that bureau?

Mr. REED. It never has been opened.

Senator WOLCOTT. It never has been opened?

Mr. REED. No money for it.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know whether or not there are any representatives in this country who receive money for the purpose of explaining the soviet government to the people of this country?

Mr. REED. No, I do not; except Nuorteva says that he has received some money that was released by the State Department to him, part of which came from the soviet government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you confining the question to money that comes from Russia? Do you know of anybody who is receiving money in this country from any source—Russian, American, or what not—for the purpose of spreading information about the Soviet government?

Mr. REED. Why, when I go to a meeting I usually charge them a fee, because I have got to live, and that is my only source of income.

I wanted to open a bureau of information, and I went around to some people in New York from whom I thought I might get some money—and I think I may get some money yet—to do it. You know there are some wealthy women in New York who have nothing to do with their money except something like that. [Laughter.] For example, we publish pamphlets, you know. I will get to a fellow that I know, or one or two fellows, and borrow a thousand dollars and get a translation of a Russian pamphlet of a Russian decree, or something of that sort, and publish it, and then we send it all over the United States through the mails and the express and sell it and get the money back from it, and what we get back we put into another pamphlet. But there are no funds back of this business here. There is no money in talking about Russia in this country.

Mr. HUMES. Except as you may be able to persuade some of the bourgeois ladies of New York to assist in the enterprise?

Mr. REED. Well, that does not go to me, anyway.

Mr. HUMES. No; it does not go to you; but for the expense of it?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, compensation for telling the truth about Russia; I believe that is the phrase that describes your talk, is it not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is derived solely and entirely from the fees that you get when you attend meetings—these various meetings; is that correct?

Mr. REED. Yes; or sometimes I write an article and get something for it.

Senator WOLCOTT. A meeting in Yonkers was just mentioned this last week.

Mr. HUMES. Last Sunday night.

Senator WOLCOTT. Under whose auspices was that held?

Mr. REED. That was the local socialist party—an open meeting.

Senator WOLCOTT. They paid you for coming over?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were you at the meeting here in Washington?

Mr. REED. No, I was not. I am considered too disreputable to attend these big meetings. They do not ask me.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why do they consider you disreputable?

Mr. REED. I have been indicted a couple of times. I was indicted quite a long time ago for saying some of the same things that Senator Johnson has since said in the Senate, so that they do not press the indictment.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are the charges, the indictments, still pending?

Mr. REED. Yes; one is in New York. I would be very glad to be tried on that, by the way. I have told the district attorney so, but he does not seem to be anxious.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am going to ask the stenographer to read a question which I asked you awhile ago.

(The stenographer read the question referred to, as follows:)

Senator WOLCOTT. By "revolutionary socialism," I suppose you mean the overthrow of the present—what you call capitalistic—system, by peaceable means?

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, I want to insert in that question the word "legal," so that it will read, "by peaceable and legal means."

Mr. REED. I want to insert in my answer that law is made by people with power always. The Russian soviet government has got laws. It has got 41 volumes of law, some of which I have got here. A contract that is carried out there is carried out by law, and I want to say that really this does not go to the heart of the question, because the law of one generation is not the law of another generation. The Connecticut blue laws which are now on the statute books of that State, and which forbid a man to kiss his wife on Sunday, are not in force.

Senator WOLCOTT. Will you please explain to me? I do not know where your logic is leading you, but tell me how that comes in here?

Mr. REED. I want to say that I suppose what you are trying to—

Senator WOLCOTT. Your mental agility is, I confess, too much for me. I do not know where you are going to.

Mr. REED. I do not mean, Senator Wolcott, to be too mentally agile. What I was trying to say is to say that I think when you put in that word "legal"—

Senator WOLCOTT. I mean, by it, according to the forms of present law.

Mr. REED. According to the forms of present law? Not necessarily the forms of present law, because laws are changed according to the temper of people.

Senator WOLCOTT. You see, you change the laws, under the form of the present law so understood.

Mr. REED. You change the forms of present law, too.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; any new law is a change, but that is legal.

Mr. REED. All that I am trying to lay down is that the form of the laws and the form of the government correspond to the age and the temper of the people and contemporary conditions, just as government expresses the will of the mass of the people—at least democratic government ought to.

Mr. HUMES. You believe that those laws must be enacted in the manner prescribed by the fundamental law?

Mr. REED. Which is the fundamental law?

Mr. HUMES. The Constitution.

Mr. REED. I think the Constitution can be changed, too.

Senator WOLCOTT. For instance, our present law in this country is that a man's property can not be taken away from him by anybody except by the State, and then just compensation must be paid.

Mr. REED. What about the distillers?

Senator WOLCOTT. Just a minute. There you are, flying off on something that I do not want to discuss at all. That is a different issue. You can ask the Supreme Court about that. The distilleries are there. Their property is not taken away from them. They have all still got their distilleries. Their license is taken away from them.

Under the Constitution a man's property can not be taken away from him except by the State, and then it must be upon due compensation. Let us imagine that the people of this country could take over all property of the individual, giving him no compensation for it, and they could do it, peaceably—that is to say, without violence. Do you think they should do it without first having changed the Constitution and determined the legal form of the guaranties with which private property should be safeguarded?

Let me put it this way: With that clause in the Constitution remaining there, do you think that it would be at all proper for the people of this country to take over the property without tendering to the owners anything else?

Mr. REED. It seems to me that that is a hypothetical question, but I will try to answer it. It seems to me that before the people of the United States would do any such thing they would pass an amendment to the Constitution.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is what they should do.

Mr. REED. Abolish the Constitution.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is what they should do. Do you not think that is what they ought to do?

Mr. REED. Of course, what they ought to do—they ought to accomplish a thing with the least change and with the least upsetting of order and with the least inconvenience to people. I think that if the great majority of the people of this country wanted to nationalize land and industry, or something of that sort, and the Constitution for some reason—the machinery of government—could not yield to it, they ought to do it anyway; but I think—of course, I am always in favor of doing it by law when possible. It is only when it is impossible to do it that I am in favor of other methods.

Mr. HUMES. Is there any change in the form of the Government of the United States that can not be accomplished by peaceful means by a majority of the people under the Constitution?

Mr. REED. I do not know. That is something that I am waiting to see.

Mr. HUMES. You do not know?

Mr. REED. I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. You know how the Constitution can be amended, do you?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know of any amendment that could not be made to the Constitution in the manner provided for by its terms?

Mr. REED. Well, of course, it is a great deal a matter of the machinery—the machinery of government.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a matter of votes and not a matter of machinery?

Mr. REED. Votes are a matter of the machinery of government. They are a part of the machinery of government. Of course, I am in favor of doing it; I have tried to tell you people that I do not know what is going to come up in the future. We have got a new world on our shoulders now, and certainly the fathers who drafted the Constitution could not foresee the industrial age, and we can not foresee what is going to follow this; we can not foresee the society which is to follow. The British Government seems to be foreseeing it a little, but we do not here.

Senator WOLCOTT. There is one fundamental idea that the founders of this Government had, and that is that when a man worked and acquired property he should be protected in the possession of it, and that right is guaranteed in the Constitution. Now, the soviet government runs directly counter to that fundamental idea.

Mr. REED. The only reason it does is to carry out that fundamental idea.

Senator WOLCOTT. It destroys that idea. It takes away private ownership.

Mr. REED. It takes away private ownership but not private use. What is the difference? The reason for private ownership is so that a man may use, without being hindered, the results of his labor. That is what the soviet government stands for.

Senator WOLCOTT. The soviet government wants to substitute private use for private ownership? Is that all there is to it? Let a man use forever what he has got instead of owning it?

Mr. REED. What is the difference? I do not understand what is the advantage in his owning anything?

Senator WOLCOTT. Because he always has it and can use it again.

Mr. REED. He can always have the use of it under the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Until he gets old.

Mr. REED. A workingman. You are talking about a workingman now. Until he grows old; yes.

Mr. HUMES. Then he becomes a pensioner of the state?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. He is never allowed to accumulate anything for himself.

Mr. REED. He can accumulate all he pleases during his lifetime.

Mr. HUMES. He can not accumulate a home.

Mr. REED. He is provided with a home. He can accumulate a home and build it just the way he pleases, under the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. On the charity estate.

Mr. REED. Charity? I do not know whether it is charity or not. It is his government. Charity means that somebody else gives something to you; but it is his government.

Mr. HUMES. He is on the charity of the state. When he becomes too old to work he has acquired no right to live on that land during his declining years, has he? But as soon as he is physically unable to work he must give up the land.

Mr. REED. Not exactly.

Mr. HUMES. As soon as he becomes unable to work, himself, he is taken off the land that he has lived on all his life and becomes a pensioner of the state, and his land is turned over to some one else; is not that correct?

Mr. REED. What is the idea of being taken off the land? What does an old man want to live on a lot of land for? He is not taken out of his house. He can pass his declining years in the same house which he has lived in.

Mr. HUMES. If his house happens to be on the land he is working, he is taken off of it, is he not?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir; that is provided for in the land decrees and regulations, that a man who lives and works in a house lives in the house to his death if he pleases.

Mr. HUMES. Can you show me that passage?

Mr. REED. I do not think that I have the land decrees here.

Mr. HUMES. I have.

Mr. REED (continuing). But I have all of them at home. Have you the volost land regulations?

Mr. HUMES. I do not know what you call them, but I have what purports to be a copy of the land regulations.

Mr. REED. How many of them are there?

Senator WOLCOTT. You say that over there a man can not employ anybody to work for him?

Mr. REED. Not on the farms.

Senator WOLCOTT. The American farmer would like that.

Mr. REED. He is allowed as much land as he himself can work, and what the soviet government does is to try to encourage the farmers to farm in communes; say, 30 farmers take 30 allotments of land and work it in common; and they are supplied with grain and with agricultural machinery and everything that is needed, including agricultural instruction. I have here a little decree about the organization, of course, in running tractors.

Senator WOLCOTT. Suppose that a man does not work along all right with the rest; what do they do, put him out?

Mr. REED. The Russian peasants have been working in communes on the Russian landed estates for some centuries, and they know how to manage themselves. If a man does not work in Soviet Russia, he can not eat; that is all there is to that. If there is some reason why he can not work, he is pensioned; but if he will not work—

Senator WOLCOTT. That puts me in mind of where we had a communistic system over here, at Jamestown. Two or three did all the work, and the rest of the bunch were loafers, and Capt. John Smith had to get a gun and go after them.

Mr. REED. It may be true that the Americans are not educated enough so that they will work when they are given an honorable chance, but the Russian people have been doing it for 10 centuries. When the landlord wanted his lands cultivated or his crops brought in, he gave the contract to the village, and he gave 50 per cent of the earnings to the commune which undertook the job. He made a contract with the commune, and the whole village moved out and divided the stuff commonly. The reason for that is, I suppose, that the Russian people have been used to communal life for centuries, and capitalist competition has not come between man and man the way it has here.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was not very elevating for them there.

Mr. REED. That was not what kept them down.

Senator WOLCOTT. At all events it did not bring them up.

Mr. REED. I am not sure that it did not. They are pretty high.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Russian peasant is said to be very illiterate.

Mr. REED. He may be very illiterate.

Mr. HUMES. First, we agree that no hired labor is allowed for the purpose of cultivation of the land. We agree on that, do we not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. I call your attention to the following paragraphs in this land decree [reading]:

In the event of a temporary incapacity of a member of a county community during the course of two years the community shall be bound to render him assistance during this period of time by cultivating his land.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, the law compels the neighbors of the man who is physically incapacitated to cultivate his land. [Reading:]

Agriculturists who in consequence of old age or sickness will have lost the possibility of cultivating their land shall lose the right to use it, and they shall receive instead a pension from the State.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Is there anything there that gives a man a right to use the house in which he lives, and yet deprives him of the right to use the land?

Mr. REED. Let me see what that is you have.

Mr. HUMES (handing paper to the witness). It is marked there. It starts at the bottom of that page and is marked with blue pencil.

Mr. REED (after examining pamphlet). Yes. I translated this decree, by the way. This is our own publication.

Mr. HUMES. Yes. I am glad to know that it is official. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Oh, well, you have got here only—now, I want to point out, in the first place, this [reading]:

For guidance during the realization of the great land reforms till their final resolution by the constituent assembly sgalk serke, the following peasant nakaz (instruction), drawn up on the basis of 242 local peasant nakazes by the editor's office of the Izvestija of the All-Russia Soviet of peasant delegates and published in No. 88 of said Izvestija (Petrograd, No. 88, Aug. 19, 1917).

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. REED. In other words, these instructions, the ones that you have been reading, were drawn up on the basis of 242 villages which filed instructions, and this was drawn up by the soviet peasants' headquarters as the peasants desire.

Mr. HUMES. That shows, then, what elasticity there is in the official documents.

Mr. REED. Let me get along—

Mr. HUMES. Answer my question first, and then explain. That is the rule, as I read it, of the soviet government, is it not?

Mr. REED. Yes.

MR. HUMES. That where a man becomes sick for two years and is unable to work, his land must be worked. His neighbors have got to work it for him gratuitously?

MR. REED. Yes. He is not thrown out in the street.

MR. HUMES. When he becomes too old or from sickness is unable to work his land, he is deprived of the right of use of the land and becomes a pensioner of the state?

MR. REED. Yes.

MR. HUMES. That is correct, is it?

MR. REED. That is correct.

MR. HUMES. Then, as a matter of fact, all persons in old age or in sickness become dependents of the state, do they not?

MR. REED. It is there stated.

MR. HUMES. Yes; and they are not permitted to acquire a homestead in which they can live in their declining years?

MR. REED. If you had had here the other decrees, you know there are eight decrees on the land. One is the instructions for the volost land committee. Another is the regulations for the emissaries to the provinces; and so on. You will find that there is a general decree of commissars of social welfare which ranges from charitable institutions to commissars of agriculture, which settles this question of dwelling places of people who have reached their declining years and become pensioners of the state.

MR. HUMES. Where do they live?

MR. REED. They live in their homesteads where they have worked.

MR. HUMES. Do they have a title to the homestead?

MR. REED. When they die, it passes into—you see, just let me explain about the land. Land is very valuable in Russia. It is very valuable for raising crops. The people need lots of food. It is necessary to raise food; and a lot of people need work and a lot of people need land. All the land is pooled in the general land fund. When a man becomes of age, which is about 16, he is encouraged to go into a commune with others. When he becomes incapacitated permanently for work he withdraws, and his land goes into a general land pool. He occupies his homestead, and it is on the basis of the present houses that are now erected.

MR. HUMES. Is this homestead on the land that he works?

MR. REED. Homesteads are in villages and not on the land, in Russia. The mir has disappeared. The peasant village is a piece of land. It is set apart from the farm land. It has been always, and is at the present time.

MR. HUMES. Is private property recognized in the homesteads?

MR. REED. While a man is alive he has a right to live in his house.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is not that subject to the decision of the commissar, according to that regulation?

MR. REED. In what subject to the decision of the commissar?

Senator WOLCOTT. Whether he shall live in the house?

MR. REED. No; it is not. There is nothing about that at all here.

Senator WOLCOTT. I thought there was a commissar there. Just read that again.

MR. REED (reading):

Agriculturists who in consequence of old age or sickness will have lost the possibility of cultivating their land shall lose the right to use it, and they shall receive instead a pension from the state.

Senator WOLCOTT. You read something in addition to that, did you not?

Mr. REED (continuing reading):

In the event of a temporary incapacity of a member of a county community during the course of two years the community shall be bound to render him assistance during this period of time by cultivating his land.

Mr. HUMES. Did you not read further there?

Mr. REED. No; I did not, here.

Mr. HUMES. I thought you read another clause there besides the one that I read.

Mr. REED. No; I am telling you about this. When a man dies after living in his house all his life, which he is allowed to do, and also when he withdraws from the land itself, if his land is withdrawn from him, he has a right to designate the person who shall have the first preference to that land. He has a right also, on dying, to designate the person who shall have the right to live in his house, as a matter of fact. He has a right to designate the man who shall have first preference, you see.

Mr. HUMES. That is on the theory, then, that the population in these mirs, or whatever you call them by the new name, is always to continue the same, and that an increase in the population is not to make necessary a redistribution of this land, is it not?

Mr. REED. No; not at all. The land is redistributed all the time. The portions of the land probably vary, and when a man becomes incapacitated his land goes back for general distribution again into the land fund.

Mr. HUMES. If he can designate the successor in possession of that land, how can there be a redistribution or a repropotioning of the land? If there is a repropotioning, he is designating the man in possession, is he?

Mr. REED. What difference does it make whether he designates the man to occupy the land or not? The land is allotted on the basis of the amount that a man can work. If he can not work, he can not be designated as the possessor of this land.

Mr. HUMES. But I am not answering a question as to why; I am asking you how it is physically possible to permit the possessor to designate his successor on that land when the natural fluctuations in population will make necessary a reapportioning?

Mr. REED. A reapportionment of the land he can not, of course, go against. For example, when the country becomes so congested as you indicate, that a lot of people will be forced, and the population of the villages is bigger than the land will support, there are several expedients. For instance, emigration is provided for in the first decree.

Mr. HUMES. Emigration is required?

Mr. REED. It is not required.

Mr. HUMES. For instance, when there is not sufficient land for all the population, the state requires them to emigrate to some other locality?

Mr. REED. If you will notice that decree, you will find that the right of emigration is accorded. The Russian people have always been travelers, and they want to emigrate. That is how Siberia was settled.

Mr. HUMES. But it deprives him of the right to select the location of his own home, because if there is not sufficient land there the state can say where he shall live?

Mr. REED. What is the difference? The Middle West is congested, and a lot of people are forced off the land into the cities.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who is going to say who shall leave?

Mr. REED. The community.

Senator WOLCOTT. Would not that be a fine state of affairs?

Mr. REED. Why?

Senator WOLCOTT. I live in Dover, Del., and suppose it got to be such a state of affairs, the population was such, that the community would come to me and say, "Here, Wolcott, you will have to get out. It is up to you to move."

Mr. REED. Well?

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, there would be trouble. They would have to carry me out.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Reed, suppose you lived in one of those villages, and you had a couple of sons—say they were twins——

Mr. REED. Thank you, sir.

Mr. HUMES. And they had reached the age of 16 years on a given date, what disposition would the state make of those sons? If you were physically able to work your own farm, and the time had come for them to have an allotment, and the land in that community had all been apportioned among the people who were living there, what would become of your sons?

Mr. REED. Well, suppose my sons wanted to stay there and work? Of course, the office of the all-Russian peasant soviets in Petrograd and the minister of agriculture keep a regular diagram of the population of the agricultural districts and the distribution of land. When the distribution or apportionment of land becomes so small that a man can not support himself on it in comfort, there are various different methods employed. For example, it is like our Middle West, where the land has all been taken up, and the people move further out. When the land all gets taken up in a certain village, the people move in Russia.

There is another thing, and that is the fact that intensive cultivation, which has never been known in Russia, is being taught now, so the land is practically for the next 100 years inexhaustible, and there is no necessity for talking about the reapportionment or allotment except in a case where a man can not work his allotment.

Senator OVERMAN. They are undertaking to build a permanent state?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. The answer would be this, would it not, that either your sons would have to leave their parents and go into some other locality, or else you and your whole family, if you wanted to live in the same community, in the same village, and continue a reasonable family relation with your children, would have to all leave that locality and go into some other locality in order that those boys of yours could get an allotment of land and earn a livelihood; is not that the answer?

Mr. REED. That is true in the United States at the present day. I could not get a job in my own home town. I had to go to New York.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was a voluntary going on your part, however?

Mr. REED. There has been no compulsion in the present emigration in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Would it be possible to carry that scheme out without ultimately having compulsory emigration?

Mr. REED. I do not know about that. If there is a question of compulsion, I should think that the way it would probably work out would be this, that instead of every peasant having to work 11 hours a day cultivating his lot, they would reduce the hours of labor on a particular allotment, and that sort of thing, if it was in a socialist state. They are reducing the hours of industrial labor in England to six now.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Reed, do you want to say anything further for this record?

Mr. REED. I just want to say that I think it is extremely important that the people who have been in Russia recently and are in favor of the Soviet government be called. I do not mean socialists, but people like Frank Keddie, and people like Raymond Robins, who have been in very close connection with it.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Thompson?

Mr. REED. I should think Col. Thompson would be a very valuable witness.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know where he is?

Mr. REED. I do not know where he is now. I think Maj. Allen Wardwell would be a peach. He is a Wall Street lawyer, the head of the Red Cross, and is a fair man. Maj. Thomas Thacher would be a good one. Then, Jerome B. Davis, one of the heads of the Y. M. C. A. in Russia, would be a very good witness, since he spent almost all of his time around the village districts.

Mr. HUMES. Will you furnish the committee with copies of translations of all of these decrets that have been referred to, in order that we can complete the record? I want to make sure that we have all of these main regulations and all of these other decrets. I do not want to put them in piecemeal.

Mr. REED. I think I can get you all of that. I am not quite sure whether I can get you all the decrets that I have seen.

Mr. HUMES. You can furnish us with all that you can.

Mr. REED. It is quite a long job and quite an expensive job.

Mr. HUMES. I want to know if you have translations of them.

Mr. REED. I have translations of some, but not all of them. I have a great many of them.

Mr. HUMES. If you have not extra copies that you can furnish us in the translation, if you will let us have the original, so that we can translate them, we will return the original to you.

Mr. REED. All right, I think I can get you all that. I will have to go back to New York and gather it up in different places.

Mr. HUMES. Will you do that and send them to me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. There is nothing further you want to say?

Mr. REED. No.

(Thereupon, at 5.55 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Saturday, February 22, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment, in Room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman) and Wolcott.

Senator OVERMAN. The subcommittee will come to order. Call the first witness.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you reside?

Mr. WILLIAMS. New York City.

Mr. HUMES. Where were you born?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Greenwich, Ohio.

Mr. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Lecturer and writer.

Mr. HUMES. Were you formerly in the ministry?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was; yes.

Mr. HUMES. An ordained minister?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. In what denomination?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Congregational.

Senator OVERMAN. You claim to be a minister, do you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you severed your connection with the ministry?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. How did you go about severing it; did you resign?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. Perhaps that is a premature statement. My name, I suppose, still appears upon the book. I left the active ministry about three years ago.

Senator OVERMAN. How did you quit them? Did you write a letter saying you resigned, or did you just quit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just left the church.

Senator OVERMAN. Just left the ministry without any notification at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You mean you left the ministry. You do not mean you left the church, I assume? Did you sever your connection with the church?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am still a member of the church, and I suppose still a member of the ministerial association.

Mr. HUMES. Have you traveled in Europe or been in Europe since the European war started in 1914?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was in Paris at the opening of the great war in 1914.

Mr. HUMES. You were there when the war started, were you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you stay there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. About three months.

Mr. HUMES. Did you go back to the United States then?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you remain in the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Until May, 1917.

Mr. HUMES. Where did you go then?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Direct to Russia.

Mr. HUMES. By what route?

Mr. WILLIAMS. From Stockholm into Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Did you go there on any mission, or just as a lecturer and writer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I went there with credentials from the New York Evening Post.

Mr. HUMES. When did you arrive in Russia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. About June, 1915.

Mr. HUMES. How long did you remain in Russia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Until July, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. July, 1918?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You were there approximately a year, then?

Mr. WILLIAMS. About 14 months.

Mr. HUMES. If you arrived there on the 15th of June and left in July, that would be 13 months, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You left in July, 1918?

Mr. WILLIAMS. 1918.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Williams, will you just state to the committee the condition that you found existing in Russia when you arrived there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I arrived during the Kerensky régime. That was the time of the calling of the first all-Russian congress of Soviets in Petrograd. I stayed in Petrograd about two or three months, getting a little acquainted with the language and the situation, and after that I made a journey to Moscow, and then down into the Ukraine. After that I went down the Volga; after that I went into Finland; after that I went to the Russian front near Riga; then I made several trips to the villages; and after that came out over the Trans-Siberian Railway.

Mr. HUMES. During this trip was that traveling all done during the Kerensky régime?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the first of that trip I covered most of Russia during the Kerensky régime, and then covered some places over again during the Soviet régime.

Mr. HUMES. Just tell us what you saw and what the situation was during the Kerensky régime, so as to distinguish between the things that you saw and observed during that régime and during the Bolsheviki régime. First confine yourself to the Kerensky régime.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On leaving Petrograd for Moscow, first having spent the time in Petrograd. I saw the general increasing disorganization that was going on as the result of the great war and as the result, perhaps, of the change through the first revolution. When I made the trip out into the country I saw the disorganization still further going on. For example, I went out into what is called the Tamboj government, and I saw the peasants there taking over the land of their own free will. In some cases they were burning hay ricks, and sometimes manor houses, and the sky was very often reddened by these burnings.

Mr. HUMES. Where is this Tamboj government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is off near the Volga section.

Mr. HUMES. Near the Volga?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Then I was in some factories, and I saw the effect of the workingmen taking over the factories, in a great many cases making very violent demands for higher and higher wages, in some cases putting out the managers and technicians and botching the machinery and spoiling a great deal of the goods, and then when I was at the front I saw the bad condition among the soldiery. I saw, for example, a great many soldiers barefooted, walking in the freezing mud. I saw a squad of soldiers, for example, falling upon a turnip field and devouring it, because they had no other food; I saw horses that had fallen dead for the lack of food.

Mr. HUMES. When was it that you were at the front? Was it early in your trip, or was it toward the close of the Kerensky régime?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was at the Riga front about the middle of September, 1917, just after the Germans had made their advance through Riga.

Mr. HUMES. Is the weather there such that it commences to freeze in September?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is probably like it is here now.

Mr. HUMES. All right, proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And so I saw that general condition of disintegration going on in Russia on all sides. At the same time I saw in the soviet organizations that were springing up, those that had already sprung up and additional ones that were all the time being organized, a discussion going on as to what the people wanted, and, first of all, I found in some of the—

Senator OVERMAN. Do you speak Russian?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not boast of speaking very much of it, but I can get along ordinarily, and can read ordinary newspapers, because I spent most of my time with the soldiers in the army, the peasants in the villages, and the workmen in the factories. I am measurably equipped with a speaking knowledge of Russian, although I was not adept at it at that particular time.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you have any difficulty understanding it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly, I have a great deal of difficulty in understanding when anything is spoken at all rapidly, but an ordinary conversation I can pick up at the present time, anyhow.

Senator OVERMAN. Do the different provinces all have the same language, or different languages?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose that about 160,000,000 Russians understand the native Russian language, so ordinarily a man can pass through all sections with the one language.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you ever study the language? What language is it really like, or is it similar to any other?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know. I am not much of a linguist. I studied Hebrew for about a year, and perhaps having studied Hebrew a year the Russian was not so very difficult to me. One of the striking facts that you found was that in every soviet that one went to, of which there are probably tens of thousands in Russia, one could always ask for the American, and there was always some man there who had been in America, who came out from the soviet and was able to talk in English.

Senator OVERMAN. You say the language is more like the Hebrew?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is like Hebrew in this respect, it is very difficult.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In these soviet organizations there were becoming stronger and stronger during the summer of 1917; there were certain very clear ideas that began to come out in the minds of people, certain formulated demands.

We have an individualistic idea in regard to the land, but in Russia there is a communistic idea; also there is a difference of feeling about the confiscation of land. It is remarkable that 19 out of 20 of all the Russian people believe that the land never belonged rightfully to the great landlords, and so the cry had always been "The land is God's and the people's." In these soviets this old land cry became formulated in a very definite slogan, which was the first slogan of the soviets, "Land to the people."

Senator OVERMAN. Do you agree with what has been stated here that the Russian people generally, 85 per cent of them, are ignorant like children, and do not know anything except what their rights are, or what they claim to be their rights?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that probably not more than 50 per cent of the Russian people can read and write, but I think that the Russian people have an extraordinary ability to think, and so I was very much impressed by the contact that I had in the villages with their natural soil wisdom.

Senator OVERMAN. I understand that only 85 per cent of them can read and write, and I just wanted to know whether you agreed with that statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Many say 60 or 70 per cent, but since the revolution occurred there have been a great number of people who have learned to read and write, and I was very much impressed when I talked to the peasants—

Senator OVERMAN. They must be a remarkable people to learn in a year to read and write.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think a great many of them have learned to read or write in the army. Of those Russians who can not read at the present time, I think it is not an exaggeration to say that, with the tens of thousands of newspapers that have been opened up, the average Russian has as many solid articles upon economics and politics, sociology and business management read to him, even in the country areas, as the average American. I think that is not an exaggerated statement. But apart from their ability to read and write, I happen to know, for example, a certain man who was a Bolshevik agitator in a little village along the Volga. I heard him speak to a group of peasants for five hours. He was a trusted man, because he was the son of a teacher, and he talked to these peasants, as I say, for five hours with terrific energy. He told me afterwards that he had made, as far as he could see, not a single convert. These old peasants were very judicious in their attitude. They took all of his words, and then they sat down for almost a month at their different meetings talking these things over. At the end of three months this man came back, and he found, as he told me, that probably a third of the peasants had assimilated a great many of the views that he had given them, and they had rejected a great many of the views that he had given them. They had discarded the ideas that they regarded as being nonapplicable to their position, and they had retained those that were applicable to them and which commended themselves to their judgment.

I was much struck by their ability to keep from being carried away by any large and wonderful tales that we came to them, as foreigners, to tell. For instance, as a guest in the house of Ivan Ivanoff, in Spasskoe, I remember boasting about some of the wonders of America. To these peasants, 60 miles back from the Volga, I told about our great skyscrapers towering up to the clouds; of our subways, with trains tearing through the night; of our great white ways, boiling with people. I tried to impress them with our wonderful steel mills, with a thousand triphammers stamping away day and night. They listened intensely. We thought we very much impressed them, but that night we heard Ivan saying to his wife, "Poor fellows. No wonder they are pale. Just to think of being brought up in a country like that."

In other words, in Russia, you have probably heard before this committee, that the people are not entirely mesmerized and obsessed with American institutions. It is not entirely that they fear the things we call evil, but they also fear some of the things that we call good. They take a different attitude. They are not obsessed really by the idea of production. They have not the American idea of spending their energies in getting a living, but rather in living. So even if Russia does not build up industrially like America in a very short time, I do not think it is going to hurt the Russian people, because they are not inclined to put the same valuations upon certain aspects of life that we put upon certain aspects of life.

They regard our life here, for example, where we have slums and palaces, where we have the extremely poor and the extremely rich, and where we have a bitter class war, with a hatred existing between the possessors and the nonpossessors, as most undesirable. They do not like it at all. I was talking, for example, with a man who happens to be a social revolutionist. I asked him why were they not content to stop with their first revolution and be satisfied with making a country like democratic America or democratic France or like England. He said this, "I have lived in England. I know that they have an East End in London and I know they have a West End, and I know that you in America have an East Side in New York and I know that you have a Fifth Avenue." Then he said, "We did not go to our death in the mines and dungeons and out into the waste places of Siberia in order to make here in Russia a civilization which is going to have an East Side and a Fifth Avenue." In other words, there is a natural reaction against what they think are the injustices and the extremities of poverty and wealth which they have in every one of the western countries. For this reason they were not willing to make a revolution and stop it just where we stop all our revolutions—on a political basis. They wanted to go through and make it into a social revolution.

Mr. HUMES. Toward the close of the Kerensky revolution there developed really a state of anarchy, did there not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I said, it was because of this state of anarchy that the Bol-shevik revolution found it possible to take over the government.

The soldiers were throwing down their guns and marching away from the trenches. Y. M. C. A. men have told me that they did that where they never even heard the word Bolsheviki. It was the operation of natural forces that were driving them.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the definition of the word "Bolsheviki"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked a Russian what his definition of the word "Bolsheviki" was, and he said, "It is the shortest cut to socialism." May I just return to this other view?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes. Pardon me for interrupting you. I just wanted to know, for my own satisfaction, what the Russian definition of that word was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will you picture the Russian soldiers in those conditions that everybody admits they were in, and then imagine the representative of the Kerensky government going to one of these soldiers and saying, "Glorious Russian soldier, now for the glory of great Russia we will fight until we take Constantinople." And they said, "We do not want Constantinople. We want peace." And then those Russian soldiers began to think "This Russian government of Kerensky is an imperialistic government. It wants to take other people's land. We do not want other people to take our land, nor are we willing to fight in order to take other people's land." They would say, "our government seems to be just as imperialistic as Germany itself." Then there began to come into the minds of some of the soldiers the idea that the allies themselves had imperialistic designs of taking land and other spoils, as the result of the war.

The same way with the workman. He was seized with this desire. The Kerensky government would not give him what he wanted, which was some control over the factories.

Now, I want you to go back into the psychology of the Russian worker's mind, if possible, and remember that he was told that he was a free man. "A free man," he reasoned "has some control over his life. My life I spend, for the largest part, in the factories.

Therefore, I think I ought to have some control over the factories." Therefore, when the Kerensky government gave him no control over the factories, he, in a very anarchistic way, seized the factories, in many cases, and the result was the destruction of machinery and materials, such as has been told about in those cases. It was the same way with the land. The peasants were taking it over, willy nilly, as they pleased, and the result was confusion, and an added dislocation of industry and political life.

In answer to these demands, of land for the peasants, peace for the people, and factories for the workers, the Kerensky government, with its young and inexperienced ministers, could do nothing at all but say, "Wait until the end of the war," and then after that they said "Wait until the Constituent Assembly;" and month after month passed by, and month by month grew the unrest and the anger of the people, and the people said, "If this weak thing that calls itself a government can do nothing at all, we ourselves are going to do something." We saw this great upheaval of the people desiring to possess themselves of peace and land and factories; what in reality they were doing was bringing Russia to the verge of chaos and anarchy and ruin. I do not think that is an exaggerated picture. What did the Kerensky government do? It sent to them the best people it had, the "grandfather" and the "grandmother" of the people, Tschaikowsky and Breshkovsky, a great and noble spirit. But the government had lost all control over the people and the people's organizations. As Tschaikowsky said, the people had swept way on past him in this great, elemental movement. Then there were two great leaders of the Mensheviks, Tseretelli and Tscheidze.

Tseretelli had just come from his long years' imprisonment in Siberia. He had been the leader of the labor party in the Duma. Both of them had been trusted by the people. They were very eloquent men. They were asked to unloose their eloquence upon the masses, and put a stop to what the Kerensky government said was the insane demands of the masses. They might just as well have unloosed their eloquence at a volcano. Then the Kerensky government issued orders and resolutions. They might as well have issued their orders and resolutions to an earthquake. When the government sent out detachments to put down uprisings these detachments used to go over to the side of the people. And here, in that condition of disintegration and dislocation of industry, you had the Kerensky government, with the ministers falling in and out of office, and the allies trying to keep it alive by hyperdermic injections of threats and promises; but it availed nothing. The Kerensky government in a situation which demanded the strength of a giant was as weak and helpless as a babe.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Kerensky?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not know Kerensky very well. I just met him incidentally. I had no chance to get acquainted with him.

That was the condition, Senator, that prevailed in September and in October of 1917.

I do not pretend to have anything but a viewpoint—a partisan viewpoint, if you please—of the masses of the people with whom I spent my time, just as I believe that the viewpoint that has been generally expressed in this committee is a partisan viewpoint of the people who have lived with those who have lost out in the revolution, because the revolution is a very unfortunate affair for some people, as it is fortunate for others. There are winners and losers—just like in everything else—and the losers suffer a great deal. I am not so devoid of all imagination as not to think of the sufferings of the people who have lived in the roof garden of life and have suddenly had to step out and go to work; and of the sufferings also of people who have been forcibly dispossessed of their property. I know something of the conditions of those people, and I know something of their suffering and dismay. This has been reflected in America by almost every person that has been allowed to speak, because these people have lived with that class—the losers—who are full of anger and resentment, embitterment and rancor.

But, on the other hand, you must know that as there are people who lose out in a revolution there are others who win; and the vast masses of the people are winners in this revolution, and they are just as happy as the others are sad, and they hail the revolution just as gloriously and joyfully as the others condemn it.

I am presenting the partisan viewpoint of the masses of the people toward the revolution and the soviet and the present leaders.

Senator OVERMAN. So you say these men are, speaking from a partisan standpoint, against the Bolsheviki, as you are, speaking from a partisan standpoint, for them; is that the idea?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is a fair statement of the fact. It is simply because I know that every situation has two aspects, and because one side has presented its side and has had every opportunity to present fully its side in the newspapers, on the public forum, in committees, etc., that I have not felt called upon to present that side of the situation. I have felt called upon, out of my own feelings toward the great masses of the people, to try to articulate their viewpoint and their attitude toward the revolution.

Senator WOLCOTT. You would not place—I must call her the “grandmother” of the revolution because I do not remember the name—in the group of partisans against the Bolsheviki, against the soviet that you spoke of, would you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would prefer not to dwell upon her psychology and her mind, because I have every reverence, as everybody has, for her past. I know this, that Madam Breshkovsky loved the peasants and loved Kerensky. Kerensky was the idol of her heart. The soviets came and took the peasants away from her, and then went out and took the government away from Kerensky; and I know that as a human being she can not help being prejudiced by that situation.

Senator WOLCOTT. She undoubtedly speaks as a person who has intense sympathy with the Russian people. That is an element in her psychological make-up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is.

Senator WOLCOTT. She does not speak from the viewpoint of one who has lived in ease and comfort, surrounded with luxuries?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; but this is a very striking point. In the soviet government—I refuse to say that there is a Bolshevik government in Russia; there is a soviet government, which is composed of several political parties, and the latest news that we have is that the present soviet government has not only been joined by Maxim Gorky, the great leader, but also by Martoff, the Menshevik leader, and by men like Tchernoff, the great leader of the social revolutionists, who have gone over to the soviet government and are working in cooperation with Lenine. In the soviet government you will find in every soviet that four out of five of the members of the soviet are young men, 35 or 40 years of age, perhaps 9 out of 10 of them. They are all enthusiasts for this new order of society which they are trying to create, while it happens that most of the opponents of the soviets are very old revolutionists; some of them over 70 years of age. These old revolutionary leaders, who are the heroes of American life and who have done great work in the past, are, after all, the leaders of the past, while the leaders of the present are the younger and more vital forces. I think it is true to state that in the soviets four out of five of the members are under 35 or 40 years of age, and that they are the leaders of the future.

Now, if I may, let me return to the situation in 1917, with these peasants seizing the estates and the workers seizing the factories and the soldiers deserting from the trenches. In this situation there was a group of people that seemed to understand what was going on in Russia, a group of people who had a set of brains; a group of people who understood that for a spontaneous, elemental, deep-running, radical movement only a deep-running, radical program would suffice; a group of people who had the confidence of the masses, and therefore knew how to take these elemental energies and direct them to some constructive purpose; a group of people who understood the people, and therefore to whom the people would listen. And now, in this case, I refer not to the Soviet but to the party of the Bolsheviks. It is not fair to say that they understood the people or that they had the confidence of the people, because they were the people. The Bolshevik party was made up primarily of members of the working classes. It did not have as many educated or members of the intelligentsia as the Menshevik party or the Socialist-revolutionary party. It was primarily the party of the working class, and naturally the working people understood what the working people wanted. The Bolsheviks spoke the people's languages, they thought the people's thoughts, and could articulate the people's ideas.

It happens that the Bolshevik party has among them some of the intelligentsia. We know of such characters here as Lenine and Trotzky, and there are others like Lunacharsky, Kollontay, Tchitcherine, etc.

There was this group of the intelligentsia in this party. They spoke a great many languages, some of them having written anywhere from 3 to 20 volumes on various subjects. They adjudged the situation and adjusted themselves to it. These people had a very sublime faith in the great natural impulses and movement of the people. I think that is a fundamental distinction between the man who is a democrat and the man who is not a democrat. The true democrat is one who trusts in the hearts of the people; that even though at times they are very crass and crude, in general their impulses are directed toward the right goal. I think the Bolshevik intelligentsia in particular had a sublime faith in the people. They believed literally that "the emancipation of the vast masses of workers should come from the workers themselves" and not from some scheme that the intelligentsia, getting together, would rig up out of their minds and superimpose upon the people. I remember a group of workmen from a factory came to Lenin and asked him how to run the factory. He held up his hands and said, "How do I know how to run it? I do not know how to run it. You go and try, and come back and tell me what you did, and then I will try to learn from your blunders and mistakes, and," he added humorously, "will write a book about it."

And then I think that the Bolshevik intelligentsia had a very distinct love for the people. That may be very emotional and sentimental, but there are people who do take a joy in mixing with the multitudes who may be ignorant and sometimes crass, sometimes uncouth, and yet they feel that in them are the real values which come up out of the soil. I met one of these Bolsheviks at Voladarski, who was working about 18 hours a day, and he told me, "I have had more joy working with the people in the last eight months than 40 men ought to have in all their lives."

This Bolshevik intelligentsia was different from the other intelligentsia in this: The others said, "Yes; let the people rule, but let them rule through us." The Bolshevik intelligentsia said, "Let the people rule themselves." The other intelligentsia said, "We know what is good for the people, and therefore we will give it to them." The Bolshevik intelligentsia said, "Let the people find out what they want themselves, and we will try to aid them in gaining their desires."

Then the Bolsheviks said, "This Kerensky government has no force; it has no authority; nobody respects it. The cabinet is a weakling. In the meantime, workmen and peasants, look at the organization that you yourselves have built out of your own consciousness, and that is a living thing." They pointed to the soviet.

Now, it is a remarkable phenomenon in human history that three days after the fall of the first revolution there sprang up in every town, in every village, in every city this new organization called the soviet.

Senator WOLCOTT. What do you mean by "the fall of the first revolution"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean the fall of the Czar in the first revolution in March, 1917. Afterwards came the springing up of these soviets all over the land. I was talking with a commander, who said that his ship was in Italian waters, and that two days after the first revolution his crew organized itself into a soviet which was an exact replica of the soviet that was organized in Petrograd, and they had had no intercommunication and knew little or nothing about the soviets in 1905. It is a phenomenon that, being that far apart, there should spring into being this new government apparatus.

The Czar was dethroned, and the revolution was made, as all revolutions are made, by the hungry masses. From the Viborg section they came out on the streets of Petrograd. They came on despite the Cossack patrols on the Vensky and despite the machine guns of the police. Miliukov, seeing the great throng bearing the red flag, said, "There goes the Russian revolution, and it will be crushed in 15 minutes." But the workmen came on, until their bodies littered the streets of Petrograd. But still they came on, singing and pleading with soldiers and Cossacks until they came over to the people's side and made the revolution. When it was made, then appeared upon the scene other personalities—lawyers, politicians, etc. They said, "Noble workingmen, you go back to the factories; brave soldiers, you go back to the trenches; and glorious peasants, you go back to the land. We are willing to take upon our shoulders the responsibility of making this great government, which is a very difficult task." The Russian people are very tractable and obedient and patient, and they went back. But they are also a very intelligent people, and before they went back they organized themselves into these little groups. Every munition factory sent men they trusted, 1 from every 500 of their members; every glassworks, every brickyard, every shop or mill of any kind did likewise; every teachers' organization was asked to send a teacher, and every engineers' organization to send an engineer, and then they called themselves a soviet. Thus in every soviet there are people who know about the different trades; miners who know about mining and teachers who know about teaching and engineers who know about engineering. They are the best men in their respective trades. They are elected according to groups and occupations, while in all our congressional and administrative bodies they are elected according to geographical districts.

Senator OVERMAN. Do they have one central place where these delegates go?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every town has its soviet building.

Senator OVERMAN. I understand; but do you have any central place where these people in the towns and villages send delegates?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Senator, it is this way: In Vladivostok, in Irkutsk, and in Kiev, according to the size of the district, the district or the city soviet selects a delegate, and he is sent to Moscow, and they have every three months in Moscow an all-Russian congress of soviets, in which there are 1,200 to 1,500 delegates. The last congress I attended there were about 1,400 delegates, of whom, roughly speaking, 800 were of the two sections of Bolsheviks, about 300 left social revolutionists, about 150 Mensheviks, and there were about 100 of some other parties and about 19 anarchists. These delegates were regularly elected and sent to this all-Russian congress of soviets. That congress meets every three months and passes upon all the decrees and orders and all the general laws that have been made by what is called the executive committee. The executive committee is a body that is elected by the soviet congress. It is like our Congress. This central executive committee remains after the all-Russian congress dissolves. The great all-Russian congress keeps in session only 10 days or two weeks, and on dissolving leaves behind this executive committee of 250 members. Then the cabinet or council of people's commissars is responsible to this executive committee, which at any time can appoint and dismiss any of the members of the council of people's commissars. Now, that is roughly a sketch of the soviet form of government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then these people who actually administer the powers of government are the commissars?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are not elected by the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are not elected directly by the people.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are elected by the central executive committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which in turn is elected by the all-Russian congress of soviets?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which in turn is made up of delegates selected by the local soviets?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which, in turn, are elected by the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. So that the rulers of Russia are four times removed from the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is a fair statement. Senator: and I think that is one of the crucial objections to the soviet system, as compared to such a system as, perhaps, we have in America.

Senator WOLCOTT. Under that system the rulers of the country are more removed from the body of the people than the rulers of this country are from the body of the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as the electioneering system is concerned, yes. You must remember that the All-Russian congress of soviets meets every three months and reflects any changes in the masses of the people, and therefore it is possible to withdraw any member at any time. For example, here is an instance—

Senator WOLCOTT. But wait just a minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. The executive council elects these commissars—that is, the rulers; and how often is the executive committee elected?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every time the All-Russian congress of soviets meets it has a right to draw out any of the commissars; so that it is only three months. When it meets every three months it passes on all the laws and all the decrees and matters that have been issued by the central executive committee and by the council of people's commissars; so that at any time it can withdraw any member. A new executive committee is left behind every three months.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; the All-Russian congress of soviets meets every three months; but how often are the members of the executive committee of the All-Russian congress of soviets elected?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are elected every three months. I think, Senator, your statement about the remoteness of these indirect mandates from the people is a fair statement of the situation, and I think it is a valid criticism on a soviet order of government; and that is the only reason that, so far as I am a partisan or making a plea, I would like to see the Russians try out this new kind of state apparatus, and try to perfect it as they can. Perhaps they can work out an organization there that may be better than our organization. Perhaps not. Perhaps it can not be worked out better than our organization. But it is certainly valuable from a laboratory point of view to try out a new order of government which may be more reflective of the wishes of the people and which may be more consistent with the new industrial and economic situation. I think it would, Senator. I do not know. But that is the plea I make for letting Russia alone, to see a test made of a social order different from anything we have elsewhere in the world.

Now, to return, if I may, to those soviets which were growing up in the summer of 1918. They were growing up on every side. The people were learning to speak in them. As Mr. Root has said, "Russia became a nation of 100,000,000 orators," and the floodgates of speech burst around these forums of the people. They learned also at that time to get together and to work together. There were very many tremendous blunders; but out of it all this—a soviet system—was growing up. The local soviets were being slowly linked up together into a vast network spread over the country. And when the Kerensky organization displayed its utter weakness, the only part that the Bolshevik played in this matter was to come to the masses of the people and say, "Here is an organization that has been built out of your own brains, out of your own hearts." They pointed to the soviet. They said, "It has power, it has authority, it has organizing ability, and if you want a government that will give you land and peace, and"—

Senator WOLCOTT. Bread.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "And factories—there it is. It is just a matter of taking it over." In other words, it is true that inside of that old government machine there had grown up an entirely new structure which had the indorsement of the people, which the old governmental machine did not have. And, so, when the so-called Bolshevik revolution occurred, it was very simple. The Bolshevik announced openly in advance that the soviets were going to assume the powers of government; that they were, in fact, the real government of Russia, because there was no other power in that country. They publicly announced the date practically on which they were going to take over the government in Petrograd. It was as simple as that. They went down to the Marensky Palace, where the members of the body calling itself the government of Russia assembled, and they told these people that they must go home, because they did not represent the Russian people. They went to the provisional government, which was in the Winter Palace. They surrounded it and shot one shell into the Winter Palace, and then began shooting blank cartridges. That is the only force they used against the Kerensky government. I think it is fair to say that any government or institution shows its right to live and its claim to life by the number of people who will come to its rescue. We know this, that if the Government of the United States was in danger, uncounted millions, a vast majority of the people, would rally to its rescue, because it has, as a whole, the masses that have that attitude toward it. But in Russia, when the Kerensky government was in danger, the only people who rallied to it were the Women's Battalion, a few junkers, and a few detached Cossack organizations over the country. The so-called Bolshevik revolution was accomplished in Petrograd without the killing of more than 15 or 18 people, and those were mostly Bolshevik themselves, who, standing on the outside of the Winter Palace, were shot by the junkers from the inside. The junkers lost one man, and I believe one of the women of the Women's Battalion fainted.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you mean by "junkers"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Junker" is a word taken from the German, and means the landowner class, the young officers who are the mainstay of the Prussian military machine. So they apply the word to young military officers of Russia who are in training in the schools largely.

Well, may I state here, may I interject here, seeing that you are giving me such a patient hearing, that it was about that time, while it was very quiet in Petrograd, that the report went out that 200 women in the Women's Battalion had been assaulted. It was said that the Bolsheviki had assaulted those women. In the Daily News, which was an English paper, it was asserted over and over again that Gen. Knox, of the British Mission, had gone to Smolny to protest against the assaulting of these 200 women of the battalion, yet when we were detailed by the Duma we went to one of the bitterest anti-soviet person, Madame Tykova, the wife of Harold Williams, and she insisted that the Duma had examined the whole matter. The fact was that these women had been treated with courtesy, and while they had been told to disband and go home no affront had been offered them. I only say that because everywhere in Petrograd the rumor had been to the effect that the Women's Battalion had been assaulted. Therefore when men come to you here from Petrograd and say that some one said this or that, some one reported to him such and such facts, he is repeating those same rumors, those same old tales which we were fed on over and over again, and which in nine cases out of ten we found were untrue. Senators, if I believed one-half of the things that have been said by those who are against this workers' and peasants' government in Russia, if I credited one-half of the brutalities, I would heartily agree that the whole bunch of the Bolsheviks should be hanged. Of course, I know that there were cruelties, brutalities, and horrors, so that I want to use any influence I have against any brutal class war. But, as Ransome has said, if "these men in the soviet fail, they will fail with clean hearts, trying to do the best they could under the terrible circumstances under which they were placed." That November revolution occurred in Petrograd without practically the killing of a single being. At Moscow the taking over of the government by the Soviet was accomplished by the killing of probably in the neighborhood, I should say, of 1,000 people. Some people put it at 2,000. I know that 600 Bolsheviks were killed. In Irkutsk, in Siberia, there was considerable fighting and killing. The city is badly shot up, as were other places throughout the country. But on the whole the assumption of authority over this vast country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the White Sea to the Ukraine, I think, was accomplished without the killing of more than 1 in 5,000, I should say, of the population. And may I add this, that up until June, 1918, when the soviet power had absolute control from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the White Sea to the Ukraine, when there was no rival authority that could challenge the soviet, if you take all of the most exaggerated estimates as to killings, the people lost in the street fighting of Irkutsk and in Kiev, the peasant outbreaks in the villages and the provinces, the number who were killed, if you add that all up and divide it, not into the 3,000,000 of the American Revolution or the 23,000,000 of the French Revolution but the 180,000,000 of the Russian Revolution, you will behold a revolution which was big and tremendous; you might not agree with it, you probably do not, but it was a revolution that was on fundamentally great principles, and it was accomplished without the killing of more than 1, I think, out of 1,000 population, even by the most exaggerated estimates that are given by the opponents of the soviet government. And remember in June, 1918—

Senator OVERMAN. How many do you think the total number killed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You know it is said that there are three kinds of lies—lies, damned lies, and statistics—and I do not dare proffer any exact statistics upon the number that have been killed.

Senator OVERMAN. You can give your own judgment about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My own judgment is—I made a very careful analysis at different times up to June, 1918, which was until the allied intervention—that at the outside there were killed in March in Russia, from March, 1917, to June, 1918, between 40,000 and 50,000 of the population in the revolution, and that occurred in all the open fighting as well as some of the cruel stuff that went on behind doors. In other words, I would be willing to argue with any opponent on the other side that up until June, 1918, after 14 months of the revolution and the establishment of the firm order of the soviet republic, there was not killed more than 1 in 1,000 of the population of Russia.

You know that Mr. Francis boasted that in Vologda, a city of 60,000 population, the whole transfer was made without the killing of a single man.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you ever meet the woman who was the commander of the women's Battalion of Death?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did you know anything about her?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only very vaguely. I have read very little about her. I know one reporter who has been mentioned in this room, Bessie Beatty, who lived with the women's battalion for a short time and knew them very intimately.

Senator WOLCOTT. I have a book, the title of which is "Yashka," written by Maria Botchkareva.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have read some extracts from the book.

Senator WOLCOTT. I have not read all the book, but my eye was arrested by this statement, which she makes as throwing some light on the conditions in Petrograd with respect to the slaying of people. She arrived in Petrograd January 18, 1918. She said this of conditions when she arrived [reading]:

Red terror was rampant in the city. The river was full of corpses of slain and lynched officers. Those who were alive were in an awful condition, in fear of showing themselves in public because of the mob spirit, and therefore on the verge of death from starvation. Even more harrowing was the situation in the country. It was falling into the hands of the enemy so rapidly that some kind of immediate action was imperative.

Now, that statement of hers does not seem to harmonize with what you saw there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely it does not, Senator; and may I only add in reference to that this statement here, which I can make very categorically. I think that book was written by some press agent and not by herself, and was played up to catch the average American.

Senator WOLCOTT. Why do you say you think that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. She can not write English. I think she is an illiterate woman.

Senator WOLCOTT. She could write Russian?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not sure. Of course, she could make those statements. In opposition to those statements about the horrors in Petrograd and Moscow in January, February, March, and April, 1918, there are at least 10 available witnesses who would come here. First of all there were the three women correspondents who were there at this time. Every one of them will tell you that it was as safe to walk the streets of Moscow or Petrograd as it was to walk the streets of Chicago or New York, if, in the wisdom of the committee, you decide to ask men like Maj. Thacher, or Col. Robins, or Yarros, or Humphries of the Y. M. C. A., or any of the men connected with the Friends' Mission, they will make the statement that I am now making—that they saw nothing of these things that this woman says in this book that she saw.

Furthermore, while the subject of violence is up, may I make this statement in reference to the attitude of the workers and peasants? It is said that Buckley said of Edmund Burke, that Burke had so much sympathy for the sufferings—he was referring to the French Revolution when Burke took a stand against the French Revolution—he said that Burke had so much sympathy for the sufferings of the present that he had forgotten the sufferings by which they had been evoked. So I would like to have you get into the background of your minds a picture of what the peasants of Russia had to endure. I would like to take you into Ukraine. As I went there in a zemstvo wagon we came to a little village in the valley, and there about the zemstvo wagon 300 women, 40 old men and boys crowded around, and I asked them how many had heard of George Washington. There was 1. I asked how many had heard of Abraham Lincoln, and there were 5. Two, perhaps, had heard of Kerensky, about 300 of Tolstoi. And then I made a blunder and asked them how many had lost anyone in the great war, and nearly every hand went up before my face, and like a winter wind blowing through the trees there went a moan over that crowd, and I realized the horror that was in their lives. A little boy ran out of the crowd crying, "My brother. They killed my brother." Two old peasants fell upon the wheel of the wagon, and in the passion of their grief shook the wagon. The women wept as I had never seen women weep in my life. Why was there so much grief? Because the village had been stripped bare of the men that had marched away to the front by the millions and now were coming back crippled, eyeless, and armless.

Mr. HUMES. When was this?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the summer of 1917.

Mr. HUMES. Were you talking to them in Russian or in English?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had an interpreter and tried to talk some Russian, too. I want you to bear in mind where these men were. They were in the greatest grave of the world, that ran from Riga to the Black Sea. The peasants marched out with clubs in their hands and were mowed down by the German machine guns. The munitions had been sent and dumped in the snow in Archangel, because cars were scarce, because of the bribery of the old officers, but these same cars were unloaded and reloaded with champagne, Parisian dresses, and sent back to Moscow. In Moscow life was good. In the trenches it was dark and bloody, and in these homes it was bitter. The hearts and arms of the women were aching for the men who never would return. Hold this picture there of this suffering and cruelty as the background of the peasants' and workers' life. You know very well of the thousands of these peasants and workers that came before the Czar and pleaded with him for fair play, and he shot them down in the Winter Palace Square. You know of the thousands who rotted in prison, and the thousands that left their bloodstain in the snows of Siberia. And I have seen, Senator, an old peasant stand up in one of the new soviet schools, and he said, "I can not read what our soviet is trying to tell us in the papers. The old Czar did not want us to read, but to plow, pay our taxes, to go to church, and now our new government is trying to tell us something, but we can not read. The Czar put out our eyes."

You know now that these oppressed people in November, 1917, seized the government, and when they seized their government they seized these tyrants and these murderers, their former oppressors. I wondered how they were going to act toward those who had dealt with them harshly and brutally, and I thought they were going to turn with revenge on them. That is what we would have done in this country. I think we have such passions that if we had been treated that way we would have turned on our oppressors with evil in our hearts. But this is the thing that lifts the soviet idea to a high ethical plane. When they took over the government in 1917 they had these men who had lashed them and jailed them, but the first decree that they issued was the abolition of all capital punishment.

Mr. HUMES. In the March revolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; in the November revolution. It was not a decree about land or peace; it was a decree saying to these old murderers and assassins, these people who had brutalized them all their lives, it was a decree saying that their lives were safe.

Mr. HUMES. Was not capital punishment first abolished by Kerensky?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was first abolished by Kerensky and then it was reintroduced again.

Mr. HUMES. Toward the end of the Kerensky régime?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did the Bolsheviks abolish it—the soviet government abolish it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They abolished it; then it was reintroduced.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to read what this commander of the Death Battalion has in her book regarding the restoration of capital punishment. She says [reading]:

At the same time the picture of those mangled bodies occupied my vision, and the thought rankled in my mind of the treacherous Bolsheviks, who had opposed capital punishment in the war against Germany, but introduced it in a most beastly fashion in the war against their own brothers.

You say they did restore it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; they did.

May I add this word about the red terror of Moscow and Petrograd? May I say that I have not the slightest desire to whitewash the violences of the Russian revolution. I would like people to understand it in all its black and bloody terrors, so that we would use our brains in the modification of our social system in evolution so that we should avoid a repetition of this sort of thing; that we should do it with our brains and with our reason instead of our passions. And so, when talking this way about violences, it is not with the intention of mitigating or minimizing the fact. My only intention is to state as a reporter what I saw there. I know this, that there was no system of red terror in Russia until allied intervention came, until there was unloosed upon the peasants and workers the old Russian monarchists, the old Black Hundred; until the ugly counter-revolution raised its head in the midst of Moscow and Petrograd. With the advent of the white terror, then, and only then, did the workers and peasants strike back with red terror.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I interrupt you and ask you what you mean by the Black Hundred? Others have explained it, but I have forgotten just what they told us.

Senator OVERMAN. That was under the Czar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was under the Czar. They refer to the Black Hundred as the secret police or the gendarmerie. Those men perhaps use it in a narrow sense.

Let me say now that you have been systematically told the horrors of the Red Terror. But there was a gentleman here who said that he had seen both the Red Terror and the White Terror. The White Terror is that which exists in those places where they have overthrown the soviet government. Take the statement of Mr. Ackerman, of the New York Times. In one of his messages he stated this fact, that a train left the Ural Mountains loaded with 2,100 Bolsheviki prisoners, and that they arrived at Nikolsk with 1,300. He asked what had become of the rest, and he stated that the train was without sanitation or provisions, and these men were either starved to death or committed suicide or were shot when they attempted to escape. He said that scores of the victims died in the arms of the American Red Cross workers when they were taken from the train. He said that that was the tragedy of one of several such trains. That crime must be charged against the enemies of the soviet government.

This same correspondent, Ackerman, also states that Kalmikoff was allowed to precede the allies on the trans-Siberian Railway; that he acted in such a ruthless way that the people were too terrorized to gather the corpses of those he had shot down. They were left out on the streets to be torn by the dogs. In Habarovsk 16 soviet teachers who had been teaching the children the new Montessori methods were mowed down by machine guns and the blood of the teachers dyed the flower beds they had made with their pupils.

I have no brief for violence on either side, but I know this, for example, that the minds and the imaginations of the American people have been filled with the stories about five grand dukes who were thrown into a well. It is assumed that the Bolsheviks must have thrown them into the well. Here, on the other hand, are 800 Bolsheviks—and no matter what ideas you may have, Bolsheviks are the working men and women who have paved the streets, who have sowed the corn, and built the houses, and who have mined the coal, and who have engineered the railways. Those are the men who have done that; and, on the other hand, five grand dukes are the men who have all the time fattened upon the blood and the tears of the Russian people. My sympathy is large enough to include every human being in it, but I think that if I have to choose where my sympathies shall go—to those grand dukes on the one side, who have lived all the time upon the blood and the sweat of the Russian people, or, on the other side, to the 800 workmen and peasants—then my sympathies will go out to the workmen and peasants of Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What we want to get at is the facts. Our time is limited.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will go on. I will leave this violence alone. May I make just this statement. I know that we are living in a very passionate time and that it would be difficult for any committee to sit at the time of the French Revolution and pass upon the facts before it when it gets such discrepant facts from different sources; and I realize the difficulties under which you labor. But when you bring before the bar of history the Bolsheviki, charged with red terror, and on the other side the White Guards and Black Hundreds, charged with the white terror, I know that when they raise their hands, the gnarled and toil-stained hands of the peasants and workmen will be very white compared with the hands of these ladies and gentlemen of privilege.

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to know, after the revolution was established, what was the condition as to the reign of terror after the Bolsheviks got control in Petrograd and Moscow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator, I was trying to explain that.

Senator OVERMAN. I see your viewpoint. I have let you go on, and I see your viewpoint exactly, and I believe some of the things you say, but I want to know the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator, the only thing that I have stated in regard to the revolution, as far as concrete figures are concerned, in Petrograd, was that the revolution was accomplished in Petrograd with less than 20 people losing their lives; in Kiev, 2,000; in Moscow, 1,000. Taking the total all through that period of time, from November, 1917 (or even going back to March, 1917), until June, 1918, the total killed in the course of the civil war that was then raging in Russia will not exceed, I think, by the largest estimate, more than 45,000 people, and I think that is a generous estimate.

Senator OVERMAN. That was after the last revolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you exclude the first revolution, probably 35,000.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is, in civil war?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Killings of all sorts. It is a civil war that rages, and the most brutal civil war.

Senator WOLCOTT. You would include in those figures the numbers who were killed after being adjudged guilty of certain crimes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I would include them, certainly; by all means.

Senator OVERMAN. Men who have been thrown in prison and taken out and shot?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I would include them.

Senator OVERMAN. What have you to say to this? It has been alleged that people were starved to death.

Mr. WILLIAMS. People being starved to death in Russia?

Senator OVERMAN. In Petrograd and Moscow, especially?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator, when I went there under the Kerensky régime, conditions were very bad. Conditions as far as food was concerned did not improve under the soviet régime. It was quite difficult to get food. Of course, people who had money could always get what they wanted. I am sorry to say that was true even under the soviet régime. Before the soviet system was fully organized people who had money were able to live pretty well. But the rations were cut down quite generally. Now, I think—

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you going to another subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am just talking on this. I think that part of that was due to the natural disorganization that came from the Bolshevik taking over Russia. But remember that March, 1917, was a hunger revolution, and there was hunger all through the Kerensky régime, and there was hunger when the soviet came on. But the striking fact is that at the present time the soviet does not have to bear the stigma of forcing hunger on the people. The workers and peasants excuse the soviet, because the soviet is able now to "pass the buck." It passes it over to the allies. They placed the blame on the allies for their starvation. I am not saying that they are right in holding the allies guilty for present condition. It may be due to the disorganization and the inefficiency of the soviets, but the Russian masses do not think so, and if the soviet officers are asked now, "Why do we not have rations in Moscow or Petrograd?" they say it is because the allies have cut off the great trans-Siberian crops.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there let me ask you, if you please, is there any such thing as looting, going through the houses and taking food from the people, and valuables?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are taking food and valuables. I think it would be one of the miracles of history if in a revolutionary time there was not a great deal of it.

Senator OVERMAN. I ask you if that is true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is true; only, of course, I know the tales of loot have been tremendously exaggerated. I never saw a specific instance. The only instance I had was when I was looted myself. I left Petrograd in August, 1917, with a suitcase containing, among other things, $80 in gold. Some soldiers stepped on the train and took our suitcases and threw them out of the window. They then got off and rifled them of their contents. They sent our passports back with their respects, saying they had no use for such things.

The consul general in Moscow, Mr. Summers, went into the matter in great detail. I think it is generally stated that the height of the looting and the height of the robbing in Russia was in the last of August and in September, 1917.

Now, as to the lootings that have been rehearsed in this committee. If they are honorable gentlemen and able gentlemen, and they said they really saw what they said, and it is not what some one told them, and it is not pure hearsay, I would believe their stories. On the other hand, we can bring to this committee 15 or 18 Americans who will say that they traveled up and down through Russia during all this time and never saw any instance of looting. And one of the remarkable things is that, of the hundreds and thousands of Americans there, not one was struck by a bullet, very few of them missed a single meal, and most of them, when they "escaped" from Russia, did so on an international sleeper.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were there hundreds of thousands of Americans living in and around Moscow after the embassy left?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am speaking now of the time after the November resolution. I should say hundreds—and there may be thousands—possibly hundreds would be nearer it. From all the news we have about Americans over there, there has not been the killing of a single American, which is rather striking. It would be interesting to get those statistics exactly.

Senator WOLCOTT. There were some, of course, thrown into jail?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. There were a number thrown in jail.

May I return to that question of starvation in Petrograd and in Moscow? You must remember—I do not want anyone to feel that I am picturing the millennium or any happy times. I know they are terrible times, but I know exactly the conditions under which the people are living, and as you are showing a willingness to hear another side of the case, the case for masses of workers and peasants, I wish you would try to recall the handicaps under which the present soviet government is operating. Roubinsky, the great representative of capital said, "Let the bony hand of hunger clutch the people by the throat and bring them to their senses." The capitalists have tried to sabotage all industries, have crippled factories, and have by all sorts of devices broken down the economic organization of the country. There is a man in this country who I know boasted of the sabotaging of a factory organization so that it could not be reorganized for four months.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is that American?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not like to mention him here. I might mention it to you privately. He is a prominent and highly regarded man.

Senator WOLCOTT. But he boasted of it to you in private conversation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it was in a letter. I will tell you privately who he is.

Then another thing that was engineered against the soviet government was this: Its enemies wanted to work for disintegration, and remember the enemies of the soviet government are not hurt as they pretend to be hurt by the disorder in Russia; they are hurt by the order there. They are not hurt by the anarchy, because that is what they desire, but they are hurt by the possibility of the soviet delivering Russia from anarchy. They are not hurt by the failure, but they are hurt by the success of the undertaking. In order to bring disorder and chaos in Russia, one of the things they did in the early days of the revolution was to go down in the wine cellars and open up the liquors to all. When these wine cellars were thrown open they invited in certain soldiers, sailors, the riff-raff and hooligan element.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Williams, would you mind moving your chair over just a little? I like to see the witness when he is testifying.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Thank you, Senator; that is very flattering. I had the idea, from all the things that have been said about me here in Washington, that the committee would want to hang me, not to see me.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you not think that remark is very gratuitous, that the committee wanted to hang you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will withdraw the remark, but I thought that after some of the things that certain people have said about me, that would probably be your attitude of mind. It is just due to the troubled spirit of the time.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you not think that we have treated you fairly? I think that remark of yours is very uncalled for. I do not know what people outside wanted to do.

Senator WOLCOTT. You were not making that remark to cast any reflection on the committee, at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, Senators; not at all.

In these attempted wine pogroms the cellars were opened up, as I said, and the riffraff, rabble, and scum, which probably comes more to the front in a revolution than at any other time, were invited into those wine cellars, and they all got drunk. The idea was to get them to go out and loot, murder, and riot. The soviet government showed its firm hand. It went down into these places with machine guns and with armored cars, and to put a stop to this they turned the cars upon the mob. Of course, it was a very drastic measure, but they finally put a stop to this attempt to make people drunken looters and riotors. They went down into scores of cellars and they smashed all of the wine bottles containing the vintages of hundreds of years. This is a true record of the revolution.

Then you must also remember this, Senators, that when the workmen and the peasants took over the government in Russia the intellectual and educated classes of Russia had the same attitude that so often obtains toward the masses of the poor and disinherited. For example, the intelligensia said, "What can these dark masses do? Nothing. We will bring them to bankruptcy the quicker by refusing to work for them." So a great many of the intelligensia had absolutely nothing to do, in the beginning, with the soviet government, so these poor fellows had to run the telephone exchanges, the banks, etc. They did exactly what you would expect them to do; they bungled things up. They made all sorts of mistakes, but they had tremendous perseverance.

Some very highly educated intelligentsia, as we call them in Russia, did go over to the workers and peasants, and said to the workers and peasants, "During the days of our education you clothed us and fed us and gave us a chance to live. Through you we obtained our education, our skill, and our technique, and now, although we do not altogether agree with you in what you want to do, still we only think it is fair that we should put our brains and our skill at your disposal." I know that in Russia there were thousands of men representing the finest brains and spirit of young Russia who went over to the workers and peasants and in an humble way said, "Well, if this is the thing you want to do we are going to join with you in doing it." For example, in Vladivostok the son of the governor general became a Bolsheviki, and later became the president of the soviet—a very remarkable incident it was. He, with four other students, labored night and day incessantly with the workmen and peasants in that place, until that man became the very idol of all the Russian people in a revolution which is not given to hero worship. He was one of the intelligentsia trying to overcome the handicaps under which the soviet government was working.

Senator OVERMAN. Naturally the intelligentsia, as you call them, would do that, or they would arouse the passions of the soviet against them, would they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Against that viewpoint that has often been expressed in this room, I can only state the words of Maxim Gorky—and whatever may be your judgment of his ethical ideas, the Russian people regard him as a great spiritual leader, and as a man whom they reverence to a great degree. I would like to read for you, if I had the time, but perhaps I better not take it, his last statement in reference to the workmen and peasants of Russia, in which he said unequivocally that he had been the enemy of the soviet government up until very recently. Now he says, "I am still in disagreement with many of its methods of procedure, but I can only state this, that when the historians of the future look back upon this year of the soviet government they will stand amazed and dumbfounded before the creations of the workmen and peasants in the realms of culture and in the realm of art." Were there time, I would like to read you the whole statement. I found in no soviet any discrimination against the intelligentsia, but rather all the time a begging, a feeling and desire that they should come into the soviet and join in the common tasks, together with the peasants and workers.

In November, 1918, there was held in Petrograd a meeting of the intelligentsia, the professional classes of Russia. Maxim Gorky addressed it with a plea that instead of further boycotting the workmen's and peasant's soviet government that the intelligentsia should, on the other hand, offer their brains and skill to the soviet government. But some one in the crowd said, "But, Mr. Gorky, did not this soviet government suppress your paper?" And he very jocularly answered, "Yes, but it ought to have been suppressed." After this appeal of Maxim Gorky to the intelligentsia to go over to the soviets, the soviets have been further equipped and strengthened by great numbers coming from the professional, business, and cultured classes.

Senator OVERMAN. Have they suppressed the newspapers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have suppressed, Senator, a great many of the newspapers, but I will take that up a little bit later and tell you something more about it. I am just trying to get into your mind an idea of the handicaps under which the government has worked. I said, in the first place, that the wine pogroms were directed against them. In the second place, the soviet was sabotaged by all sorts of attempts to bring on hunger, by the flooding of mines, and the breaking down of industry.

These soviets were excommunicated also by the church, and it was excommunicated by the church for the simple reason that the soviet government separated the church and the state, and confiscated some of the great lands and estates that belonged to the monasteries, and put all religions—the Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant—upon the same basis in Russia that they are in America. All religions have equal rights now. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes that attitude of the soviet government in Russia, in that it has for the first time a chance and a certain standing that it never had before. Prominent religious men in America realize that as the soviet government takes that attitude toward all religious organizations, American religious organizations will for the first time have a fair field.

In the old days religion was a monopoly of the state, a Greek Church monopoly. At the present time there is no discrimination made against any religious organization. They were excommunicated by the church primarily because the soviets cut off some of the rich sources of its income.

And, then, everyone knows the story of how it was early guillotined by the Germans; and, then, in addition to that, it has been systematically boycotted and blockaded by the allies, with the French and the British leading in striving to strangle Soviet Russia. The British emissaries and French emissaries all took precisely the same attitude toward Soviet Russia. Then, under the guise of allied diplomatic privilege, in the embassies conspiracies of all kinds were made, particularly by the French and the British, against the soviet government and soviet officials. Yet these people went on, handicapped on every side, and I say that the fact that the soviet government, beset and bedeviled on all sides, exists at all shows its basic strength. At the present time there are two statements that stand out, the one the statement of Maxim Gorky just 10 days ago, when he spoke of the great growing cultural work in Russia, and the other the statement of Lloyd George. Lloyd George says something to this effect, that any man advocating intervention in Russia would be a fool, considering the figures that are involved, because the Bolsheviks have a strong and growing military power. I submit that a strong and growing military power and a strong and growing cultural work can not be based merely upon a state of disorder, of chaos, and of anarchy such as has been depicted by most of the witnesses before the Senate hearing up to this time.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see any German officers around there acting with the Bolsheviks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In Irkutsk, in central Siberia, I will relate the actual contact that I had with the German officers working with the Bolshevik army. The soviet army there had, I think, something like 9,000 troops that were recruited from the Magyars and from the Germans. I remember this, that I stopped off at Irkutsk on May day in 1918, which was a big international holiday. They were holding a large meeting there, and I was asked to address them. I addressed them, saying, "Comrades, how great it is that you are members of this soviet army which some day will be called to fight against the German imperialists." I remember a German officer there taking me to task. He said to me, "I am a loyal internationalist. This army is the army of the soviet government, and we say it is to fight against anyone who is enemy of the soviet government, the English, the French, the Americans, or Germans. Now, the other German officers are all the time saying that this army is only being organized to fight against the Germans and the Austrians, and you have come here and confirmed them in that impression. Now, while it is true that this soviet army will undoubtedly fight against the Germans, because they are the imminent enemies of the soviet government, still it may fight against all the others, and that is what we want to keep in the minds of the German prisoners, that this is a Russian soviet army—an international army—and it is not directed against any one particular nation.”

Now, the only thing that one can vouch for is his own personal experience. I know the soviet fairly well at Petrograd, I know the central soviet at Moscow, I know personally, I should say, something like 30 of the 50 or 60 men that are mentioned in the so-called Sisson documents. In my contacts with these people, and in my contacts with the Vladivostok soviets, which I knew intimately, I never saw the signs of German influence directly, yet I think there is undoubtedly some German influence.

Senator OVERMAN. You stated here you were in the employ of the Bolshevik government. Is that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and if the Senators would care to hear, I have written this out very plainly, and in the most concrete fashion, showing my relations to the soviet government.

Senator OVERMAN. You have no relation with them now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not now.

Senator WOLCOTT. Before you go into that, Mr. Williams, I want to recur to the subject you mentioned during the early part of your testimony, as to the plan of organization of the soviet government. You said it was based on the principle that trades should be represented, rather than geographical divisions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is only true, is it not, in the local soviets?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You mean in a city soviet?

Senator WOLCOTT. Or a village soviet, the first soviet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The first soviet?

Senator WOLCOTT. The first unit. That is true only in the first units, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; primarily in the first unit.

Senator WOLCOTT. When you get up to the top of the system, you are then in the geographical representation, are you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I think that is a fair statement.

Senator WOLCOTT. If I understand it, the local or first soviet is an organization where the trades are represented?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. And they select a delegate to the all-Russian congress of soviets, is that correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is correct.

Senator WOLCOTT. One delegate sits from each soviet?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the point is, you understand, Senator, that Russia is still in revolutionary days. They have only had two years to work on the revolution. There is no final, set, fixed, arbitrary form to the government. You will remember that our Constitution was not adopted until we had been thrashing it out for about 10 or 15 years. The same condition exists over there. They have a constitution, but it is subject to a great many changes; but the last word I have about the situation in Russia just about agrees with your statement of the fact.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, we will say one or more delegates, depending on the size of the local soviets. Now, of course, that one or two or three delegates, as the case may be, who go up to the all-Russian congress of soviets represent only so many trades. If the delegate happens to be a machinist, of course he is not speaking for the peasants or for the railroad men, or what not. He goes up into the all-Russian congress of soviets and then they select the executive council, and therefore when you get up to the top there is not a government which is representative of the trades, but at the top is a government representative of geographical divisions. It must necessarily be so, must it not, because to have all the trades represented in the government at the top you would have to have as many officials there performing various functions as there are trades in the country? It must be, of course, a geographical representation.

MR. WILLIAMS. I think that is a very fair statement of the thing. Of course, with every attempt at government to give the people real, direct control and representation of their interests it always happens that the men who have great intelligence and who have ability and who have energy are the ones who come to the front.

Senator WOLCOTT. That always happens, if you have got a good government, anywhere; but, after all, in its last analysis it is not a government administered by the various trades. It has got to be, in its last analysis, and must necessarily be, a representation of districts.

MR. WILLIAMS. It is very difficult to answer that question finally. For example, in the great central executive committee they have technical experts upon trades and occupations. The whole idea is not to make up a political organization, but a great clearing house for the transaction of business, the transporting of food, etc. Gradually changes will be made in the soviet constitution. It may be that every great organization, like the miners, in Russia will select a delegate or delegates from the general organization of miners and send them directly to the central soviet. There will probably be new adaptations like that. It will be the same with the teachers' and engineers' associations. Instead of passing their delegates all the way up through this long route, it may be he shall be elected direct to the central executive committee. I only suggest there may be such modifications.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is not in sight now, however.

MR. WILLIAMS. No; only I have heard that being broached.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Trotzky personally?

MR. WILLIAMS. I knew Trotzky personally; yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you think of him as a patriot, a man, and a leader of a great revolution for a better government?

MR. WILLIAMS. Well, I had a very interesting experience with Trotzky. I believe absolutely in his moral integrity. One time it was suggested by Raymond Robins that if 100,000 rubles were given to Trotzky at that particular time they might enable him to get a little piece of literature over into the German camps that we wanted to get over. He asked me to approach Trotzky. I did so. Trotzky did not speak English; he speaks German, and so I approached him in my rather fragmentary German, and in talking to him I finally came to the subject of this 100,000 rubles which could be obtained for putting this propaganda over into Germany. As soon as he understood what I was driving at he threw up his hands and led me out into the other room with the intention of arresting me. He said that Raymond Robins and Col. Thompson may have given money to Breshkovskaya to back her organization, but he was not going to allow him to think that every man could be bought in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Williams, you referred to the use of fragmentary German. Were you not educated in a German university?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I graduated from a theological school.

Mr. HUMES. What theological school?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Hartford. I was given a fellowship to study abroad. I studied in Cambridge University for six months, and then I studied in Marburg University and Heidelberg for about six months. I learned enough German to get along.

Mr. HUMES. Did you graduate from that university?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. HUMES. You never got a degree from a German university?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. HUMES. But attended a German university for about six months?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say you attended a theological school in Hartford, Conn.?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. What was it; Trinity?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the Congregational School.

Senator OVERMAN. You say Trotzky did not speak English. He was in this country, was he not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand he can write a little of it, but he speaks French, German, and Russian. Lenine is very adept in the English language and likes to talk it.

I finally convinced Trotzky that I was not trying to bribe him. Later on he was confident that we were not trying to play any double game. He has not the same kind of intellect and same range of mind that Lenine has. Lenine, of course, is undoubtedly the biggest man in Europe to-day. I know Trotzky, and I believe in his absolute moral integrity. He is a great orator with great flexibility and adaptability. There are 8 or 10 men that you can call here who will only confirm what I have stated in these rather simple terms.

Senator OVERMAN. Who employed you, Trotzky or Lenine, or how were you employed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will read you this paper, which will cover the whole case exactly.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it long?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is only three pages, and it will tell you a great deal. It is a very simple statement. [Reading:]

After the signing of the armistice in November, 1918, the commissar of foreign affairs of the Soviet government, Leon Trotsky, addressed an appeal to the tolling masses of Germany to rise in revolution.

The president of the American Red Cross mission in Russia, Raymond Robins, stated that he would give 100,000 rubles for printing that and getting it into German hands. He suggested that I should approach Trotsky. This I did, bringing down upon my head the wrath of Trotsky, who threatened to arrest me as an agent of American capitalism who was trying to bribe him.

Immediately after this incident, however, there was opened up the bureau of international revolutionary propaganda, with an appropriation of 200,000,000 rubles spent upon newspapers, flyers, and pamphlets in the languages of the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires.

The whole theory of Soviet propaganda has been "a relentless war of propaganda against those who wage a relentless war against us." That is the reason that such a ferocious propaganda offensive was waged against Germany. That is why in a milder form it was carried against England and France. But because America did not lead the assault against the Soviet government, it, in turn, has left America out of the attack.

As a matter of fact, 99.9 per cent of all money was concentrated in an assault upon Germany.

I held no official position in this bureau but cooperated in the production of the illustrated paper which explained to the Germans how to make a revolution. Ultimately all this had its effect. Douglas Young, the British consul at Archangel, says: "Bolshevik propaganda had as much to do with the sudden collapse of Germany as our military operations."

For the time being, however, it did not avail to prevent the drive of the German Army upon Petrograd. When this occurred in March, 1918, I joined the army that was being hurriedly recruited to stop this advance. I was then requested to organize a foreign-speaking detachment. A call for all foreigners to join an international legion was sent throughout Russia. This resulting contingent was not strong in numbers, it was strong in moral effect, in making Russians feel that there were some outsiders who were willing to fight with them. Thereafter, most of these people who had been so stridently crying out to the Russians "Kill the Huns," valiantly fled when these Huns came within killing distance. For my many months' service I received 300 rubles—the pay of a regular soldier.

The whole motive of my course of action in Russia was to keep the German Imperialists from destroying the Soviet Republic and strangling the Russian people. I consistently used my energies in fighting them by propaganda, by military means, and by an espionage work against them which I organized in connection with a prominent American official, who can be called before this committee.

Some gentleman has stated here that I had been appointed a representative of the Soviet government. That he had it on the highest authority, authority from a Russian whose name he would not disclose lest he should be killed for it.

This is shrouded with terrible mystery—something which has been everywhere proclaimed openly as a fact. In May, 1918, there sprang up the idea of a Russian Bureau of Public Information in America, on the pattern of the American Bureau of Public Information operating in Russia. I was given credentials for the formation of such a bureau. I presented this matter to Mr. Arthur Bullard, head of the American Bureau in Russia, who said that it would be for the mutual interests of the two countries and he would use his influence for it. These credentials were likewise presented to Mr. Robins. They were shown all along the Trans-Siberian Line from Moscow to Vladivostok. This fact was printed in hundreds of Russian papers. The credentials were presented to the consul at Vladivostok and have passed through the hands of the Naval Intelligence Bureau, the Department of State, and the Department of Justice. The fact of this commission has been printed in scores of papers in America, particularly in the Nation and heralded from a hundred platforms. And yet, now, it is whispered in these chambers as a "dark secret."

When these credentials were given me, by the Soviet government, I was definitely instructed in concurrence with the United States Government, to make it stand clear of any propaganda taint, and that particularly it should not present the claims of any one political party in Russia but should show the Soviets at their work.

Washington was informed that there could be no Russian Soviet information bureau, because that government was not recognized.

Thereupon, I regarded that incident as closed and held my status to be that of an American citizen telling the truth as I saw it. In Russia as I spent my energies in fighting in every way against the German Imperialists, in their efforts to throttle the Russian people and their revolution, so here I have fought every imperialistic design amongst the allies that would throttle the Russian peasants and workers and would turn their natural love for America into hate. To that end I have presented reports to certain members of the State Department, to Justice Brandeis, to Col. House, and through him to the President. I have presented my view of the facts through journals, organizations, and meetings of the middle business and educated class, neglecting the labor and Socialist groups the natural field for the "agitator."

"To the last syllable of recorded time," said Mr. Russell of the Root Mission, "mankind will have cause to regret that the people of America did not understand, the people of Russia during the revolution. It does not promote that understanding to repeat those stories of loot and anarchy and murder, as though that were the chief occupation of the peasant's and worker's government."

My one idea has been to present the positive achievements of that government with the aim of promoting a closer cooperation between America and Russia and an understanding of what has happened in Russia in order that we may avoid the violences and cruelties of a brutal class war here. The American people want to hear this truth and are willing to pay for it. We, who have been fighting for fair play, for the Soviets, have been absolutely without any funds except those supplied by the good will and graces of the American people. The other side seems to have had unlimited funds.

As to the motives and the facts involved in this statement I ask you to call the following witnesses who know of my activities in Russia and America: Col. Raymond Robins; Gregory Yarres, of the Associated Press; Jerome Davis, head of the Y. M. C. A. in Russia for two years; Miss Bessie Bently, editor of McCall's Magazine; Dr. Charles F. Kuntz, Iselin, N. J.; Mr. W. G. Humphries; Maj. Thomas D. Thatcher.

All these people have been in Russia and take the same view of the Soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Did you add Mr. Thompson to the list?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only knew Col. Thompson because he invited me for dinner one time. Outside of that, I knew him very little. These people knew intimately my activities there and my activities here.

Mr. HUMES. You say that the pay you received was the month's pay of a soldier—300 rubles?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. That is the pay of a soldier of the Red Guard, do you mean?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the pay of the soldiers of the Red Army—300 rubles. It may have been raised. There may have been in certain districts, as there are here, changes and modifications in certain districts, but the average pay is 300 rubles.

Mr. HUMES. In what form was that paid to you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was paid in cash—in rubles.

Mr. HUMES. Did you get it in specie, or in paper?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In paper money.

Mr. HUMES. What was the value of that? What was it worth?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think at that time it was worth $30 or $35.

Mr. HUMES. It was worth $30 or $35?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Then, as a matter of fact, the pay of the Russian soldier, while it was 300 rubles in paper money, was in actual value only $30 to $35?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Something like that; yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did you follow the testimony of Mr. Simmons before this committee in which he related his experiences in prison and out?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only very incidentally. The only thing I picked up was this, that he said he had it "on the highest authority"—of course I was very particular about my own relations to the thing—that I had been appointed the representative of the Soviet government, and that he could disclose the name of the man who informed him; but he could only do it in secret, because this man would be probably killed if it was disclosed; and I am just trying to show you—

Mr. HUMES. As a matter of fact, you were a representative of the Bolshevik government or the soviet government, were you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. So that his statement to that effect was correct and his information was correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS. His statement to that effect, so far as anything—

Mr. HUMES. So that the question as to where he got his information is not at all material; the fact remains that you were an officer or employee of the soviet government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely; but what I am trying to do is to bring up the question as to what credence is to be given his other statements about Russia, when he put forward as a great secret a fact which tens of millions of Russians already knew and which was published in the official papers in Moscow and heralded all along the Trans-Siberian Railway. Moreover, this fact was published in the Nation and scores of other American papers. It was proclaimed in advertisements of my meetings and from the platforms where I spoke.

Mr. HUMES. There is no jury system under the soviet government, is there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The first organization of the soviet court system was in the form of a revolutionary tribunal.

Mr. HUMES. A revolutionary tribunal that is more in the nature of a court-martial, as we know it in this country, than of a civil court?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The court, as I knew it, was composed of seven men.

Mr. HUMES. Is it or is it not a fact that men are tried before those revolutionary tribunals without their being present themselves?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that as a fact.

Mr. HUMES. You are not in a position to say that it is not a fact?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not in a position to say it is not a fact.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore, if gentlemen who have testified here say that they have seen that occur under the soviet government, you have no reason to question their statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no reason to question their statement.

Mr. HUMES. What does that court consist of? Does it frequently consist of not more than one man?

Mr. WILLIAMS. All that one can state is what he saw himself. I saw, primarily, the Petrograd revolutionary tribunal, which consisted of seven men. The audience generally participated more or less in that revolutionary tribunal. As far as I have ever heard, up to June, 1918, there was very little criticism of any kind of that revolutionary tribunal.

Allied intervention brought it to the front and made the revolutionary tribunal something very harsh and something dictatorial; something that had many of these evils that no doubt many of these men have attributed to it.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you know Mr. Peters?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I knew Mr. Peters; yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What was his nationality?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was a Lett that had lived in London for a large number of years.

Mr. HUMES. It is also a fact, is it not, that the press that is opposed to the Bolshevik régime has been suppressed in Russia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. All that one can state is up to his own time of his departure.

Mr. HUMES. Had it been suppressed up to the time you left?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Up to the time I left there was a fair circulation of all papers. There were generally, say, three anti-Bolshevik papers to one Bolshevik paper.

I would like to present to the committee, for example, a complete file of a certain paper which was most vitriolic, most venomous, against the Bolsheviks, cartooning and lampooning them in a way that would never be allowed here at different times. I have a complete file of that paper from November 7 to the time I left. This paper never made any revelation of military plans and never called for the violent overturn of the soviet government, and never called for any conspiracies or assassinations of government officials. Because it was making no attacks upon the Bolshevik government, it was not suppressed. I think up to the time I left Russia only those papers were suppressed that were calling for the overthrow of the soviet government or because they were revealing certain military plots and plans.

In Vladivostok, just before I left, before the soviet was overturned, there were six papers there, four of them violently anti-soviet and two of them pro-soviet. I understand also that during the time that the counter-revolution raised its head, with the allies boring in from Archangel and the Germans threatening from the south, and the Cossacks were coming up from the Don and the Czecho-Slovaks coming out of Siberia, there was a much more drastic suppression of the press than I have indicated at the present time.

Mr. HUMES. Yes. The soviet government reserved the right to that option up to the time you left, to suppress any paper that advocated the violent overthrow of the government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think so.

Mr. HUMES. And you recognized that as a proper position for the soviet government to take, did you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I recognize that as a proper position for any government to take.

Mr. HUMES. And you feel that any government has a right to restrict and suppress the press that undertakes to secure the violent overthrow of the government itself, do you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; of course, I do.

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only I hope that even the soviet government, as our government over here, will ultimately be so sure of itself and so certain that it is functioning for the benefit of all humanity that it will have so few enemies that it will give absolutely free speech and free play for everybody.

Mr. HUMES. But you mean free play in the political sense, as distinguished from what we might call direct action or force or violence?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Only what I have seen. Mr. Humes, is this. I would like to have a government so strongly entrenched in the affections of the people and a system of life making it so happy for the vast majority of the people that anyone who asked for a violent overthrow of the government would be simply laughed aside as a fool.

Mr. HUMES. But that situation has not been attained under the soviet government in Russia up to this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Up to this time it has not been; no.

Senator OVERMAN. Would you be in favor of an act of Congress to stop the publication and sending through the mails of propaganda advocating the overthrow of this Government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to think, Senator Overman, of our own country as being free from violent eruption. It is the richest country in the world, with such vast opportunities, with a great educated class to work upon our industrial problems; I would like to have things so arranged that we should feel so sure of ourselves that in this country if anyone talked like that he would seem to the majority of the people to be talking sheer nonsense. In other words, the people of the country would feel that there was so much justice, so much fair play, that they themselves would take care of anyone who talked that way by laughing him down. Moreover, Senator Overman and members of this committee, I am as anxious, and I know that most of the people who call themselves agitators are as anxious, that we should avoid violence and bloodshed and that we should have an orderly transformation into a more decent order of society, as you gentlemen here are. We believe that one should heed the symptoms of a bad industrial disease. The red flag is a symptom, or a violent speech from this or that source is a symptom, or a sudden outbreak here or there is a symptom. Instead of suppressing the symptoms we ought to get down to the root of the disease and try to eradicate it by securing the economic values which are at the base of all these things. If you believe that men have common sanity and common sense and decency I think you would trust to the good will and good nature and to the ultimate solution of the problem in those ways.

Senator OVERMAN. What effect would carrying the red flag have upon the masses of the people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What effect does the red flag have upon the masses of the people?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At the present time, with the connotation the red flag carries in the minds of the people, that has been stirred up on account of the agitation, it has a very exciting effect upon them. The average credulous citizen who walks along the street wants to tear down the flag because it is a symbol to him of everything that is violent and evil and vicious.

Senator OVERMAN. You think that in this country it is a symbol of everything that is evil?

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the contrary. Now, the black flag is supposed to be the flag of anarchy. The red flag is the international flag of all the socialists of all the world. I saw it carried in parades in Norway. It is carried in parades all over England; and in France even before the armistice was signed. I understand that a number of soldiers walked out and met President Wilson carrying the red flag. It is the flag of everything—Senator OVERMAN. You have not answered my question. I understood you to say that in this country it is a symbol of anarchy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; in the minds of certain people who have certain views on it, it does symbolize anarchy and violence, and therefore they are against it. But it is not an emblem of anarchy. The emblem of anarchy is always a black flag. The emblem of the socialists is a red flag.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not the emblem of the I. W. W.?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; it is not the emblem of the I. W. W. as I understand it, though I am not certain here. I understand that it is primarily the emblem of the socialists, as it is the emblem of the international.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not the emblem of the socialist, and is it not an emblem of protest?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; because the Irish protest with a green flag against their oppression, and the anarchists protest with a black flag; and still further, the Harvard boys sometimes protest with a red flag.

Senator WOLCOTT. The fact of the matter is that the red flag is made use of by people with different kinds of views, and to one who knows its significance does not have any definite significance at all times, but it gathers its significance from the nature of the views of the man or of the crowd carrying it; is not that the fact?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, of course.

Senator WOLCOTT. You can conceive of one man carrying a red flag who would be, say, a socialist, and who believed in accomplishing his end by means of a change in constitutional law. Another man might be carrying a red flag who believed in bringing about his ideal order by revolution; and another man might be carrying a red flag who had them both in mind?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, and another man might be just a labor unionist or a Harvard man.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes. It does not have a fixed meaning. It depends on who carries it and what fixed idea the man has in mind who is carrying it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but one thing we ought to bear in mind in considering any legislation at the present time, and I do not think it makes any difference whether the red flag is suppressed in this country by legislation or not, so far as the forward move of the great labor socialist movement is concerned. It has been tried before. For instance, Germany suppressed the red flag, as you know, for a time, and it found out that instead of suppressing the feelings that the red flag symbolized, the feeling of antagonism toward the present order of society, it just made those people more hot in their feeling against society. They found other symbols. They used for a while a red flower; and then the ladies wore red petticoats, and they would lift the petticoat very slightly as they crossed the street before the Prussian gendarmes standing on the street corners. I do not think there is any significance in suppressing those symbols, and particularly when all of Russia and Europe has the right to carry the red flag, and they regard it as an important right.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think you are right, and I expressed that view the other day in a committee meeting. The suppression of a symbol amounts to nothing.

Mr. HUMES. Take those measures by which changes in the form of government can be accomplished; for instance, they might be accomplished in the lawful, or, what we might call the political way, provided for by the terms of the fundamental law, which makes it possible for the people—the majority of the people—to have just that form of government which they desire.

The other method might be by the use of force and violence, and the forcible overthrow of the government. As I understand it, your position is that all changes in the form of the government should, where it is possible under existing laws, be effected in a peaceable way and in the political way provided for by the fundamental law. Is that correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a correct statement; yes, Major.

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve of organizations which seek to accomplish the changes in form that they advocate, by force, as distinguished from politics?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course not; and may I just make this statement—

Mr. HUMES. I would like to have you answer the question, and then make any explanation you please.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. State your question again.

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve of organizations whose purpose it is to secure the changes in the form of government which they seek, by force, and at the same time which refuse to participate in political affairs in an effort to secure the changes which they want, in the peaceful method provided by the fundamental law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state, categorically, I do not approve; and then I will make this statement.

Mr. HUMES. All right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One organization of society in Russia, the soviet organization, grew up inside of the other, old state organization, naturally and automatically. You remember one time Carlyle was told about Margaret Fuller, the American transcendentalist, who was very much worried about the way the universe was running in general. Feeling rather good one day, in a large, generous attitude, she said, "I accept the universe." Carlyle said, "Gad! she'd better!" Now, I accept the universe the way it functions. I would have liked to have seen the revolution come in Russia in an orderly fashion. I know now that it could not have happened in any other way. There were certain great, inherent economic forces—

Mr. HUMES. Just wait a minute. I think you are beside the question.

Under the fundamental law, if there was such a thing under the old régime in Russia, it was not possible for the people to change their form of government in a legal way, was it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore the situation as it existed in Russia was entirely different from the situation as it existed in the United States; is not that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Quite right.

Mr. HUMES. In this country a majority of the people, through legal action, can secure just the form of government that they want, can they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but I have got to modify that, again, before you go ahead.

Mr. HUMES. Well, then, an organization in this country which seeks a change in the form of government, but at the same time refuses to participate in elections, refused to participate in political affairs in an effort to secure those changes in form of government, is seeking forcible overthrow of the government, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And must be disapproved of under your theory of proper procedure in matters of that kind?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. The only thing I would say in addition to that, Major, is this, that if there are large numbers of people who refrain from voting and build up on the inside a great industrial organization—I do not see any signs of it at all here in this country as yet—anything that is similar to the soviet organizations, federations, or groupings of workers, the time may come when, just as a snake sheds its skin and leaves it behind and goes on with a new skin, so we may peacefully pass into a new social order. It is perfectly possible—I do not think it is imminent——

Mr. HUMES. If those soviets grew up until they controlled the majority of the people in this country, one election would accomplish the changes that they were seeking, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the organization known as the I. W. W. is an organization that refuses to participate in political affairs, declines to vote in elections, and advocates change in the form of government which they contend for, by forcible means?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not familiar enough with the I. W. W. to know.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that you, in appealing for support in this country, have appealed for support for the I. W. W. as well as for other organizations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think that has been true; no. As a matter of fact, I have not.

Mr. HUMES. Have you ever, in your public utterances, opposed the methods described by the I. W. W.?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, as far as I understand the I. W. W., that it is for a passive resistance rather than a forcible overthrow of the government; I have not spent much time upon it, and, therefore, I have made no attempt at all——

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve, or have you advocated in your public writings or speeches, the use of sabotage in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, Major, you probably have copies of all those writings and speeches, and you can tell me as well as I can tell you.

Mr. HUMES. You know what your sentiments are on the subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I have not, then. I have not.

Mr. HUMES. Do you approve of sabotage?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. You have to define all those terms—what is sabotage, and all like that. What is commonly known as sabotage I do not approve.

Mr. HUMES. The sense I am using it in is the sense in which it is used by the I. W. W., and you are familiar with their use of the term, I presume.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, enlarge on it a little.

Mr. HUMES. The destruction of property; the interference with production; the interfering with the successful operation of machinery.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Many things in reference to that perhaps you disapprove—things I do not approve or disapprove. I do not disapprove of a hurricane or a volcano, or of the soviets in Russia. I know that those are inevitable things. They are elemental things; tremendous things. If you accept the universe, you have got to accept those things with it.

In the same way I wish for orderly political development in America. I only know that if those things happen, it is not for me to approve or disapprove of them, and if anything like that should ever happen in any way, the thing to do would be to try to guide it into constructive ways. May I simply answer this, Major—

Mr. HUMES. In your public utterances, do you take the position that the end justifies the means?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I have never taken that position.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that the policy of the soviet government in Russia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; of course not. They have tried to use the most decent and the most humane and the most kindly means. These eminent gentlemen of the Red Cross, I have heard, have stated with the greatest anger their feelings of bitterness against the soviet officials for their laxness, because they did not take an iron grip and did not clean out in a more merciless fashion the enemies of the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Have not the leaders of the soviet government taken the position that the end justifies the means?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, every person has something of that sort in the back of his consciousness, but it is not the basis of soviet action. For example, no soviet official, if any other government should come into power, would believe in the assassination of the officials of the new government. They do not believe that the end, destruction of the old order, would justify assassination as a means.

Mr. HUMES. Do not certain groups in the United States, possibly before whom you have been speaking, take the position that the end justifies the means?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, indeed, they do. I spoke to a group—the Philadelphia City Club—and spoke to another club, and there were some gentlemen there that I heard afterwards say, “The only way you can solve that problem is by taking those fellows out and stringing them up to a lamp-post.” And we have in this country a great many people who believe that. The only solution of social problems is to deport them or blot them out by machine guns and by ruthless attitude violating all their constitutional rights. Those are the real anarchists in high places.

Mr. HUMES. Do not the I. W. W.’s as an organization take the position that force is justified and preferable to peaceful and political methods of settling social questions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I told you, Mr. Humes, I am answering you very honestly. I am not aware of a great deal of the I. W. W. propaganda. I understood that they believe more in large passive resistance, strikes, rather than in any forcible action against property.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not true that the more radical socialistic element in this country advocates the same thing?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No man can be a member of the Socialist party who advocates violence and force against organized peaceful methods.

Senator OVERMAN. I agree with what you said about the red flags in many States, but if there is an organization organized for the purpose of overthrowing this Government by force, and their emblem is the red flag, ought that organization, organized for that purpose and carrying that flag to swerve people to that end, ought they to be allowed to carry it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I should think not. I think you should specify in some way.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you think that no organization organized for the purpose of overthrowing the Government by force and violence should be allowed to carry it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is all right, only I think that the Senators have got bigger and vastly more important tasks than legislating against these small and very unimportant organizations of this kind. They can be handled by other means.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there not a possibility—I am not saying a probability—of an organization being formed being very strong, that might organize for that purpose and carry this flag for the purpose instead of the Stars and Stripes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the danger would not be in the flag, or whatever they carried, but the danger would be what they are carrying in their hearts.

May I say in answer to Mr. Humes: He says that in this country we have effective political machinery so that the voters can register at the polls their choice, and when you have 51 per cent of the people representing an idea they have a right to come into office and the right to dictate the form of government that we shall have. In other words, he says that we have a democracy. That is good in theory, but how does it work out in practice? As a matter of practice, it works out this way: The people who have large sums of money have absolute control of the press, they have in a certain degree control of the pulpit, they have in a larger degree the control of legal utterances. In other words, public opinion is made not by a fair exchange of ideas upon the subject, but is made by a small group who wish to superimpose upon the people certain facts and certain ideas and certain attitudes, and so it pours at times a perfect propaganda through all its organized channels and the result is that the people of the country do not have a fair chance to make up their minds.

Now, I am quite in disagreement with the Senators here in this matter. I believe that if the people of America had a fair chance to understand what were the fundamental principles of socialism, the American people, even though they are reared under individualistic traditions, and even though they have a very vigorous feeling of non-interference by the State (although they seem to have easily accepted most of the State centralization these last years), nevertheless, I think the American people as a whole rather than continue the present organization of capitalistic society, I think if they had a fair view of the whole socialistic situation and understood that there was a possibility of organizing industry along cooperative lines, so that there would be no excesses of wealth and poverty, and so that there would be a fair return for everybody, so that we could preserve our cultural and our art and religious life in a fairer and freer form, I believe the vast majority of the people of the country would call themselves

Socialists. But because it is to the interest of a certain small group of people in this country, who have vested interests in large properties and the preservation of the present order of society, those men use all their influence, all their organization, and all their information so as to stir up the minds of the people so that when they come to the polls they vote against socialism simply because they have not had a fair chance to understand what it is. So to that extent, to the extent that the New York Call has a certain repression put upon it by the Postmaster General, to that extent the socialists in New York feel that repression is put upon the expression of public opinion, while expression in regard to public matters of the other great journals is allowed absolute freedom. The tendency of the socialists is this, if they say they will not allow us to have certain halls and a fair circulation of our papers, and will not allow us to express our ideas in public, they then see that there is no chance of doing things by regular orderly political methods, then they will have to use underground channels as that is the only way they can do anything, and then that goes over to wild and violent methods. That is the way you create violence in a country. It is because you repress a fair statement of public opinion on all these subjects.

Senator WOLCOTT. Has the New York Call been restrained at all because of any socialistic ideas it might have? Has there ever been in this country an attempt on the part of the Government officials to suppress the promulgation of the socialist argument?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that the very fact that the New York Call at the present time is suppressed—

Senator WOLCOTT. It is not by reason of its advocacy of socialism?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not understand what other reason there is for its repression, because it happens to be a fairly mild paper. I can not understand why the Postmaster General continues to repress that paper.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am not familiar with the New York Call nor the reasons for any restraint put upon it. In fact, I did not know there was any. I can not think that there is any restraint put upon any newspaper because it chooses to advocate the socialist principles. I can not think that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, Senator, that if you will examine into this case you will find that that is the truth.

Senator WOLCOTT. I know the socialists can circulate pamphlets through the mails. They have been doing it for years and years. I think I received copies of the New York Call before I was elected to the Senate. For quite a time it was advocating socialism, and there was no question of it then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; but there is not a real free expression of ideas now, though things are loosening up.

Senator WOLCOTT. It can not be because of its advocacy of socialism. It must be something else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know of anything else that it could be. I do not think that any member of the organization would allow to appear in the paper any advocacy of violence. Whatever reason for the repression of the paper, to that extent you are creating a grudge.

Senator WOLCOTT. You think that the people do not get to express their real views because their opinion is molded for them by a press which you say is controlled by the capitalists? Now, what does that come to? It comes down to this, does it not, that nevertheless the people are expressing whatever views they entertain, so that they are getting what they want. From your point of view, they are laboring under false impressions, they are wrong in their view, but the fact is, however, that, though they are suffering under what you call wrongs, they do get an expression of their views.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the reason that it is commonly heard said in the radical socialists' circles that we have in this country a government by a plutocracy and not by a democracy. I agree with your statement, and of course you can agree with this statement as being the attitude of the masses of the radical socialists and labor people.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are you through, Mr. Humes?

Mr. HUMES. Yes, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to ask just a question or two. Your work since your return from Russia here has been only for the purpose, as I understand you, of explaining what the soviet government in Russia really is, as you understand it, in the light of your information about it. You have not been writing and speaking for the purpose of advocating the adoption of the soviet government in this country, have you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I have not.

Senator WOLCOTT. There was an impression in my mind that you had been; that your mission, if I may call it such for want of, perhaps, a more accurate word—you understand what I mean by applying the word, however—was to conduct a propaganda here which would be in advocacy of the adoption of this form of government that they have in Russia, the soviet government, and thereby carrying out the international propaganda of that government. Has my understanding been erroneous?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been erroneous. My attitude toward the whole Russian soviet has been this. I do not know, nor do you know, whether it is a successful form of government. It has not had a fair chance, a fair trial. As I pointed out, it has had frightful handicaps under which it has been laboring, and I think the only thing that I have been asking in America is that we understand that it is not merely an orgy of chaos and destruction, but that it is an honest attempt to form a government upon a basis which the people over there seem to be loyal toward, and I have been pleading in America simply that we give the chance to that government to work out its own destiny in its own way. It happens, as a matter of fact, that the soviet government, so far as it has originated in the minds of men, originated in the mind of a certain Daniel De Leon. That is what Lenine says. So far as it has been worked out in advance it has been worked out by an American. The attitude we ought to take is a waiting attitude, and to see whether under it a better form of life and culture and art and of distribution of goods can be worked out than could be worked out over here. I have not the slightest doubt but that, as the Americans want all the best things in the world, if in the course of time the soviet government should prove to have certain advantages over our form of government, we would adopt that form of government, and that we would incorporate those ideas over here, just as I am sure that in the experiment of the soviet government over there, to the extent that it has those weaknesses that you have pointed out in it, it will have to adopt whatever advantages we have under our particular system here.

Senator WOLCOTT. You, however, do not advocate it for America at this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, absolutely not.

Senator WOLCOTT. Because your view is that it is still in the state of experimentation?

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know of an association in this country, an organization, called "The Truth About Russia Committee"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I knew the organization, the Truth About Russia Committee. It existed about three days.

Senator OVERMAN. It has gone?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has gone as a committee. It was simply a group of the liberal people of America who believed that one side of the truth only was being presented in America in reference to the soviet government, and they wanted to give an expression of the truth, of the neglected facts that had not been stated, the constructive facts of the soviet government. For example, even in this place here this morning there has been no time to tell you of what I saw of some of the constructive and creative work which the soviet government has done.

Senator OVERMAN. I thought we had gone into that in Senator Wolcott's examination. You were a member of that committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I was not a member.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the purpose of that committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I have stated, Senator Overman, it consisted of Frank Walsh, Jane Addams, and people of that caliber, who thought that America was getting a one-sided presentation of the facts about Russia, and who wanted to make public the facts of Russia as they were seen by certain groups of people. Fifteen Americans who could appear before you would give an entirely different version of what is happening in Russia from the version that has been given by the 10 or 15 men who have already appeared here.

Senator OVERMAN. So it was not organized for the purpose of getting this Government to adopt that sort of government here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not at all.

Senator OVERMAN. And you are not figuring on that sort of thing?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sure of it. None of my actions during the last six months can be interpreted in that way.

Senator OVERMAN. I will just ask you if it is not true—I do not want to get it from the Department of Justice—I want to ask you whether you engaged in trying to get this sort of government started here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all.

Senator WOLCOTT. Mr. Williams, what I am going to ask you is somewhat irrelevant to the inquiry. You can answer it or not, as you see fit. I am asking it out of curiosity more than anything else. If the soviet government worked out very satisfactorily in Russia, so that you were convinced that it is the best form of government yet invented by man, and thereupon you advocated it for the United States, you would be favorable to the idea that we should adopt it here after the fashion—in the manner—that the Russians adopted it; that is to say, without pursuing our constitutional methods to get it—by confiscation, in other words?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator, that is such a hypothetical question. I know that by the time the soviet government demonstrates itself it will be a number of years, and by that time I shall have grown old and conservative and hardened in my attitude toward life, and probably then I will jump at the idea of a new idea and beat it on the head, just like most people do when they reach a certain stage of life, and I might be such a conservative that I would take that attitude toward this new phenomenon then coming in our country. But I know this, every country will develop out of its economic conditions its own economic solution. This is the attitude of Lenine. Trotzky has a little more the idea of crusading; but Lenine says that every country must work out its problems as dictated by its own life and conditions. Here in this country we may not take a soviet form but a new form. We are changing even the form of our present Government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me suppose that the soviet government in Russia is now demonstrated to be a most excellent thing, that we know it right to-day. I am going to take it that we know, right to-day. Would you, with your present views, favor simply taking away from everybody what we have, nationalizing everything, depriving everyone of individualistic ownership, without any manner of compensation at all, as the Russians did over there? Would you advocate that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; my whole natural attitude is against such an idea as that. For example, I know that in the Civil War there were certain people who advocated redemption of the slaves by purchase. Instead of that there was confiscation of property. It was decided at that time that we must cut out the cancer of slavery from our life. We did not talk about confiscation in a grand manner; we confiscated the slaves of the South; and we were so dead sure—

Senator WOLCOTT. We did not confiscate; we turned them loose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have turned the landlords of Russia loose.

Senator WOLCOTT. Slaves were not confiscated. Ownership was not kept by some one in the slaves. They were liberated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean the ownership or possession of property in those slaves was abolished. We were willing to go on fighting because we deemed that our national destiny demanded it. The Russian people—19 out of 20 of the Russian people—agree that for the fulfillment of their national destiny the landlords' estates should not remain in the old hands and that they should be confiscated without compensation. All the political parties except the cadets hold that.

Senator WOLCOTT. They also hold that view in respect to everything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; most political parties do not. It was the Bolsheviks and the left social revolutionists that held that. Of course, 90 per cent of all property in Russia is landed property, and it is largely a land revolution, and so they felt that the fulfillment of their national destiny required confiscation of land. People felt—even some people who were members of the upper classes—that they must cut the cancer of landlordism out of their national life, and they went and did it. They did not stop until they had killed one in every thousand of their population, but that was a less bloody revolution than the one we had here for the abolition of slavery.

Senator WOLCOTT. Now, I understand you to say that you do not favor that method.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am absolutely against such a method; and I know if things come to an issue in this country the violence of the Russians will look like a tea party compared with the violence that we would have here. Therefore I have been trying to put this thing over to the bourgeois classes and to get them to understand that one can not all the time sit on a volcano and pretend that everything is the best in life. I have been hoping against hope to crush some realities into the minds of the cultured educated classes, realities of the thing that is boiling and seething around them; hoping to crush it into their minds so that they will avoid an explosion and eruption, and work themselves to bring on a new order of society.

I think that instead of the repression of free speech in this country, instead of the repression of newspapers that point to the dangers of this eruption, of this explosion, of this earthquake, we should in the most open fashion call for forums and free expression and free speech in every way. I have such absolute faith in the integrity, the common sense, and the honesty of the mass of the American people, in the fundamental idealism that survives even among the upper classes (which historically have never voluntarily resigned any of their privileges, but have always fought for them) still I have enough faith as an American in the American people so that all the crudities, barbarities, and insanities of the Russian people, not to mention their positive accomplishments, need not be necessary; and if the facts in the case are put up to them, I have no shadow of doubt in my mind but that the American people can avoid all this destruction, all these insanities and brutalities, and work into a new social order. In fact, I believe that we could work for the new social order not by confiscation methods in a wholesale way, but we could do it by the installation of things little by little, bit by bit, or only as a matter of protest, which will reach the consciences of the privileged classes, the educated classes, the ruling classes, in support of what is going on below, and if you can bring it about that this terrorism is not stirred up by a lot of demagogues and agitators—an agitator is a man who is agitated because something has come into his life that has made him mad, because he has had low wages, or been thumped on the head, or something of that sort.

Senator OVERMAN. To that end what do you think ought to be done? What sort of a government ought we to have?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator, we have our present Government, and it is all right. I do not see anything to do except to follow our constitutional dictates as we have to the present time and wipe away some of the unconstitutional laws which violate the fundamental rights—the suppression of public opinion and of freedom of the press.

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to hear what we ought to do to carry out your idea to stop this trouble which you say might come.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that would be formulating a large program of reconstruction and putting it up to me. I should want to have a little time to think it over. You disarm me entirely.

Senator OVERMAN. You have been studying this question for years and are a very intelligent and educated man, and I would like to hear you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you not think that when a man advocates taking away something, he ought to have something to put in its place?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely. Otherwise he is a criminal and a danger to society.

Senator OVERMAN. I thought you had thought it over and knew how to stop this cataclysm from coming.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you think there is any cataclysm coming?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe there is, and inevitably. It is like this, Senator. I believe as you study history you will see that slavery was once the condition of life under which men lived, got their food and their clothes and their culture. It played its rôle in history, and then it gave way to feudalism. Feudalism born of the economic and social exigencies of the Middle Ages had its day, played its part in history; then by the so-called "industrial revolution" gave way to capitalism. Now, capitalism is the present order. Capitalism has built up these wonderful organizations of society. It has created and fertilized the whole world with its vast machinery of production. It has made its contribution to the constructive and creative work of mankind, but now it has created so many problems for its own self, it has piled them up. It has now almost played out its mission in the progress of human society. I know that in some way or other, inevitably, Senators, there must be a transfer to a cooperative order of society. Now, that came by cataclysm in Russia. There was a convergence of conditions that made it inevitable. America may hope that this inevitable transfer to a more cooperative society will be made in such a way as to avoid such a cataclysm. The only way to avoid that is to give people every chance to express their attitude toward these problems. We ought to understand how in America now we have already begun to take on cooperative forms. You have heard the old slogan of government ownership, "let the Nation own the trusts." Then there are industrial organizations. No one can say how it is going to be done in America. The only thing I can state is that I believe in my heart of hearts that it will come freely and constructively if we give each man a free opportunity to discuss what he is doing, what is his grievance, and how he wants to remedy it.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you ever thought in your own mind as to what the end will be?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A system of property where everything produced will not be for private profit but for the public good.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you think that if the State would take over personal and real property and own it, rather than individuals, that would be the better way?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; under the organization of society which the socialists generally project for the future, it is a fundamental doctrine that every man will have much more personal property than under the present situation. He wants production and distribution socialized. He does not want to socialize your hat or your coat. "Socialism," they say, "means dividing up." But you do not go to a school and divide it up, giving to one a brick and another a pencil and another a book, but you cooperate in the use of the school. So in the socialist order of society we will cooperate in the use of the public parks, public schools, public transportation, and so on, and extend those things into larger and larger realms. But we believe that just as soon as you stop this tendency to cooperation and direct all the industrial energies of the nation to the production of more and more goods for private profit, the very purpose of progress is defeated. In the eternal conflicts between the workers demanding more wages and lower hours and the employers fighting them back, most of our national energy is spent between those two conflicting groups not in producing goods but in fighting over the division of the products.

Senator OVERMAN. How about the farms in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I know that in our own country—and Lenine, I understand, has written a treatise upon agricultural conditions in the Middle West, where there is an increasing tendency toward tenant holdings—we are raising up a class of people who are living off of the land without working on the land.

Senator WOLCOTT. The tendency is just the other way in my State. The tenants have become owners much more than they were 15 years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that is true, the stability of the present form of government is guaranteed.

Senator WOLCOTT. I know of a man in my country who started out as a hired hand on the farm by the year at $12 a month and board, who has been a working man all of his days and is a real horny-handed son of toil. By the sweat of his brow he worked and saved and finally got to own a farm, and now he is 55 years of age and he lives in comfortable circumstances. Now, any social order that would take away those fruits of his labor I say would be abominable and fundamentally unjust.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely so, and he would fight it, and all the other men of his kind would fight it, to the last tooth and the last ditch. Of course, the only real, sensible attitude upon the part of wise capitalists is to preserve the present system. I do not want to preserve the present system. I want to transfer it into a socialist order, because I think it is a better order. The men, however, who want to preserve the present system ought to give as large a number of people as possible some interest in preserving the present system by giving them larger property interests.

Senator OVERMAN. We have passed what is known as the farm loan act, which allows these tenants—and they have taken advantage of it in my State—to borrow money at a very low rate of interest to purchase this land; and, owning that land and having worked and paid for it, you would not want to take that land away from them and give it to the State or anybody else?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; but the only point, Senator, is that we sometimes lull ourselves into security because we live among people who are secure and who have a great deal of the privileges of life. We do not realize what is happening below. I think in this country at the present time the number of people who are merely wage earners and have no interest in their job except to get their wages at the end of the week is increasing steadily. I lived for seven years in Boston, very intimately sharing my life with the working people, and I can say this, that I wondered why half of the people continued living on under the conditions in which they were living. It was such unremitting drudgery, such relentless toil, always with the dread fear of want hanging over them, that I wondered why half of them did not go down to the docks and jump off.

Senator WOLCOTT. I used to have such wonder when I lived in a small city, but my wonder did not carry me to the conclusion you reach. I wondered why they did not go out into the country, where they could live in decency and get good, wholesome fresh air and good food and wholesome surroundings instead of huddling in these alleys and such places in the cities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, the Senate should be interested in a great social question like that, a great agrarian problem like that, and talk it over, and try to find some way to make our country a more agricultural country and more productive in many ways. That would be one great contribution toward our own social welfare. But the point that I make is this, that the great social problems of life, the problem of bread and food, the problem of land, the problem of unemployment, all those vital problems we botch and try to patch up in some temporary fashion. We do not try to get at the roots of the matter. The reason why we do not get at the roots of the matter is that there are certain great interests in the country that are blind even to their own welfare, and they do not grasp the situation. They prevent it.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you got a statement that you could put in the record?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could prepare a statement and let you have it.

Senator WOLCOTT. Which do you prefer, Mr. Williams—to resume your oral statement or to complete your statement in writing? Which is your preference?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are you going to continue the hearing to-day?

Senator WOLCOTT. It is Saturday, Mr. Chairman, and I want to leave the city this afternoon to stay over Sunday, but I suggest that Mr. Williams pick his own course. If he wants to continue his oral statement, he can come back at such a time as you indicate; or if he wants to complete it by a written statement, he may do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, perhaps at the request of the Senator, who asked me some pointed questions about reconstruction, etc., it may be that he would be kind enough to let me come on some time next week. I would be glad to come back and make an oral statement, after having time to think these things over, if it is agreeable to you.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to accommodate you as far as I can. I think you have given a very interesting statement here, and I thought probably you could make a short statement. I do not want it too long, because it would encumber the record, but if you could make a statement and carry out that idea, it would have the same effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will you allow me to make an oral explanation with it at the same time?

Senator OVERMAN. I want to close these hearings as soon as possible. The Senate is going to adjourn, as you know, on the 4th of March, but I do not see any possibility of getting in our report by that time.

Senator WOLCOTT. How long do you calculate it would take you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To make my oral statement, you mean?

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; to make your statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. About a couple of hours. I would like to do it some time next week, but I will arrange my time according to the convenience of the committee.

Senator WOLCOTT. Will Monday be time enough?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would prefer Tuesday or Wednesday.

Senator WOLCOTT. The 4th of March is drawing near and things are piling up on us immensely. I just said to Senator Overman that if he were tied up in the Senate on Monday I would try to arrange, if possible, to get here at 2.30 Monday afternoon, and hear you, if no other member of the committee can be here, but if you go until Wednesday every day additional will find this committee piled up with an additional amount of work. So, can you not be here at 2.30 on Monday, and be prepared to go ahead?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Senator OVERMAN. Why would you prefer to make an oral statement instead of putting a written statement in the record?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sometimes you elicit some things that do not come out in a written statement.

Senator OVERMAN. That is where it grows in length, by asking questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will limit it to two hours. May I ask, Senator Overman, if you are going to ask any of these other gentlemen to come here, Mr. Robins, Mr. Thacher; or Miss Beatty?

Senator OVERMAN. We have not determined whom we are going to have next. That is for the committee to decide; it is not for me. We will adjourn now until Monday at 2.30.

(Whereupon, at 1.40 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Monday, February 24, 1919, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to adjournment, in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman) and Wolcott.

Senator OVERMAN. The subcommittee will come to order. Mr. Williams, will you please come forward?

TESTIMONY OF MR. ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. You stated you had something you wanted to say to the committee. You may proceed. I think it was in regard to reconstruction, you said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator Overman, you suggested some ideas about reconstruction that might come out of the committee, but before the little that I have to offer in connection with Russia, I wondered if I could make a few more statements, and then I would explain why I believe these things are of some value.

Senator OVERMAN. Of course you would not repeat any of your former statements?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not to repeat anything that I have said?

Senator OVERMAN. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right.

Mr. HUMES. I think you misunderstood. He said not to repeat.

Senator OVERMAN. I said I hope you will not repeat anything that you have already said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly. It is not worth anything at all unless you believe what I believe myself, and that is, first of all, that the soviet government of Russia has a real basis in the affections and loyalties of the people. May I state, in a preliminary fashion, that I do not pretend to know all the truth about Russia, but only state the truth about Russia as it has come to me—the viewpoint that I have from my personal experiences.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Russia? I have forgotten when you said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I left Vladivostok in July.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Petrograd?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I left central Russia in May.

Senator OVERMAN. May?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. You were in central Russia around Petrograd and Moscow, then, only from November to May, when the soviet government had been established?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, about a year, altogether. From November to May during the soviet government; yes, that is the period.

Briefly, I want to tell why I believe that the soviet government—I see how difficult the committee's viewpoint is, where there is so much conflicting testimony here from people who are apparently honest. For example, there are four distinct groups of men who may come before this committee, who would tell you that the soviet government has been and is trying to preserve law and order; that it is based upon the affections of the vast masses of the Russian people; that it is distinctly anti-German, and that it tried to be favorable to the allies. Yet here are other people who come here and say a great many contrary things. They picture Russia as one grand conflagration of loot, murder, and anarchy.

I think the trouble, if I may say it, in regard to these latter witnesses is this, that, first of all, the trouble with them is the trouble that Burke had when he turned so ferociously against the French revolution. As I said the other day, Buckle said of Burke: "His sympathy with the present sufferings were so intense that they blotted out all memory of the suffering by which they had been evoked."

The second reason I think these witnesses play up all this terrible chaos, disorder, and massacre in Russia is because I believe that just as with war, so with revolution, some people suffer from fear and from lack of food, and scientists aver that in these circumstances a certain toxin enters into the blood, and that toxin registers itself in the mind. These witnesses consequently saw things in a distorted fashion, and they now tell them in a distorted way.

In the third place, I think the trouble with these witnesses is that they take particulars and then generalize in the largest manner from them. For example, when it is said that the soviet of Vladimir has nationalized women, one must listen to that and read it and for the time being regard it as the edict of that soviet, if a man presents it here as such. But I ask you to remember that there are tens of thousands of soviets in Russia. Now, would it be a fair example to take the fact that there are polygamists in Utah and say that all Americans are polygamists? Is it fair to take one soviet out of tens of thousands, or even two or three soviets, who during this period of revolutionary change, or at a certain time when a certain faction was in control, issued a certain decree, and then generalize from that and say that that is the general standpoint of the government of soviets in Russia at the present time?

Mr. HUMES. In that connection, then, we understand you to say that each one of these soviets is a law unto itself, and each can make its own laws and its own regulations, and the soviet in one district could nationalize women and in another district could repudiate the nationalization of women; is that correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I do not believe for a moment, Mr. Humes, that any soviet would be able to maintain its connection with the central soviet, which tried to put into operation any such decree as that.

Mr. HUMES. I only used the nationalization of women as an illustration. Is the conclusion that we draw from your statement correct, that each one of these soviets, within its own territory or within its own sphere, is a law unto itself?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the point is that no one can make an exact, final statement as to the exact situation in Russia, because it is changing during the revolutionary days. As Lenine has very often said, men will make further advances and go through a larger cycle of progress and change in one week than they do ordinarily in a year or 10 years. At certain times certain district soviets have been very strong and have asserted their power in a way which is in violation of the general central soviet.

I know, for example, of a soviet in Siberia which would not allow certain things to pass through its jurisdiction from any other soviet, which was in absolute violation of the general laws of the country. Such instances do occur.

At the present time the attack that is being made upon the Moscow central government is that it is becoming too centralized, too disciplined, too drastic, in its authority. That is the reason we see a fellow like Robert Minor coming out of Russia disgusted with the whole scheme and saying it is a country run by a strong centralized government.

Mr. HUMES. Then the soviet government, according to the information you have, has become a rather highly centralized government at the present time, has it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, from the last reports that we read—those remarkable reports from the New York World—it would seem that it has swung over in that direction very strongly.

Mr. HUMES. That would be compatible with the view that it is a dictatorship, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; certainly—a centralized government.

Mr. HUMES. It is no more highly centralized government than a dictatorship, is it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Quite so; that is a perfectly legitimate question, so far as Russia is concerned. No one can answer it categorically yes or no. There is strife between the local governments, the rights of the individual states, and the rights of the central government. The attacks which seem to be leveled at the Moscow government now on the part of certain anarchists and others is that the present soviet government, as I said, is becoming altogether too centralized, too strong.

I return to the idea that we should not generalize from certain particulars. You know very well, Senators, that one could go and read the newspaper accounts for a month in America, and if he compiled the number of lynchings, the number of robberies, the number of murders, the number of railroad wrecks, and played all of that sort of thing up in the people's imagination, they would have a terrible picture of the conditions. That would not be a true picture of America. So it is not a true picture of Russia simply to play up all those evils that are being played up all the time.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, in regard to the soviets, do you think any great portion of the people of Russia are in favor of Bolshevism?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I believe that the soviet is the desire of the Russian people's hearts. It has lasted 15 months, when the prophets originally said it would last three days, and then three weeks, and then three months. The fact is that it is stronger than ever to-day. Lloyd-George said it is ruthless, but you have to admit that it is efficient.

Senator OVERMAN. And that is true; but the question I asked you was whether you thought the majority of the Russian people, regardless of the soviets, believed in Bolshevism.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In answer to that I can point to the elections. Under the soviet rule about 90 per cent of the people over 18 years of age—men and women—can vote. In those elections under the soviet system they seem to vote for the soviet form of government. The answer is made to that, "Yes; but these elections are not fair elections: they are held by certain forces; they are held under intimidation." I do not believe it is true to any extent. The only effective answer I can make is this. In Vladivostok the soviet government was destroyed by the Czecho-Slovaks, with the Japanese and English cooperating. A month later they proclaimed an election in that city, and they said, "Now that all of these tyrants are in jail, and now that all of these dictators are put away, we will have a fair election." There were 17 political parties on the ballots. Some one has said where there are three Russians in a room there are four political parties. They have a genius for politics and kindred problems. Vladivostok was not a soviet city. Bolshevism did not have any strong hold on the city, because it was an upper-class city. But when they counted these tickets they found that ticket No. 17, which was the Bolshevik number, had more votes than all the other 16 put together. I do not think, Senator, it was because the people of Vladivostok were altogether Bolsheviks; I do not think they were. I think they voted to register their feeling against allied intervention that had happened. In the second place, martyrs had been made out of the Bolsheviks. The Russian heart always goes out toward a martyr. Now, this is a concrete instance of an election held not under soviet auspices.

Mr. HUMES. Right there, Mr. Williams, let me ask you, is it not a fact that in that election a comparatively small percentage of the electorate actually participated in the election?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not sure as to the exact number. Vladivostok is not a large city, but I could give you in round figures the statistics in thousands.

Mr. HUMES. There were about 12,000 votes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Twelve thousand Bolshevik votes—about 5,000 for the moderate socialist ticket and about 4,000 for the cadets. It is a city of about 75,000.

Mr. HUMES. In a city of 75,000 there would be more than 50,000 voters, would there not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not sure, under these circumstances, because it was a city—

Mr. HUMES. If all persons over 18 years of age are voters, then the rule is the same as it is in this country, where the vote is one in five; but there everyone over 18 years of age is entitled to the ballot?

Senator WOLCOTT. And, furthermore, the women voted there, too, did they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose they did; yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. There certainly would be at least 50,000 qualified voters.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, we do not know why there were not more voters. We simply know this, that there was an election while the allied troops were in occupation. The Bolshevik leaders were all in jail and their papers were suppressed. We know that the fight which was waged with ferocious combat was regarded as a conflict between the socialist bloc and the cadets. They never regarded the Bolsheviks as having a ghost of a chance; yet the people rose up, and when the votes were counted the Bolsheviks received more than all the rest together.

Let me add this much more, Senator Overman, that a Canadian officer who returned from Omsk something like six weeks ago has recently said that in the city of Omsk, with a population of 200,000, he believes that 75 per cent of the people now are Bolsheviks. Mr. Ackerman stated that all through Siberia the people are talking all the time about Bolshevism.

Senator WOLCOTT. On the other hand, we have had witnesses here who have recently come out of Russia, some of them as late as possibly last November, that only put the number of Bolsheviks at 3 per cent, was it not?

Mr. HUMES. Five per cent.

Senator WOLCOTT. Five per cent. So there you are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is easy to make an estimate. All you can do is to make certain statements about certain things which happened. Here is one very positive thing. There were something like 12,000,000 soldiers that returned from the front. Half of them—more than half of them—brought their guns back with them. That gives you six or eight million guns in Russia. Now, if there were any wide or deep antagonism to the soviet government—and of course there is some, but if there were any wide and deep antagonism to the soviet—I believe that these guns would have rallied around those forces that were going to strike down the soviet. But they never did. Every time the soviet has been threatened these millions of guns and bayonets rose up for the protection of the soviet. The answer that is made to that by the opponents is that all the machine guns are in the hands of the Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. And all the ammunition?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ammunition, etc.

Senator WOLCOTT. Because a gun is no use without ammunition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is perfectly evident that we have in Russia four or five good nuclei for the anti-soviet forces to organize out of. For example, we have the nucleus in Archangel, where we threw in about 20,000 troops, about 5,000 Americans and a certain amount of French and Italians and Serbians. The report that comes from there—and it is a very definite report, too, Senators—is that only 1,200 Russians have rallied to the thousands and tens of thousands of allied troops. The British sent over there something like 700 or 800 officers to train them, but they only had about one man apiece to train; and the Detroit Free Press publishes an article from a soldier in that allied contingent—

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not want to seem to suggest that you restrain that and bring your testimony within the limits, but do you not think it is going a little far to haul an article out of the Free Press? If you want to do it, you may do it, however.

MR. WILLIAMS. This will show how willing the people are to fight against the soviet organization. This is from the Chicago Tribune correspondent. This is the last thing [reading]:

First. The North Russia allied expedition has developed into a pitifnl failure. It has failed to inspire confidence and loyalty and give real assistance to Russia. It has become a cesspool of jealousy, hatred, mistakes, and shattered illusions. The different allies distrust one another and the Russians distrust the entire system.

Second. The American troops were put under an absolute imperialistic command, being handled in a way that was against every tradition of the Army and country. They were put to doing a King's business and to do whatever task was assigned to them by the British. American men and their ideals of right and fairness were entirely submerged through the un-American leadership.

Third. The entire expedition suffered from a complete lack of spiritual leadership. Instead of being an ordinary soldier's job, this expedition required sympathetic understanding. It always has been more political than military. The original leaders thought themselves to be great soldiers and great diplomats, but they proved to be neither.

Fourth. The expedition has lacked spiritual significance. Europe's war-tired men, sent here from the French battlefields, failed to appreciate the great revolution or sympathize with the unrest and the new birth that Russia is going through. Most of the allied soldiers, especially since the signing of the armistice, hated the job, despite the Russians, and have no concern with the future of the country. The expedition, lacking this spiritual significance in men's minds, has become a mere fighting job to collect Russia's debt to Europe.

Fifth. There is no enthusiasm even among the intelligent Russians in the north to assist the allies and fight the Bolsheviki. Everywhere there is a growing disgust against the expedition, especially against the British.

Sixth. The beautiful faith of the Russians for America is breaking under the manhandling by our forces under the foreign command. The American forces have been led by an American colonel when they should have had a major general. Within our own forces we lacked the right leadership, permitting the Americans to be placed under the limited control of foreigners.

I have come out of Russia to write this. The censorship that has crawled back into its hole in most of the world still wears the iron heel of war days in the north. The American public has been fed pretty stories of the gentle glories of this "help-Russia" expedition, but the facts are that a mess has been stewed and has been kept for the cooks themselves.

America, whose ideals of honor are at stake and whose sons are being sacrificed, has the right to know the facts. In North Russia the expedition has become a dismal comic opera. Here in the north, in a district that never was violently Bolshevik, where the allies had many friends at the start, and where, since the first days there have been unlimited opportunities to advance confidences and gain respect, here with everything their own way, the allies have failed utterly.

Senator OVERMAN. Who is that from?

MR. WILLIAMS. I think this was incorporated in the Congressional Record the other day. It is from the Chicago Tribune correspondent. I have a complete copy of it here.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he in Russia—this correspondent?

MR. WILLIAMS. This is the last thing out, about seven days ago. He got it through the censor for some reason or other.

I will have to go a little further, and then I will drop this subject. We have gone into Siberia; we have given the anti-soviet forces there something like 75,000 Czecho-Slavs; we have given them 60,000 Japanese troops. It is true that 40,000 of those were reserves and were not actually used, but they are there. We have given contingents of English, French, Italian, and American troops. What is the net result to Siberia? Siberia is a country of 16,000,000 toilers. The net result is that after the enemies of the soviets had been given every opportunity—moral, economical, social, and otherwise—the fact is that none of the governments that have been organized could last a day after the allied troops were withdrawn. Immediately new soviets would come into power.

Senator WOLCOTT. This is a prediction of yours?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. The soviet enemies are crying for more allied troops, and not to withdraw the ones we have at present.

Senator WOLCOTT. But your assertion is that if these allied troops were withdrawn the government could not continue; that is your opinion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is my opinion, based on statements of correspondents that have come out of Russia, and it is based on the fact that there is a letter going through this country now from an English attaché in which he says, "For heaven's sake recognize the soviet government, because there is no other government in Russia possible."

Mr. HUMES. You have given us a whole lot of figures about the numbers of the military forces. How many troops did you say the English have there? Was it 20,000 English?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think I said 20,000.

Mr. HUMES. How many have the French?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know. I said about 7,000 Americans.

Mr. HUMES. About 7,000 Americans. How many troops in all? That would make 27,000 troops.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there were about twenty-five to thirty thousand allied troops.

Mr. HUMES. Twenty-five to thirty thousand. Would that include the English and the Americans?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Those are the only official figures I have ever seen.

Mr. HUMES. Now, you say there are 70,000 Czecho-Slovaks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is estimated, from 50,000 to 100,000.

Mr. HUMES. As a matter of fact, there are not to exceed 50,000, are there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, some have put it as high as 200,000.

Mr. HUMES. The Czecho-Slovaks have occupied a position of absolute neutrality in Siberia, in an effort to get out of Siberia, in an effort to get over to the French front, have they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a debatable question. The point is that 50,000 troops have been working against the soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that they have preserved absolute neutrality and have conformed in every way that they could to the soviet decrees, wherever there was a soviet and wherever the Bolshevik government was in control? Is not that a fact?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, it is not a fact. It is a fact at the present moment that they are not fighting. But when the friction arose between themselves and the soviet, they turned into an army that destroyed the soviets throughout Siberia. As a matter of fact, the Czecho-Slovaks have lost thousands and thousands of their finest soldiers.

Mr. HUMES. However, they made an effort to maintain absolute neutrality, and as evidence of good faith they permitted themselves to be disarmed when traveling over the Siberian Railroad—turned over their arms to the Bolshevik government. Did they not do that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see any point in discussing the Czecho-Slovaks.

Mr. HUMES. Did they not do that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I regard the Czecho-Slovaks as having fallen into the hands of the French military authorities, who strung them out along the Siberian Railroad and then engineered friction between them and the soviet government. They got the Magyar troops to fire on the Czecho-Slovaks, who naturally became incensed and went through Siberia destroying all the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. You have stated that as a conclusion. Do you mean to state it as an absolute fact that it was not the purpose of the Czecho-Slovak troops to preserve absolute neutrality when they were going through Siberia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe that the intention of the Czecho-Slovak troops when they started through Siberia was to preserve neutrality and to take the correct attitude toward the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. Did they do anything except to defend themselves, if they took any action whatever?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only know what I saw and what the leaders of the Czecho-Slovaks have told me.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know, or is it simply speculation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not speculation at all, but the proof of it would take too long a time.

Mr. HUMES. Are you passing that on as fact or as your own opinion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I saw in Vladivostok 15,000 Czecho-Slavs go into action, and I knew all about the telegraphic communications from the central part of Siberia assuring egress from Siberia for the Czecho-Slovaks.

Mr. HUMES. That was while they were protecting their military stores, was it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were supposed to be going out to the French front.

Mr. HUMES. So much for that. We started to arrive at the numerical strength. How many American troops did you say there were in Siberia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. About 5,000.

Senator WOLCOTT. I thought you said 7,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Possibly 7,000.

Mr. HUMES. How many Japanese troops?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The reports that we had were that there were 65,000 troops and 45,000 used as reserves.

Mr. HUMES. At what time did you have these reports?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Those were the last reports as to the number of the Japanese.

Mr. HUMES. When was that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Up until about two months ago we had a notice that there were 45,000 reserve troops.

Senator WOLCOTT. How did you learn that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was published in the Times.

Senator WOLCOTT. Through the press, you mean?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Times correspondent.

Mr. HUMES. What other troops were in the interior?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Besides the Japanese, the Americans, and Czechoslovaks among the foreign troops were some Italians—a very few—and a small contingent of French. What others, I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that there was only one regiment of Americans in Siberia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What is the numerical strength of the regiment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I do not know whether it was a whole regiment or two or three. I know it is asserted that there were between 5,000 and 7,000 Americans.

Mr. HUMES. Where is that assertion made, now, Mr. Williams?

Mr. WILLIAMS. New York Times.

Mr. HUMES. New York Times?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When was that assertion made?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will be glad——

Mr. HUMES. It is not the periodical, but who is the authority for the statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The correspondent of the Times.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that it has been repeatedly stated by the Government that all the troops that went to Siberia were a regiment that went from Manila?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I have heard it stated that there were as many as 16,000, but from the figures I have seen it was about 7,000 or 5,000.

Mr. HUMES. Are you no more sure of the other statements that you have made as to the Russian situation and the conditions in Russia than you are as to the number of troops you have referred to as being in Archangel and in Siberia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to let the other statements that I made about Russia stand upon the same basis as my statements about the troops in Archangel and in Vladivostok.

Mr. HUMES. And one rests on just as substantial a foundation as the other?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Quite so.

Mr. HUMES. All right; proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, now, considering the idea of the strength of the soviet in Russia, I said that during the period of 15 months the people were for the soviets in the elections. Ninety per cent of the Russian people took part in the elections, and while they change the constituencies of the soviet officials and parties they retain the soviet itself. In the next place, as far as the six million or eight million Russians who are in Russia are concerned, who have guns, we see no uprisings against the soviets, but we see always those guns and bayonets used against the enemies of the soviets; we see that around the nuclei that have been formed of the soviet forces in Archangel and Siberia, according to the last statements received, Russian troops rallied about them.

Mr. HUMES. In that connection, with reference to firearms is it not a fact that all the elements of the population, except those that are in sympathy with or under the control of the present government, the Bolshevik régime or the soviet government, have been disarmed, and is it not one of the policies of the government to disarm everybody that is not in sympathy with the perpetuation of the existing system?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the soviet government of Russia I have no doubt that the people who are anti-soviet are not allowed to have firearms, just as precisely the anti-soviet government in Vladivostok have taken away the arms from the pro-soviets.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, in the territory where the soviets and Bolsheviki control, the persons opposed to them have been disarmed, and consequently they are in no position, even if they were disposed to, to use any forcible resistance as against the régime. Is not that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is true as far as you can take a vast country and disarm a hundred millions of people. It is true to an extent, but one finds all through Russia these guns in the homes of the workingmen and in the hands of the peasants. They have been hidden so that searching parties can not get them; just as the pro-soviet party in Siberia that have been disarmed, I have no doubt, will be able to get their hands on arms if they want to rise up against the Kolchak government.

Mr. HUMES. That is, where people have been disarmed, some of the people may have arms in the same sense that a man in this country may carry concealed weapons. But there has been an organization to disarm these people opposed to the present régime?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose so.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not think that would have a tendency to retard action on their part against the Bolsheviki?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps so. But Alexieff started up from the Don with his Cossacks and announced that he was going to Moscow. There was not a force between him and Moscow to oppose him, but the peasants and workmen rose up spontaneously and organized such a resistance that the Cossacks were unable to proceed any farther. The whole countryside was solid against him. I have tried to bring hom to you the fact that the establishment of the soviet was in a very painless and bloodless fashion. For example, the Vladivostok soviet—I know that is a specific instance——

Mr. HUMES. You can not base a revolution on a paper program of that kind. You could organize 14 different kinds of government on paper and have no bloodshed, but when you put that paper organization into practical and active operation the blood commences to flow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore we are not concerned with the paper program when we are discussing the Bolsheviki. The fact remains that when that program is put into operation then blood commences to flow, does it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point I made the other day was that in Petrograd the soviet was established with the killing of only 18 people, in Moscow something like 1,000, in Kiev 2,000, and in Irkutsk with some victims. In all Russia, from the time of the November revolution to June, 1918, when the soviet had established its power from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the White Sea to the Ukraine, I stated that the killing was not more than 1, at the very utmost, out of 1,000 of the population. By June, 1918, all revolts had been practically suppressed and the soviet government had been recognized from one end of the country to the other. There were anti-soviet governments organized in Harbin and other outside cities, but, Senators, not one of the ministers of those paper governments dared to step his foot on the soil of Siberia or Russia. He would have been looked at as a common criminal. In June, 1918, before allied intervention came in, the soviet had control over the vast territory of Russia and Siberia. The American Red Cross—Maj. Thacher particularly dwells upon this—when they came out over their trans-Siberian line in May, said that as they came out they found order was just as good at Irkutsk and all along the line to Vladivostok as at Moscow—order just as good 6,000 miles away as it was in the center itself or 10 miles from the center. I think it is an indisputable fact that the soviets had established themselves very effectively and very basically as the government of Russia by June, 1918, without the killing of one in a thousand of the population. I started to tell you, Major, that the Vladivostok soviet was established without the killing of even a single human being. Yet when the allies overthrew the soviets they filled every hospital and even the warehouses with the slain. Thousands and thousands of others were killed, because the people along that line rose up en masse for the protection of the soviets.

Senator WOLCOTT. You say "thousands and thousands of others." How many others?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; thousands and thousands. I think the Czecho-Slovak commandant here and I are going to have a conversation after this matter, because it is a very involved subject. I have great respect for the Czecho-Slovaks. I think he will agree with the statement that thousands and thousands of their troops were wiped out because the people rose up against them.

I ought to insert this here. People say, "Well, you paint a picture of the millennium in Russia under the soviet." I do no such thing. I know that conditions are bad even in Vladovostok. I heard one man get up and curse the soviet because they had promised the people everything. He said, "Where is the stuff they promised? Where is the bread? They have not given the people bread; they have just cut the rations down." While what he said was true, the audience showed their strong disapproval of his speech, and it was for this reason: The people wanted bread and better economic conditions, but there are certain other things they desired also. Man does not live by bread alone, nor do the soviets live simply by the bread they give the people. I want to explain to you why it is that people are so tenacious. We could not exist if our Government could not give us bread and fairly good conditions of life; and if it could not give us clothes and shelter and everything else, we would rise and overturn the Government. It was the same way when I came out of Siberia and Russia and enjoyed all the wonderful comforts we have here. We are in a different land, entirely. There everything was bad. Food was bad. Conditions are very much mixed up. Why is it, then, that the Russians cling so tenaciously to the soviets when they have not given the people as much bread and housing and clothes; when things are very bad? It is for this reason that the soviets are giving the people something else that they need as much as bread. One of the things that for the first times in their lives they have been getting is an organization they could understand, where the least man could talk out. They enjoy that, and they are very tenacious of that because the mass have a sense of power. The workingman likes it. He has power, a certain ruthless power, a brutal power. I do not deny it, but I am trying to tell you why he likes the soviets. For the first time he is regarded not as an animal but as a human being. I think every man likes a sense of adventure, a sense of creating things. That is the reason the manufacturer likes to do big things. And now through the soviet these men who have been dead and stupid and oppressed in many ways are given a chance to do something, creating a new world and a new order.

You say they are fanatics. But every man has a spiritual passion in him. It needs only to be aroused. The soviets have aroused it. They are conscripts of a mighty dream. Rightly or wrongly, this dull people believe that they have a mission to the world, and in face of the fact that the rest of the world has an organized society, they feel that somehow or other they are establishing an organized society in such a way that all the rest of the world will come over and copy it.

I will admit the contention that there is disorder, and lack of bread and clothes and the essentials of life in Russia. At the same time, I do not think that these anti-soviet witnesses have seen into the heart and soul of the Russian people or realize the satisfactions that the soviet has given them. We all crave fellowship, power, adventure, and we crave something to satisfy other needs. The soviet has done that with its slogans. In spite of its fanatical course, its bloodshed, and all else, the fact remains that it has given these other things. Therefore the people are loyal to it, for that reason.

MR. HUMES. Now, let me ask you. You discussed the freedom of speech and the freedom of action and the new liberties of the Russian people. Were not they accomplished in the March revolution, and has there been any greater degree of freedom under the Bolshevik régime than that which was established under the so-called Kerensky or provisional government régime?

MR. WILLIAMS. It is pretty hard to answer that, because I could say "yes" and another man could say "no." I think perhaps the soviet has been more iron-fisted and strong, and sometimes has exercised more repression, than the Kerensky régime, because the Kerensky régime was a weak régime.

MR. HUMES. In other words, from the purely personal standpoint there were more personal liberties on the part of the individual under the Kerensky régime than under the Bolshevik régime, were there not?

MR. WILLIAMS. It is like this. It depends upon the class. For example, before the Bolsheviks came into power there was much suppression of their papers, closing up of their offices, and there was a great deal of hounding of their men, jailing and even killing of their leaders. A great many of them were thrown into jail. So that the masses suffered a great deal under the Kerensky régime. But at the present time the other end of society is suffering under their régime.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, the Bolsheviki are now doing to the elements that favored the provisional government just what the provisional government was proposing to do in a weaker way to the Bolsheviki and their régime; is that true? It is a case of dog eat dog.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you are going to figure it up numerically, you must see that the masses of the population and their organizations were being suppressed under the Kerensky régime, while the class that is being suppressed now represents a very small proportion of the population.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that a portion theoretically in favor of the Bolsheviki in a very large percentage are supporting the Bolsheviki either because they find it convenient to obtain for themselves food and the necessities of life, or else to prevent violence and to save difficulty and the coercion that they might meet from the Bolsheviki if they were openly antagonizing them or opposing them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a certain measure of truth in that; but the best answer I can give to that is to state that where these supposedly dissatisfied elements have been given a chance to rally to the organizations and forces opposed to the soviet government, they have not done so. Do you understand what I am driving at? I do not think that great numbers of them have been coerced to support the government, because the Russian people are flaming, defiant rebels against repressions, and they do not seem to have rebelled against the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. Once more we are getting an expression of your opinion as it differs from the opinion of others?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely. But may I interject that you have the opinion of 15 witnesses on the other side and at least 12 or 15 witnesses on this side who are contending for the very same view that I am.

Mr. HUMES. You say that you are here as a champion of the Bolsheviki; that you are defending them; that you were and are at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely.

Senator WOLCOTT. May I be permitted to make an observation? All the other witnesses that have come here have impressed me as being impartial, while you certainly admitted, as I recall, at the beginning of your testimony, that you were confessedly, in a sense, a partisan of the Bolsheviki?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely. I was trying to say that in this country we have largely a reflection of the attitude of 5 per cent of the Russian people toward the revolution; or perhaps 10 per cent of the people. I am perfectly willing to admit that those people have suffered a great deal in the loss of the necessities of life. But I came to reflect the feeling of 90 per cent of the masses of the soviet government.

Senator WOLCOTT. By the way, these many witnesses that have appeared here would take strong issue with you that 90 per cent of the people are in favor of the Bolsheviki. They reverse it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am aware of that; and I am one of the first three witnesses to try to press home another viewpoint, but your minds are full of the things that have been told you by men that have been here. Their ideas will have a stronger influence than mine. But at the same time, if you had heard me after Mr. Robins and Mr. Thompson and Mr. Wardwell, of the Red Cross, and Mr. Louis Edgar Browne, and Dr. Kuntz, and Miss Beatty of McCall's Magazine, and after Dr. Reichman, and Mr. Keddie of the Quaker mission, after Jerome Davis and Mr. Humphries of the Y. M. C. A.—after all those men have been sitting here and I make my statement—you would think, perhaps, that I was stating the case for the soviet government in mild form.

Senator WOLCOTT. All the other witnesses were unbiased, but you admit that you are not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know of any witness who does not look at the matter from a particular biased standpoint. I do not try to persuade myself that I am unbiased, because I am biased by what I have seen. I have just read in the newspapers of three young fellows that were working there with me, for whom I had the greatest respect and honor, and three men who have got just as much of the spirit as—I say it reverently—almost as much as Jesus Himself, three fellows between 19 and 26 years of age. They have just been shot in Siberia. It is hard for me to be cold and unmoved by it, because it is the same as if my brothers had been shot. Therefore I am biased by that feeling that comes all the time, when I speak about Russia. I know that these anti-soviet witnesses could not help but reflect the class they lived with. We all persuade ourselves that we look at a question from a very unprejudiced viewpoint, but we are all biased. I am all the time being biased by the fact that these men that I have been living with and have had so much respect for are being killed. Sometimes it makes me mad, and sometimes I wonder that I keep as restrained as I do.

That is my attitude while I am speaking on this subject; and, of course, you are listening not only to facts but to opinions, the reflection of what I have got from my experiences there.

Arthur Ransome, writing in the New Republic, says:

No one contends that the Bolsheviks are angels. I ask only that men shall look through the fog of libel that surrounds them and see that the ideal for which they are struggling, in the only way in which they can struggle, is among those lights which every man of young and honest heart sees before him somewhere on the road, and not among those other lights from which he resolutely turns away. These men who have made the Soviet government in Russia, if they must fail, will fail with clean shields and clean hearts, having striven for an ideal which will live beyond them. Even if they fail, they will none the less have written a page of history more daring than any other which I can remember in the story of the human race. They are writing it amid showers of mud from all the meaner spirits in their country, in yours, and in my own. But, when the thing is over, and their enemies have triumphed, the mud will vanish like black magic at noon, and that page will be as white as the snows of Russia, and the writing on it as bright as the gold domes that I used to see glittering in the sun when I looked from my windows in Petrograd.

And when in after years men read that page they will judge your country and mine, your race and mine, by the help or hindrance they gave to the writing of it.

And so I do not know how to bring home to you—and I do not think it will get home to you by my particular statement here—my belief in the soviet government as a vital basic power in harmony with the needs of the Russian people. I believe it with all my soul, because the other governments have shown by the manner of their dying that they had no right to live. For example, we know how the Czar's government fell. It was only necessary to disintegrate the army. That is what it rested on, entirely. Disintegrate the army and the Czar fell. As to the Kerensky government, it was only necessary to surround the ministers in the Winter Palace, and it fell. But the soviet government—to wipe it out you have to wipe out these local self-governing bodies. That is where its great basic strength is. I admit that the present soviet government does not allow the largest democratic representation, as I think it ultimately will. It is an outstanding fact that the industrial laborers of Russia only represent about 15 per cent of the population. The rest of the population is peasant. The peasants have just the same number of delegates in the central congress in Moscow as the industrial workers. It is a misrepresentative government to that extent. I do not see why this fact has not been brought out plainly by the anti-soviet side. It is true that during revolutionary days the workmen who compose the 15 per cent of the population have just as much voice in the government as all the rest of the population of Russia put together. I think it is unfair, and ultimately that will be wiped out of the soviet constitution. The only thing that can be said in favor of it is that the cities dominate the country, and the cities happen to be very enthusiastic for the soviet.

There is just one other thing, Senators, that I want to speak of at this point, and that is that you are not inclined, so far as I understand, to make a distinction between the soviet and the Bolsheviki.

Senator WOLCOTT. I think we had that pointed out; that the Bolsheviki is a political party and the soviet is the method of government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is true, also, that the Bolsheviki are the dominant party, and they control the soviets.

Senator WOLCOTT. Some witnesses have said here that the Bolsheviki are the dominant party in this sense, that they are in control; but they have said that it is by no means a majority that have control of the soviets.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They can not be in control unless they are in the majority.

Senator WOLCOTT. You have given testimony here that as you see the situation they are actually in the majority. Let me ask you when this soviet form of government originated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The soviet form of government, so far as it originated in the mind of a single human being, originated in the mind of an American called Daniel de Leon.

Senator WOLCOTT. As far as Russia is concerned there were Russian soviets at the time of the revolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every village was organized on soviet lines. They were organized from one end of the country to the other.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did they organize the all-Russian congress of soviets?

Mr. WILLIAMS. When I arrived in Petrograd in June, 1917, the first all-Russian congress of soviets met, and it may be interesting to you to know that that congress, which was addressed by Mr. Duncan and Mr. Russell, of the Root mission, had, out of the 1,200 delegates—I am not exactly sure of the statistics, but I think out of the 1,000 or 1,200 delegates there were only 100 or 125 Bolsheviks. All the rest belonged to the other parties. As the masses grew more radical they went over to the Bolsheviks.

Senator WOLCOTT. So that the soviet government was not established by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was foreign to their minds at the beginning of the revolution.

Senator WOLCOTT. It was in existence, and the Bolsheviks got control of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was like this, as I tried to explain the other day. It grew up spontaneously and elementally out of the life of the Russian people, and they worked it out. The separate soviets were linked up together more and more. The part the Bolsheviks had to do with the establishment of the soviet government was this. When the Kerensky government was showing its weakness and would not give the people land or peace, or anything they wanted, the Bolsheviks said, "All power to the soviet. You want the land, and there is your government, the soviet, which will give it to you." I think that it is the mark of genius of the Bolshevik leaders not to impose things on the people, but to recognize the things which exist and to utilize it. The Bolsheviks had nothing to do with originating the soviet. Lenin simply pointed to the soviet as the de facto organ of power.

Senator WOLCOTT. A moment ago you were saying something to this effect—that the old Czar's government fell because of its corruption and inefficiency, and as soon as the army, upon which it was bottomed, disintegrated, it fell; and the Kerensky government, following it, fell because it could not satisfy the longing of the Russian people for what they wanted; and that, thereupon, the soviet government came to the fore as the thing that met the hopes and aspirations of the Russian people. Now, that system of government you have to-day existed under Kerensky. It must not, therefore, have been the form of government, or what they gave as the form of government, that appealed to people and induced them to overthrow the Kerensky government; and thus it seems to me your logic does not prove good. There must have been something else that intervened there which appealed to the Russian people that occasioned the overthrow of the Kerensky government; and was not that something else the desire to take property directly by the people and not await the long process of the meeting of the constituent assembly and the working out of a scheme?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is quite right.

Senator WOLCOTT. Then, if that be true, is not this true, that the Bolshevik program that they stood for was bottomed not on high ideals of liberty as expressed in the soviet form of government, but upon the selfish desires of human nature to take unto itself and seize; that is to say, bottomed on something like the unholy passion of greed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think you are absolutely right. In all great social movements, while they have certain idealistic objects and tendencies, I think that the fundamental motives are economic, fundamentally selfish motives, if you please. I do not quarrel with that. I wish it was otherwise; but we have to accept it as a fact. It is true that, as you say, during the summer of 1917 the Russian people had gotten tired, they had ceased to think that the constituent assembly was ever going to come, or that the end of the war was going to come. The peasant, saying that the land was God's and the people's, was going out and taking over the land and burning the manor houses and the hay ricks, and doing many brutal and cruel things. We saw the workingmen, in the same way, taking over factories and botching and destroying material. We saw the soldiers, disgusted with the conduct of the war, throwing down their guns and leaving the front by tens of thousands. The masses, warworn and weary and disillusioned, seemed to be pushing Russia over the edge of the abyss and into chaos, anarchy, and night. I stated that it was my solemn conviction that if there had not arisen a party that could see that for this ultraradical, deep-running movement of the people there must be an ultraradical program of government, Russia would really have gone on into anarchy, chaos, and night; but the Bolsheviks had the ability to take these elemental energies that were loose in the world and guide them to a constructive purpose; they had the confidence of the people, so that the people trusted them. As I said before, we must try to think in the Russian terms. The American thinks that land is private property, primarily; but it is not so with the Russian. Nineteen out of twenty Russians believe—and I do not think anyone will deny that—that the land should belong to the people who used the land. They never believed that the large landowners had any right to the land. The peasants who, of their own accord, were taking over the land without any sanction in law were given a legal basis and legal right for doing what they did. The same way with the taking over of the factories. They were given some legal authority for their action. There was one thing I brought up the other day—I think you had some answer to it, but I did not quite get it—that whenever any country thinks that its national destiny demands that it do a certain thing, it does it. We thought as a people that we must cut out the cancer—slavery—and put an end to it, and we did so. Just in the same way the Russian people believed that to fulfill their national destiny, rightly or wrongly, the land must belong to the people.

Senator WOLCOTT. As a matter of fact, I take issue with you on your historical analogy. The Civil War was not fought to cut out the cancer of slavery. It ended in that, but it is clear as daylight that Lincoln's purpose was to save the Union, and he said that if he could save the Union with slavery he would save it; if he could save the Union half slave and half free, he would save it; if he could save the Union with the slaves free, he would save the Union; he would do anything to save the Union. That was his idea. He freed the slaves in order to cripple the South, as a war measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, good; that was Lincoln's purpose, that is right, to save the Union. But I do not think you do reach over with your minds into Russia and understand with what a passion those people cling to the idea that they must save the revolution. That is their purpose, to save the revolution, and it seemed that the revolution could be saved only by taking these drastic measures. It is almost impossible to project yourselves into the feeling that those men had and appreciate the loyalty that they felt toward their revolution.

Mr. HUMES. Coming back to your historical analogy, if the Bolsheviks had been in control of this country at the time of the Civil War, instead of freeing the slaves they would have nationalized them. They would have preserved the property element; they would have perpetuated the property in the slaves; but they would have nationalized the slaves and made them the property of the State rather than the property of the individuals, would they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Humes, I am a good partisan of the Bolsheviks in some ways, but I am not able to read their minds and read back into those conditions back there and say what they would have done.

Mr. HUMES. You have undertaken to analyze two historical occurrences.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. The property in the land is preserved and nationalized and taken over by the government in Russia. The slaves in the United States were not taken over by the Government, but they were freed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore the two cases are not analogous, are they?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are analogous as to the matter of property rights. I was trying to prove to you that whenever any nation sees that there are certain obstacles in the way of the fulfillment of what it regards as its national destiny and national ends, it makes some very short cut toward that, and the national destiny of keeping our Union intact demanded the abolition of property rights in slaves, etc.

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Therefore we did that. We put it through, just as in this war we have cut into established property rights.

Mr. HUMES. But property rights are not abolished in Russia; they are nationalized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right; I agree with you very heartily on that.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed.

Senator WOLCOTT. Before you proceed on another line, I am curious to know why the Bolshevik party were unwilling to wait for the constituent assembly in which, as I understand, the Russian people might through their representatives, meet and devise a form of government which, in their judgment, would preserve to them all the fruits of the revolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that in the popular mind everywhere the dissolution of the constituent assembly is one of the black marks upon the whole soviet régime; here was a great constituent assembly which was talked about for such a long time, and then when it finally met, it was dissolved by the bayonets of the soviets.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes. Now, why was that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why?

Senator WOLCOTT. Go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will tell you. The Bolsheviks were the ones who did the most howling for the constituent assembly; yet when the constituent assembly came, they were the ones who dissolved it. There you have one of the strange antitheses of life.

I will give you the technical reason for it. In the first place, the great party in Russia is not the Menshevik or the Bolshevik. The great, historic party, that had the great, powerful figures in the past history of Russia, is the social-revolution party; the party of the peasants. We do not hear much about them now.

In the summer of 1917 many of the tickets were made up of the constituent assembly, and the socialist-revolutionist ticket was just one, straight ticket. After the ticket was made up, the socialist-revolutionist party split in two, into the right and left. The left became more radical and went over to the soviets, joined with the Bolsheviki in crying "All power to the soviets." That happened along in September, because in revolutionary times you will remember the changes are very quick.

When the ticket was presented to the masses of the people it had almost exclusively right socialist-revolutionist names on it; but the peasants had not known yet about the split that had come about in the ranks of the people. They did not know what the left was standing for.

Senator WOLCOTT. There was a left ticket?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was no left ticket. There was only one ticket.

Senator WOLCOTT. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And so they almost all voted as socialist-revolutionists, which put in the constituent assembly almost one-half of the number of it right social revolutionists—more than one-half.

Senator WOLCOTT. Did the Bolsheviki have a ticket in this election?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but just get this point clear. In January, 1918, two great congresses met in Petrograd, the third all-Russian congress of soviets and the constituent assembly.

The peasants had sent to the third all-Russian congress of soviets practically no one but left social revolutionists, and in the constituent assembly meeting at the same time, the peasants had practically nothing but right social revolutionists. So the soviet said, "This constituent assembly is entirely misrepresentative of the people." The third all-Russian congress of soviets was elected 10 days before it met, and in that all-Russian congress of soviets you find the peasants sending a definitely left radical group of representatives, while in the constituent assembly, which had been elected, one, two, or three months earlier, you find the peasants sending practically a solid right social revolutionist representation. In other words, the change that had gone on in the minds of the peasants when they had turned to the left was not registered in the constituent assembly. It was registered in the all-Russian congress of soviets. The soviets said, "This present constituent assembly does not represent the people." That is the one outstanding reason why they dissolved the constituent assembly.

I do not want to spin hair logic around the thing, but I think that is the legitimate reason.

Senator WOLCOTT. You think that is a legitimate reason?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it was a legitimate reason. Furthermore, I think if they had not dissolved the constituent assembly—I know how strange this will sound, but knowing Russia I say it, that without the dissolution of the constituent assembly—the danger of Russia going over into chaos and night would have been greater than ever.

Senator WOLCOTT. There is no point in guessing at reasons. That is so purely speculative, beyond the power of any human mind to forecast, that I do not think it is worth while giving it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can I give—

Senator WOLCOTT. You may give your ideas, if you want to. I do not want to stop you.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then let me state this. At the time these two congresses met in Petrograd the constituent assembly declared that it would have a great parade in its honor—in favor of the constituent assembly—and the whole city was allowed to have that parade, except a certain section of it where the soviet said the parade must not go on account of possible trouble. This parade was held in the city of Petrograd at the time when it was a matter of life and death of the constituent assembly, there were 15,000 people in it—at the outside 20,000—who paraded for it.

Now, take the soviet. Many people in this room have seen literally hundreds of thousands of people in a soviet parade. If it were a matter of life and death to the all-Russian congress of soviets there would have been hundreds of thousands of people ready to parade for it, and to die for it.

Senator WOLCOTT. That does not prove much to me, because I have seen, in my State, the Democrats outparade the Republicans many and many a time and then get licked badly at the polls.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very good. May I just state that Mr. Robins at that time had 50 or 60 telegrams coming in from all over the country as to the attitude of the people to the constituent assembly. He said that the dissolution of the constituent assembly provoked little or no protest, but you observe, whenever anybody tries to disturb the soviets, that it produces a great uproar.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who disbanded them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The constituent assembly was disbanded by order of the third all-Russian congress of soviets.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who went there and forced them to disband?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There were a dozen, or probably 50, of the soldiers or sailors of the all-Russian soviet.

Senator WOLCOTT. Were they the Kronstadt sailors?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Kronstadt boys were in at the head of almost everything, and I think they probably went on this.

Senator WOLCOTT. They went in there armed, I suppose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They met there for one day, and the constituent assembly continued until about 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning. Finally, they turned to the constituent assembly and said, "You are not doing anything here. We are tired and want to go home, and we suggest that you go home," and so they all went home.

Senator WOLCOTT. They thought that discretion was the better part of valor there and they went home. That is all there is about it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; exactly.

Senator WOLCOTT. They thought discretion was the better part of valor there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some members of the constituent assembly organized in several places, but they never have been able to do anything.

May I interject here this fact? Tchernoff was elected president of the constituent assembly. "Humanite," in Paris, now admits that Tchernoff has gone to Moscow and has made an agreement with Lenine to enter into cooperation with the soviet government. I am not able to confirm that, however.

Senator WOLCOTT. Suppose that to be true, what does it prove?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It only proves that, however unfortunate we may regard certain actions in Russia in the past, we have got to regard the soviet as rooting itself deeper and deeper in the larger bases of the population. That is what finally I want to get to you.

Senator WOLCOTT. That man may be like the Vicar of Bray. You remember about the Vicar of Bray, of course?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not remember.

Senator WOLCOTT. He had a little thing that I used to say over to myself which, as I recall, went something like this:

For this I will maintain, until my dying day, sir,
That whatsoever king may reign, I will be Vicar of Bray, sir.

That does not prove anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to ask you this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Has the soviet government ever undertaken to provide for a new constituent assembly?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only understand that in the negotiations that have been going on from Litvonoff, the representative of the soviet at Stockholm, they are perfectly willing to call a constituent assembly.

Senator WOLCOTT. They are willing to, but they have had over a year. What has this soviet government that is so desirous of permitting the Russian people to express their views and aspirations in the form of government and suggestion done toward calling together the constituent assembly and getting some kind of scheme so that the views of the people can be taken—anything?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have just stated that 90 per cent of the people—and I think it is 95 per cent—are voting with the soviet organization, and they have a right in the organization to determine any question of government.

Senator WOLCOTT. But they vote away down in the local soviet, and these great powers of the administration of the national government are administered away up on top, where they are removed from the people. They are really without any constitution, and have no charter of government and no plan of government except as they from day to day choose to devise one; is not that the situation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not think that is a fair statement of the situation. Remember that they have worked out a constitution in their great All-Russian Congress of Soviets, and they debated a long time on their constitution. There is outlined a certain structure of the nation. For example, if anyone in Russia came and talked about the idea of a constituent assembly—again this is only opinion, you see—probably there would not be 10 per cent of the people in the towns who would want such a thing as a constituent assembly. Remember that we have certain political notions of the Western Hemisphere—western notions. There were certain great Russian characters, among them Miliukov, who went to the western nations and got an insight into western ideas, and their idea was that Russia should have the same kind of political constitution as exists now in the western nations, and they came back there with that idea. But so far as the people themselves are concerned, when you talk about a constituent assembly, they are not enthusiastic about it: it means nothing to them; it is only a word; while when you say "soviet" to them, that is a thing which immediately signifies something. They have taken part in it and they understand it. In other words, you have got to get under the skin of the vast masses of the Russian people. There you realize that though you use certain political terms which are wonderful words to us, drawing out our allegiance, they mean nothing at all to them.

Senator WOLCOTT. But it seems to me wonderful that the people in control now, having the desire to give the Russian people what they want, do not get up some sort of a scheme that takes into account the Russian people. It will not do for any man to set himself up and say, "I know I represent the wishes of the vast majority of the people." That is the way of all tyrants; they claim that they are doing the thing that the people want. Now, the only thing to do that I know of is to count people on a proposition and see what they want. But have these Bolsheviks adopted any step in that direction?
